TO THE

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Financial Bill.

It must not be forgotten, Mr. Chairman, that there are borrowers as well as lenders in this country.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JAMES T. McCLEARY,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, December 14, 1899.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 1) entitled "A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes"—

Mr. McCLEARY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The bill now under discussion has two general purposes, namely, the unequivocal legal recognition of the gold standard in this country and the liberalization of our system of bank-note issues. With both of these purposes I am in hearty sympathy.

Before beginning the discussion of certain facts and principles embodied in the bill, I can not forbear expressing my surprise at the change which I see in the actions of our friends on the other side of the main aisle. I well remember that in other Congresses whenever the question of money was under consideration they were eager and anxious to substitute for any pending measure a proposition for "the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1." They charged down the aisle with fire in their eyes and determination in their movements. Thus far in this discussion I have heard only four of them express any interest in the proposition formerly so ardently advocated. Let me name the illustrious four: Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri, Mr. OTEY of Virginia, Mr. SULZER of New York, and Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. Others may have undertaken to uphold the Chicago platform, but if so, it has not been my fortune to hear them. What means this change? Is it to be taken as an indication that the once devout Free Silverites are beginning to waver in the faith?

THEY MUST ADHERE TO 16 TO 1 OR SURRENDER THEIR CASE.

It is rumored, Mr. Chairman, that our friends on the other side are trying to reorganize their shattered forces under a banner emblazoned with the single word "bimetallism." It is understood that doubt has been expressed by persons high in their councils as to the absolute sacredness of the ratio of 16 to 1. But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to warn our friends that the moment they abandon the ratio of 16 to 1 they practically abandon their whole case.

SILVER HAS NOT BEEN DEMONETIZED.

As I said before, Mr. Chairman, our friends on the other side seem to be reluctant to discuss the question of the standard. I am curious to see what kind of an argument they could make in the light of the experience of recent years. For the purpose of provoking such discussion I now boldly declare that in the proper sense of the term silver has not been demonetized in this country.

Mr. SULZER. We deny that.

Mr. McCLEARY. You enter a general denial?

Mr. SULZER. We enter a specific denial, and call your attention to the act of 1873.

Mr. McCLEARY. My attention has been called to that act at least two or three times before. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I shall have occasion to refer to it again in the course of my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, an aphorism often carries more weight than an argument. A single phrase may become the shibboleth of a campaign. Thus, for years the rallying cry of the Free Silverites has been the so-called "demonetization of silver." That cry has been woefully misleading. It has aroused the resentment of untold thousands of good people and has secured for the advocates of a change in our system of coining silver innumerable votes which they never could have secured had the real facts been fully understood.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I know that good writers on both sides of the controversy have spoken of silver as having been "demonetized." I understand, too, that the truth of my statement rests upon the definition of that term. I have no disposition to quibble over words. It is for the purpose of calling attention sharply to the actual facts in the case that I make the statement that silver has not been demonetized.

To "demonetize" means to put out of use as money. Wampum and tobacco were at one time used in this country as money. They are not so used now. Of wampum and tobacco, therefore, it may properly be said that they have been demonetized. But one needs only to look into his purse to see that silver is still used as money; hence my statement that silver has not been demonetized.

SILVER IS NOW COINED ON GOVERNMENT ACCOUNT.

To illustrate in another way what I mean, Mr. Chairman, by saying that silver has not been demonetized in this country, I will cite the practice which now prevails in grinding wheat into flour, as compared with the practice which formerly prevailed. Fifty years ago nearly all of the flour mills of the country were what were known as "custom mills." The old-fashioned gristmill was built by the side of a stream, to be run by water power. It cost little to build such a mill or to operate it. To that mill any farmer living in the neighborhood might bring his wheat, in large or small quantities, to be ground into flour and handed back to him in that form. If no one brought a grist, the mill remained idle. The mill was run on the policy of grinding for individuals who desired to have their wheat converted into flour.

In recent years a different policy has been adopted. A milling property is now a very expensive thing—expensive to build and requiring a large number of employees to operate it. The owners of the property can not without loss allow it to stand idle. They can not afford to wait for this, that, and the other man to bring a grist for grinding. The mill must be kept in operation all of the time. That fact has necessitated a change in the policy of running the mill. In order that they may have wheat on hand at all times for grinding, the owners of such a mill must go out into the market and buy wheat and store it in their own warehouses. The wheat that is ground belongs to the milling company, as does the flour that is made from it. If to such a mill you take some wheat to be ground into flour for you, you will meet with refusal. The mill is closed to the individual; it is open only to the company. Such a mill we call a "merchant mill."

Similarly, Mr. Chairman, there are two policies of coinage. The Government may follow in its coinage either the policy of the custom miller or that of the merchant miller. If, on the one hand, the Government accepts, from every man who has a money metal, that metal and converts it into the form of coin for him, handing back to him the actual coin made out of his own metal—that is, if the Government follows the policy of the custom miller and makes coin for anyone who has the metal out of which to make it—coinage is said to be "on private account." But if, on the other hand, the Government adopts the policy of going into the market and itself buying such amounts of money metal as it deems proper and converting it into coin at such times and in such amounts as it deems best in the interest of the public—that is, if the Government follows the practice of the merchant miller and coins only metal belonging to itself—coinage is said to be "on Government account."

Now, Mr. Chairman, is there a person within the sound of my voice who would say that because the mills are no longer open to the grinding of wheat for individuals that wheat has been "defoodized?" I trow not. Though ground in merchant mills on company account, flour is still used for food and used in larger quantities than ever before.

Silver in this country has for many years been coined only on Government account, but silver is used in this country as money in immensely larger quantities than when it was coined on private account. And the Government holds itself ready to provide all the silver coin that the people of this country can use in their commercial transactions. Hence I say it is both improper and misleading to say that silver has been demonetized.

It may be noted, parenthetically, that we are doing this coining of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and of course "without asking the aid or consent of any other nation on earth."

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does the gentleman propose to permit the owner of silver to have it coined on his own account when he takes it to the mill as a grist, or must he wait and take his chance of getting it coined when the miller chooses to do so?

A POPULIST CAN NOT FAVOR "FREE COINAGE" OF SILVER.

Mr. McCLEARY. Why, Mr. Chairman, I have just stated that for many years the coinage of silver in this country has been on Government account. The Government controls the volume of silver coined. We favor the continuance of that policy.

My friend from Kansas [Mr. RIDGELY] is a Populist. To him, therefore, since he has interposed a question, I desire to submit a proposition.

The Populist party was the first in this country to declare for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. And yet, Mr. Chairman, strange as it may seem, a Populist can not be a Free Silverite without either denying the foundations of his faith or throwing logic to the dogs.

Mr. RIDGELY. That is your opinion.

Mr. McCLEARY. Let me show the truth of my statement. The fundamental proposition of Populism is that "the making of money is one of the sovereign prerogatives of government, and the volume of money should be controlled by the Government."

The so-called "free coinage" of silver means the coinage of silver on private account. That is, to be more explicit, "free and unlimited coinage" of silver means that silver is to be coined for individuals, in such quantities as they may wish, and without charge for mintage.

Under a "free-coinage" policy the owner of silver bullion could take the silver to the mint for coinage and use it as money, or he could refrain from doing so, just as he saw fit. That is, the volume of silver coin in the country would be absolutely under the control of the men who own the silver bullion. That is, the control of the volume of silver coin would be transferred from the hands of the Government, where it now is, to the hands of individuals.

But Populists declare as the foundation of their faith that such control should be in the hands of the Government. Therefore they can not favor a proposition to turn such control over to individuals; that is, Mr. Chairman, they can not logically be Free Silverites.

But the free-silver proposition has been the most prominent plank in their platform. So I am forced to the conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that Populists either do not know what this so-called "free coinage" of silver really means or else that they are not very logical after all.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman permit me to reply?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly; but not in my time. It is too brief to permit further interruptions on this point. The gentleman will have time of his own. But I venture the prediction now that when my friend considers my proposition with care he will see that it is true and will not undertake to refute it. And in good conscience the Populist party, if such still exists, should abandon its "demand" for free silver coinage.

IN ALL THIS CENTURY WE HAVE NOT COINED A SINGLE SILVER DOLLAR ON PRIVATE ACCOUNT FOR USE AS MONEY.

Mr. Chairman, when I made the statement a short time ago that silver has not been demonetized in this country, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] interrupted me with a denial of my statement and referred me to the act of February 12, 1873. I promised him then that I would say a few words more about that act. What did the act of 1873 provide in relation to silver? Let it be remembered, sir, that it continued the coinage of subsidiary silver without any change whatsoever except that for the silver half dime was substituted the nickel 5-cent piece. The whole outcry which has in recent years been raised against the act of 1873 is based upon the fact that it definitely discontinued the coinage of the silver dollar of 412.5 grains of standard silver on private account.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in order to appreciate the importance of this omission, the awfulness of the "crime" thus committed, I desire the special attention of our friends on the other side of the Chamber to the fact that during all the years of this century before 1873, during that period which they point to as the period when the mints of the United States were "open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver"—during all that period, Mr. Chairman, not one solitary silver dollar piece was coined in the United States for use as money! This statement seems to be startling to our friends, but it is nevertheless true. In order that I may show the truth of the statement, it will be necessary for me to give a brief history of coinage in the United States.

THE COINAGE ACT OF 1792.

The Constitution of the United States, which went into operation in 1789, authorizes Congress (Article I, section 8)—

To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

In the tenth section of the same article the power to coin money (which under the Articles of Confederation had been exercised by the States as well as by the United States) is taken from the several States in the following language:

No State shall * * * coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts.

From the above it will be seen that by the Constitution the power to coin money is vested exclusively in the United States, under regulations to be prescribed by Congress. Congress has sole power over the matter. "Congress shall have power to coin money." There is absolutely no constitutional limitation on that power. Congress can decree what metals the coins shall be made of and can determine whether the coinage should be on private account or on Government account, and from its decision there is no appeal.

In all the chief commercial countries, when the Constitution was adopted, the principal coins were of gold and silver, and the coinage of both was on private account. Naturally this young country followed the example of the older countries.

When it was determined to establish a mint, one of the first questions was, What should be the unit of value? Should it be the pound sterling, with its divisions into shillings and pence, or should some other unit be selected? American practical sense decided the matter. The pound sterling is divided into 20 shillings, each shilling into 12 pence, and each penny into 4 farthings. Because of this irregular scale, computation in English money is difficult. The founders of the Republic determined to select a different unit, divide it into ten equal parts, and each of these parts into ten equal parts, so that the notation of our money system should conform to the ordinary decimal notation, to the end that computations involving money should be easily performed.

But what should the unit be? The name and its physical embodiment should both be familiar, because people are reluctant to accept money that is unfamiliar in name or appearance. Circulating in all of the thirteen States was the "old Spanish milled dollar." When fresh from the mint it contained about 376 grains of pure silver. But the coins which were circulating in this country were more or less worn. It was finally determined that the unit should be called a "dollar" and that it should be of the average value of the Spanish milled dollars then in circulation.

Everyone understood in those days, Mr. Chairman, that the value of a coin made on private account was exactly that of the metal in the coin. To determine the average, therefore, of the Spanish silver dollars then current, it was determined to collect a number of them indiscriminately, some being much worn and some little worn, put them into a scale and weigh them, and then divide the aggregate weight by the number of coins in the scale. The result of this experiment was to show that on the average the Spanish silver dollars then current contained 371¼ grains of pure silver. Thus was determined the size of the silver dollar. In the language of the act of 1792 there were to be coined—

Dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the same is now current and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and four-sixteenths part of a grain of pure, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard, silver.

HOW THE RATIO WAS ESTABLISHED.

But gold was to be coined also. And the next question that arose was, How large should the gold dollar be? This, of course, depended on how valuable gold was as compared with silver. How was the relative value or ratio to be determined? Hamilton's view was that the ratio for coinage purposes should be the commercial ratio of the two metals. "There can," he said, "hardly be a better rule in any country for the legal than the market proportion." With this view Jefferson concurred, saying:

Just principles will lead us to inquire into the market price of gold in the several countries with which we shall be connected in commerce, and to take an average from them.

Upon investigation it was found that at that time the commercial ratio of gold to silver was 15 to 1. This was adopted as the legal ratio, section 11 of the mintage act of April 2, 1792, providing as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the proportional value of gold to silver in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States shall be as fifteen to one, according to quantity in weight of pure gold or pure silver; that is to say, every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with one pound weight of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or less quantities of the respective metals.

The size of a silver dollar having been fixed at 371.25 grains of pure silver and the coinage ratio at 15 to 1, the number of grains of pure gold to the gold dollar was, of course, determined by dividing 371.25 by 15. The quotient, 24.75, was the number of grains of pure gold to the gold dollar.

Hamilton was in favor of coining the $1 gold piece, "in order to have a sensible object in that metal as well as in silver to express the unit;" but after some discussion of the matter it was concluded that a gold dollar piece was too small a coin for practical money uses. It was decided to coin the eagle or $10 gold piece, to contain ten times 24.75 grains of pure gold, or in the language of the act of 1792—

> Eagles, each to be of the value of ten dollars or units and to contain two hundred and forty-seven and four-eighths grains of pure or two hundred and seventy grains of standard gold.

Half eagles and quarter eagles—to contain, respectively, one-half and one-quarter the amount of gold contained in the eagle—were also provided for.

Provision was also made for the coinage of half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes of silver. These coins were to be exactly one-half, one-fourth, one-tenth, and one-twentieth the weight of the one-dollar silver piece, respectively, and were to be of the same degree of fineness as that coin.

All of the above-named coins provided for were to be a full legal tender at their face value, if of full weight, section 16 of the act of 1792 reading as follows:

> SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That all the gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at and issued from the said mint shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever, those of full weight according to the respective values hereinbefore declared, and those of less than full weight at values proportional to their respective weight.

Evidently, Mr. Chairman, the fathers of the Republic did not believe in the modern Popocratic theory that "it is the stamp of the Government that gives value to the coin," but believed as we do now that the value of the coin, when made on private account, was derived from the value of the metal in the coin and was proportional to its weight; for the law provided that worn or abraded coins, though still plainly bearing the stamp of the Government, were to be a legal tender, not at their full face value, but at such proportion of that value as the weight of the abraded coin bore to its weight when fresh from the mint.

OUR FIRST EFFORT AT "BIMETALLISM."

Thus we see, Mr. Chairman, that our fathers started out with the idea of having both gold and silver used as money—gold for the large transactions and silver for the small transactions. The mints were open to the coinage of both gold and silver on private account. There was to be no charge for mintage; coinage was to be "free." There was to be no limit on the amount which any person could have coined except his ability to provide the metal; coinage was to be "unlimited." The coinage ratio conformed to the market ratio. They put $5 worth of silver into 5 silver dollars and $5 worth of gold into the $5 gold piece. Legally and commercially the 5 silver dollars were exactly equal in value to the $5 gold piece.

After thus taking every precaution that human foresight could suggest to secure that end, our fathers had a right to expect that both gold and silver would be brought to the mint to be coined and used as money. But in that expectation they were disappointed. How did this come about?

For reasons that need not be detailed here the commercial value of silver soon fell slightly, so that the silver in 5 silver dollars was worth a little less in the market than the gold in a half eagle. Men found it profitable to sell gold and buy silver and take it to the mints to be coined and used in the payment of their obligations. Silver became the money of business, and gold refused to circulate as money. Nominally we had two standards, but practically we had only one. That one was silver. Measured by the standard of silver the gold in an eagle was worth more than $10. That being true, men would not pass it out as $10. The two things that I desire to emphasize at this point are:

First. That silver soon became the actual standard of values.

Second. That gold, though a little was coined each year, did not circulate to any great extent as money, and soon ceased to circulate at all.

That is, Mr. Chairman, while in law we had bimetallism, in practical fact we had silver monometallism, both as to the actual standard and the actual currency.

THE PERIOD OF SILVER MONOMETALLISM.

In the early part of this century our people had comparatively little use for money. Not only were they poor, but each family tried so far as possible to produce everything that it consumed. They made few exchanges and hence had little use for instruments of exchange. But as the people grew in wealth, in taste and in the ability to gratify their tastes, "homemade" things were gradually discarded and industry began to differentiate. Then arose the necessity for exchanging products, and with that came the necessity for more and better instruments of exchange, more and better money. In the days of poverty and "homemade" goods silver served the purposes of the people very well. But as early as 1819 the question began to be agitated, "Why do we not have gold in circulation?" On February 2, 1821, the Committee on Currency submitted a report to this House, saying, among other things:

> On inquiry they find that gold coins, both foreign and of the United States, have, in a great measure, disappeared; and from the best calculation that can be made there is reason to apprehend they will be wholly banished from circulation, and it ought not to be a matter of surprise, under our present regulations, that this should be the case. * * * There have been coined at the Mint of the United States nearly $6,000,000 in gold. It is doubtful whether any considerable portion of it can at this time be found within the United States.

The demand for gold coins continued to grow. The business men of the country urged upon Congress the necessity of getting gold coins into circulation. About 1830 a Select Committee on Coins was appointed by the Speaker to investigate this subject. In 1831 this committee made a report through Hon. Campbell P. White, expressing its judgment in the following very significant language:

> That there are inherent and incurable defects in the system which regulates the standard of value in both gold and silver; its instability as a measure of contracts and mutability as the practical currency of a particular nation are serious imperfections, while the impossibility of maintaining both a metals in concurrent, simultaneous, or promiscuous circulation appears to be as clearly ascertained.
> That the standard being fixed in one metal is the nearest approach to invariableness and precludes the necessity of further legislative interference.

In 1832 the Select Committee on Coins submitted another report, from which report I take the following statements:

> The committee think that the desideratum in the monetary system is the standard of uniform value; they can not ascertain that both metals have ever circulated simultaneously, concurrently, and indiscriminately in any country, * * * and they entertain the conviction that the nearest approach to an invariable standard is its establishment in one metal.

The purport of these words, Mr. Chairman, can not be misunderstood. They show that as early as 1830 some, at least, of the people had begun to see that with coinage of both metals on private account at a fixed ratio there was "impossibility of maintaining both metals in concurrent, simultaneous, or promiscuous circulation." But the thought had not yet been fully worked out; the true policy whereby this concurrent circulation could be secured had not yet been discovered.

Mr. Ingham, Secretary of the Treasury, recognizing that in the nature of things there can be but one standard of value, proposed to adopt definitely, by legal enactment, the single silver standard. But the business men of the country were wiser than he and demanded that gold coin should be introduced. How to get them into use became the problem.

WHY THE COINAGE RATIO WAS CHANGED IN 1834.

Thought began to take about this form: "Our actual everyday standard of value is 371.25 grains of pure silver. Measured in that standard the gold bullion required to make the coin called the eagle is worth more than $10; and so it is with the other gold coins. The gold required to make one of the coins is worth more as bullion than it will pass for as coin. This is why gold is not brought to the mint for coinage and use as money. This is why even the small amount of gold which is coined from time to time is soon sold by weight, the only use of the Government stamp being to certify the fineness of the metal. The trouble, then, is that we ask the owners to put more gold into the coins than they can afford, and the obvious remedy is to reduce the amount of gold required to the level of the silver standard under which we have so long operated and in terms of which all existing contracts are understood to be expressed; that is, we must cut down the requirements to the point where the gold in a $10 gold piece shall be as nearly as possible equal in value to the silver in 10 silver dollars; that is, we must change the coinage ratio to conform as nearly as possible to the commercial ratio."

By the year 1833 the commercial ratio of silver to gold had fallen to 15.93. Expecting a still further fall, Congress, in 1834, changed the coinage ratio from 15 to 15.98, which is commonly spoken of as "16 to 1," the ratio of which we have all heard so much; that is, under act of June 28, 1834, gold was to be coined at the rate of 23.2 grains of pure gold to the dollar (changed in 1837 to 23.22 grains to the dollar) instead of at the rate of 24.75 grains to the dollar, as provided for in the act of 1792.

Mr. Chairman, it is worthy of special notice that the gold coinage was made to conform to the silver values, not the silver coin to the gold valuation. Why was this? Simply because 371.25 grains of silver had for years been the sole standard in fact, though there were nominally two standards in law. All values, including the value of gold, had for years been expressed in silver. I repeat it, sir, because it is important to note and remember, that while from 1792 to 1834 we nominally and in law had two standards of value we practically and in fact had but one, and that one was silver, as is evidenced by the fact that when the coinage ratio was changed in 1834 the change was made in the gold coins, which were reduced in size so that their values would conform to the values of the silver coins.

OUR SECOND EFFORT AT "BIMETALLISM."

And now in 1834 began our second effort at securing the concurrent use of both gold and silver by coining both on private account at a fixed legal ratio. It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that again, as in 1792, every precaution that human foresight could suggest to render the experiment a success was adopted.

The change of ratio defrauded no man, for the gold coins were reduced in size to conform in value to the silver coins, in terms of which all existing contracts were expressed. So, Mr. Chairman, the experiment started with honesty of purpose. Moreover, Mr. Chairman, it was started with intelligence. The word "dollar," whether expressed in gold or in silver, had exactly the same commercial value; that is, the 232 grains of pure gold required to make a ten-dollar gold piece had exactly the same value in the metal market as the 3,712.5 grains of pure silver required to make 10 silver dollars. Neither gold nor silver was "at a premium."

Our fathers hoped, and had some right to expect, that with this careful adjustment of their relative values both gold and silver would be brought to the mint to be coined for use as money. But in that expectation they were, as they soon discovered, to be disappointed.

As I said before, by 1833 silver had fallen to the point where it required 15.98 ounces of pure silver in the metal market to equal in value 1 ounce in pure gold. The coinage ratio of 16 to 1 was selected on the theory that silver would probably fall a little farther. But the ratio had hardly been established when silver began to rise in value. By 1839 silver had so risen in value that it required only 15.62 ounces of pure silver to equal in value 1 ounce of pure gold. But at the mint it would require 16 ounces of pure silver to be equal in value to an ounce of pure gold. This being true, the owners of silver, naturally taking it where they could dispose of it most advantageously to themselves, sold their silver as bullion instead of having it coined for use as money.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, silver coin as measured in gold was soon at a premium. As a consequence, not only did the owners of silver bullion decline to bring it to the mint for coinage and use as money, but even the silver coin that had been made began to be gathered up and sold by weight. It soon became manifest that this second attempt at securing the concurrent use of gold and silver by authorizing the coinage of both on private account at a fixed ratio was doomed to failure. Silver gradually retired from circulation, as has been said, and business men became more and more troubled by the lack of small change. In many places it became necessary for business men to make and use paper or cardboard checks for change.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion right there?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly, Mr. Chairman. I am always pleased to yield to my friend from Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman from Minnesota kindly explain to the Democratic brethren why it was that at that time, with the mints open to the "free and unlimited" coinage of gold, such free coinage did not bring gold up to the par with silver?

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the question of my talented friend from Iowa is evidently not really intended for me. It is evidently presented as a nut for our friends on the other side to crack, and I pass it on to those for whom it was intended. As is usual when my friend speaks, this question goes to the heart of the general controversy.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the gentleman from Minnesota allow me a question at this point?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CARMACK. Is it not true that at the time we were coining at the ratio of 16 to 1 under the act of 1834 France was coining at the rate of 15.5 to 1?

Mr. McCLEARY. That is true.

Mr. CARMACK. And is it not also true that the fact that France put a higher value on silver than we did was the cause of our losing our silver coins?

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the inference of the gentleman from Tennessee is no doubt correct, partly at least. But I submit to the gentleman himself that the fact which he cites completely disposes of the proposed action of his party to coin silver on private account without regard to the action of any other country. He himself has just pointed out where such a course failed when tried before.

In 1849 Congress authorized the coinage of the one-dollar gold piece. This was done for two reasons. In the first place, it provided a physical embodiment of that which had for years been recognized as the actual standard of value—the gold dollar of 23.22 grains of pure gold or 25.8 grains of standard gold. And in the second place, it was Uncle Sam's response to the demand for small change. He made a smaller coin than had theretofore been made out of the only metal which came to the mint for coinage for use as money—namely, gold.

The little gold dollar pieces were warmly welcomed, but it was soon discovered that while they were very pretty as curiosities and ornaments—ladies collected them to make bangles of—these one-dollar gold pieces were entirely too small for practical use as money. The people thus learned by experiment that gold is as entirely unfitted for use in small transactions as silver is for use in large transactions, and the cry went up to Congress for silver coin to be used as change.

A SAMPLE PETITION.

The following petition will serve as a sample of those sent in to Congress. It was signed by the governor of New Jersey and by nearly all of the members of the legislature. It reveals the straits to which the people were being driven by reason of the almost total disappearance of silver coin. It is worth while to note particularly the first two paragraphs and the closing sentence of the fourth.

This petition is printed in the Congressional Globe, Volume XXVI, page 629, second session of the Thirty-second Congress, where it appears incorporated in the speech of Mr. Skelton, of New Jersey, made February 15, 1853:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the subscribers respectfully represents that the greatly increased value of silver compared with that of gold as regulated by law at the Mint of the United States has almost wholly withdrawn all the silver coins of proper weight from circulation as a currency. They are no longer a standard of value in payment and are only used as an article of commerce.

Your honorable bodies are fully aware that the ordinary business of the community, comprising probably ninety-nine hundredths of all individual transactions, can not be conducted without small coins or paper tokens to settle small balances, and however repugnant the use of such paper trash may be to public opinion or discreditable to the Government and nation, the indispensable necessity for it will, as your memorialists seriously apprehend, soon force it upon the whole country, unless Congress shall during the present session provide an efficient remedy.

Your memorialists believe that such a remedy may be found in the passage of a bill that passed the Senate of the United States at their last session which proposes a silver coinage about 7 per cent lighter than the present coin, comprising all the existing denominations less than $1, and making these new coins a legal tender only for payments not exceeding $5.

Your memorialists believe that this measure will remove all difficulty as soon as the proposed coins can be minted in sufficient numbers and distributed, and in the meantime it will entirely prevent the exportation or melting of silver coins, as these will become more valuable for recoinage than for any other purpose. Nor can it in the slightest degree disturb the monetary affairs of the nation or infringe existing rights in contracts.

Your memorialists forbear to occupy your time with further argument in favor of such a coinage. It has been fully discussed in an able report of a committee of the Senate and so long under consideration that it must be fully understood.

Your memorialists will therefore only remark, further, that, except those engaged in buying or melting silver coin, every individual in the United States who uses money must be interested in having relief from the increasing embarrassment arising from the want of a permanent regulation of the small silver coin.

That your honorable body will determine to act upon this subject at the present session is the earnest prayer of your memorialists.

TRENTON, N. J., February 4, 1853.

THE THIRD ATTEMPT AT BIMETALLISM SUCCESSFUL.

In the early fifties business had become actually embarrassed by the lack of small change. Petitions like the one given above were presented to Congress in great number urging that action be taken to furnish the channels of trade with the small change so imperatively needed. The people said, however:

"Do not trifle with us, Uncle Sam. In the early thirties we were clamoring for gold in our circulation. The act of 1834 gave us the gold, but in some way it robbed us of our silver. We are now clamoring for silver. Do not trifle with us and give us a law whereby in getting silver for use as change we shall lose our gold. What we want is the concurrent use of both gold and silver. The problem is a hard one to solve, but we believe you capable of solving it."

And Uncle Sam did solve it. The method of his solution is well worthy of our attention at this time. He said:

"My people are calling for silver. They need silver coins in their daily business. The whole policy of coinage they have placed in my hands, so the responsibility is on me. In my efforts to provide the necessary silver coin I have been saying to the men who own silver, 'Bring your silver to the mint and I will convert it into coin for you in quantities large or small, as suits your convenience, and without making any charge for my services.'

"But the men who own the silver seem deaf to the cries of my people. They do not bring their silver to be coined for use as money. On thinking it over, I do not know that I blame them. The trouble is that I have been asking them to put more silver into the coin than it will pass for as money after it has been coined. I have been asking them to put about 52 cents of silver into a half-dollar piece and then pass it out as 50 cents. Very naturally they would not do so. They would not bring their silver to be coined for use as money because it was not profitable for them to do so. I do not blame them, but I will not depend on them any longer.

"My people expect me to see that they are provided with a sufficient supply of silver coin with which to transact business, and I shall see to it that they are not disappointed. Heretofore I have been depending upon the owners of silver bullion to come forward voluntarily and supply the need for silver coin. Hereafter I shall myself see to it that there is sufficient silver coin provided for all the demands of business."

How was Uncle Sam to secure the silver with which to make the coins? There was only one honest way. He could not steal the silver, nor did he have any right to demand that its owners should give it to him without recompense. There was only one thing for him to do, and that was to go into the market and buy the silver at the market price and in such quantities as he deemed necessary, and out of the silver thus bought make silver coin in such quantities and of such denominations as would meet the business demands for such coin. This policy Uncle Sam then resolved upon.

That is, Mr. Chairman, in 1853 was adopted in this country the policy of the coinage of silver on Government account, which has been continued ever since, and for which the advocates of this bill still contend.

Uncle Sam was shrewd, too. He said: "Heretofore I have been requiring that silver worth, on a gold valuation, 52 cents should be used in making the 50-cent piece. That is why the men who own the silver have not brought it to be coined and used as money. And that is why the silver coins that have been made have not gone into circulation but have been sold by weight. And if, out of the silver which I propose to buy, I should make coins in such a way that there would be 52 cents' worth of silver in a half dollar, the coins would not be allowed to circulate. There would be 4 per cent profit in collecting them and selling them by weight. The object which I have in mind would not be attained. I am not blaming men for being selfish, but in making my plans I will remember that they are selfish. I will remove temptation from them. Instead of putting 52 cents' worth of silver into a half dollar, I will put in only 49 cents' worth. And I know men well enough to know that then the coins will be allowed to circulate, for there would be 2 per cent loss in selling them by weight."

That is, Mr. Chairman, under the act of 1853 the coinage of silver was not only to be on Government account, but the ratio of coinage was to be so changed that the value of the silver in each coin, measured in gold, would be slightly less than the nominal value of the coin.

Not only was Uncle Sam shrewd, Mr. Chairman, but he was also kind and just. He said, in planning this act of February 21, 1853: "My people live in houses. Houses may burn. If a house occupied by one of my people and having in it some of this silver coin should burn and the coin be melted into bullion, the owner would suffer some loss by reason of the policy which I am now planning. In order that no one may be called upon to take more than a small amount of risk on account of this policy; in order that no man, however rich or powerful, may be able to compel any other man, however poor or weak, to take more than a fair share of the risk involved in this policy, I shall make it impossible for anyone to force upon another in the payment of an obligation more than a reasonable amount of this kind of coin. Now, what is that reasonable amount?"

After thinking it over Uncle Sam concluded that, inasmuch as the silver which he was providing for was to be used for change or pocket money and that the maximum amount of silver which a person is willing to carry in his pocket is about $5, $5 would be the "reasonable amount" which he had been looking for.

HOW THE ACT OF 1853 ACCOMPLISHED THE PURPOSE INTENDED.

Putting the foregoing propositions, Mr. Chairman, into technical language, the act of 1853 provided:

1. That the silver coins proposed to be made under it—namely, half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes—should be coined on Government account only.

2. That the silver in each coin should be worth slightly less than the nominal value of the coin, the silver in the half dollar being reduced from 206.25 grains of standard silver to 192 grains of standard silver, and the smaller coins in proportion.

3. That the silver coins thus made should be limited in the legal-tender quality to $5.

4. That the coins thus made could be obtained by anyone at any time "in exchange for gold coins at par in sums of not less than $100."

Inasmuch as these coins could always be obtained in exchange for gold, it is clear that provision had been made for supplying the channels of trade with all the silver coin needed therein; and, inasmuch as these silver coins could be had only for gold coins, their parity with gold was secured. That is, Mr. Chairman, under the act of 1853 an arrangement was perfected whereby the volume of silver coin was regulated so as to meet automatically the exact demands of trade, while at the same time the purchasing power of these coins was maintained at an exact parity with gold.

In this way, sir, was solved the problem of having gold and silver coins in actual concurrent circulation, each serving the purpose which it can best serve—the gold for the large transactions and the silver for the small transactions. And, Mr. Chairman, the policy adopted in 1853 is the only one ever yet devised by the wit of man which safely and surely accomplishes that end. That policy, Mr. Chairman, is to leave gold to be coined on private account, but to have silver coined on Government account. That has been our policy ever since 1853, and in my judgment will continue to be our policy through all the years of the future. [Applause on the Republican side.]

WHY THE COINAGE ACT OF 1853 MADE NO MENTION OF THE SILVER DOLLAR.

The coinage act of February 21, 1853, the prime object of which was to make sure that the American people should have an ample supply of silver coin for their business needs, made no mention whatever of the silver dollar piece. Why was this, Mr. Chairman? The answer is significant. The omission was caused by the fact that the American silver dollar piece was an unknown coin to the people of that day. Nobody then doing business had ever used one as money. And as this act of 1853 secured to the people the actual use of half dollars and the smaller pieces, any payment (say $5) desired to be made in silver could be made with the coins provided. This was what the people wanted, and all that they wanted, of silver coins.

Why, Mr. Chairman, in more than half a century there had not been coined in the United States one solitary silver dollar piece for use as money. I will go further, Mr. Chairman, and make a statement which our friends on the other side may challenge or admit as they see fit. The statement is this, and it strikes right at the root of their whole contention in this matter: During all of this century, sir, there has not been coined in the United States mints one solitary silver dollar piece on private account for use as money in this country.

Mr. SULZER. Well, we deny that.

Mr. McCLEARY. I do not wonder, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman enters a denial, for it is apparent to all that if my assertion be true, all the clamor that has been raised about the act of 1873 is simply "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." Inasmuch as the correctness or the incorrectness of this assertion is so vital, I propose now to establish beyond peradventure the truthfulness of my statement.

On May 1, 1806, an order was issued by the then President of the United States, Thomas Jefferson, who is reputed to have been something of a Democrat himself, directing the discontinuance of the coinage of silver dollars at the United States mint. During the remainder of his Administration not a single silver dollar was coined. His successor was James Madison, another pretty good type of old-fashioned Democrat. He continued the order in force, and during the eight years of his Administration not a single silver dollar piece was coined at our mint.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow an interruption just there?

Mr. McCLEARY. Let me finish my statement first. My friend from Mississippi is so uniformly courteous, Mr. Chairman, that I shall be perfectly willing to yield to him as soon as I conclude the statement that I have started to make.

The next President was James Monroe, another pretty good type of old-fashioned Democrat. He continued the same policy, and during the eight years of his Administration not a single silver dollar was coined at our Mint.

Mr. SULZER. Madison succeeded Jefferson, not Monroe.

Mr. McCLEARY. The gentleman from New York is behind the times, as usual. I had already passed Madison. [Laughter.]

The next President was John Quincy Adams. During the four years of his Administration we did not coin a solitary silver dollar. Then came Andrew Jackson, another pretty good type of old-fashioned Democrat. During seven of the eight years that he was in the Presidential chair not a solitary silver dollar was coined in the United States Mint.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, during the thirty years from 1805 to 1835, as will be seen by the Report of the Director of the Mint for 1898, page 301, not one solitary silver dollar piece was coined in the United States.

THE REASON FOR JEFFERSON'S ORDER.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, President Jefferson in 1806 ordered the Director of the Mint to discontinue the coinage of the silver dollar piece. Why did he issue that order? Let the order speak for itself, sir. Here it is:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 1, 1806.

SIR: In consequence of a representation from the director of the Bank of the United States that considerable purchases have been made of dollars coined at the Mint for the purpose of exporting them, and as it is probable further purchases and exportations will be made, the President directs that all the silver to be coined at the Mint shall be of small denominations, so that the value of the largest pieces shall not exceed half a dollar.

I am, etc.,

JAMES MADISON.

ROBERT PATTERSON, Esq.,
Director of the Mint.

The text of the order itself, Mr. Chairman, shows that it was issued because the silver dollar pieces made at our mint were being exported and not used for monetary purposes in this country. In other words, the United States mint was being operated, so far as the silver dollars, at least, were concerned, for private profit and not for the usual and proper uses of the people. It will be remembered that the size of the American silver dollar piece was that of the average Spanish milled dollar current in 1791. This implies that a large number of the Spanish dollars were heavier than the American silver dollar. These were taken to the mint by money brokers and converted into American silver dollars at a profit.

These American silver dollars were then carried by traders to the West Indies and elsewhere, where they were accepted as the equivalent of a Spanish dollar. There they were exchanged for the heavier Spanish dollars, which were brought back to the United States, melted, and taken to the United States mint to be converted into American silver dollars, at a profit, and the process was repeated again and again. As Professor Laughlin says:

> This process kept the mint busy without the effect of filling the circulation with our own coins. The mint, therefore, was a useless expense to the nation, but a source of profit to the money brokers.

This process would hardly be advertised by those who were profiting by it. It undoubtedly was in operation for quite a number of years before the authorities became aware of it. It is perfectly safe to say that it covered the five years of the century preceding the issuance of the order.

THE SILVER DOLLARS COINED BETWEEN 1834 AND 1873 WERE NOT COINED FOR USE AS MONEY.

In 1836, Mr. Chairman, just 1,000 silver dollars were coined. In 1837 and 1838 not one was coined. In 1839 just 300 were coined. In all of the years between 1834 and 1873, inclusive, there were coined in the United States mints about six and a half million silver dollars. But, Mr. Chairman, not one of the pieces so coined was coined for the purpose of use as money. They were coined for sale, not for circulation. This will be seen by the fact that much of this coinage was done during the civil war and the years following it, when there was no coin of any kind in circulation.

What is meant by saying that the coinage was done for the purposes of sale and not for the purposes of circulation? After the change in ratio in 1834 the pure silver (371.25 grains) required to make a dollar piece was worth more than $1 in the then recognized standard, gold. During all the period from 1834 to 1873 silver dollars were "at a premium" ranging from 2 to 4 per cent. measured in gold. The men who owned the silver, as was said earlier, would not put a dollar and three cents' worth of silver into the form of a dollar and then pass it out as a hundred cents. Why, then, did they have their silver coined at all? Simply, Mr. Chairman, to secure the Government's certificate of fineness as evidenced by the fact of the coinage, it being generally known that American silver dollars were uniformly nine-tenths pure silver. The coining saved the owner of the silver the expense of securing in another way, through private sources, the certificate of fineness required in order to sell his silver.

Let me illustrate. When a farmer brings a load of wheat to the elevator the first thing to determine is the grade or quality of the wheat. The buyer at the elevator gets up on the load, opens a sack, takes out some of the wheat, looks it over carefully, pinches it between his fingers, tries it between his teeth, and perhaps tests it by weighing a small portion of it. What is all this trouble for? To determine the quality of the wheat. This being determined, he ties up the sack and tells the farmer to drive up on the scales, where the load is weighed. The quality and the quantity of the wheat being determined and the market price being known, the value of the load of wheat is ascertained by a simple arithmetical process.

Similarly, a man who has silver to sell must first of all establish to the satisfaction of the buyer the fineness or quality of the silver. United States silver dollars after 1837 were made nine-tenths pure. So that if a man who had silver to sell could have it converted into the form of silver dollars, he would thereby establish the fineness or quality of his silver to the entire satisfaction of any prospective buyer. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but if the coins were sold before being used as money, not only would the quality of the silver be determined by the coinage, but its weight also. Hence it was important that those having the silver to sell should, after having it converted into the form of silver dollars, sell them at once, without allowing them to be abraded in any way by use.

A SUMMARY.

To summarize, Mr. Chairman, the silver dollars coined in the United States mint during the first five or six years of this century were coined for exportation to the West Indies and elsewhere and not for use as money in this country. During the thirty years up to and including 1835 no silver dollars were coined in the United States mint for any purpose whatsoever. The silver dollars coined from 1834 to 1873 were coined not to be used as money, but to facilitate the sale of the silver. Hence the truth of my original proposition, Mr. Chairman, that there were no silver dollars coined in this century before 1873 for use as money. Probably neither your father nor your grandfather ever saw one except as a curiosity.

Mr. SULZER. And if your policy is continued, my grandchildren will never see one. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCLEARY. Well, perhaps. The gentleman knows best. A good deal depends upon the actions of the proposed grandfather. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman's grandchildren fail, under the policy which we stand for, to see and use American silver dollars, it will not be because there are not American silver dollars in abundance to be seen and used. In 1878 we resumed the coinage of the silver dollar. Since then over 400,000,000 of these dollars have been coined for use as money in this country, and they are in monetary use to-day, either directly as coins or indirectly through silver certificates. And this bill continues them in use, giving to them and to the subsidiary silver the whole field of pocket-money service. But it is to be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the silver to which I am now referring has been coined on Government account and not on private account. And my general statement still holds good that during all of this century there has not been coined on private account one solitary silver dollar for use as money in this country.

Not even the coinage of the trade dollars, under the act of 1873, is an exception to my proposition. Though coined on private account, they were not intended for use as money in this country, being coined for use in our trade with China and other countries of the Orient.

Mr. SIMS. In that connection, is it not a fact that the reason why silver was not coined on private account to be used as money was because the silver bullion that it took to make a silver coin was worth, measured in gold, more than the silver coin when made?

Mr. McCLEARY. "I thank thee, Roderick, for the word." It nails two facts beyond dispute by high Democratic authority. First, the gentleman admits by his question, and the gentleman is too honorable not to admit the truth, that there were no silver dollars coined on private account in this country for use as money. Second, the question implies that, "measured in gold," the silver coins that were made were "at a premium," and hence would not circulate. This, Mr. Chairman, means that gold had become the standard. I answer my friend, sir, that he is exactly correct both in his fact and in his reason for it.

Mr. OTEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly, I will yield to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. OTEY. You say that under the order of Thomas Jefferson there was not a silver dollar coined from 1805 up to what time?

Mr. McCLEARY. The order was continued under succeeding Administrations, and no silver dollars were coined up to and including 1835.

Mr. OTEY. Was it not a fact that every silver piece that was coined was a full legal tender, and that up to 1853 there was as great a coinage of silver as of gold?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In the shape of halves and quarters?

Mr. OTEY. Yes. Did not every fifty-cent piece and every quarter and every dime and half dime have full legal-tender power?

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia has asked two questions. They are questions of fact, not questions of judgment. As questions of historic fact, the answers to which can easily be verified, I will consider them in their order.

First. Was not the total coinage of silver equal in volume to the total coinage of gold up to 1853—or 1873?—I am not quite sure which the gentleman said. To that question the answer is emphatically, No. The gold coinage of the two years 1851 and 1852 alone far exceeded in volume the total silver coinage up to 1853, and even up to and including 1873.

But the gentleman must not attempt to divert attention from the fact that my assertion, made earlier in the course of these remarks, had reference to the silver dollar piece. Of these there were none coined for use as money.

Mr. CARMACK. How many gold dollars were coined?

Mr. McCLEARY. No provision was made for the coinage of the one-dollar gold piece before 1849, and the coinage of the one-dollar gold piece was discontinued by law in 1890.

Mr. CARMACK. Put that beside the statement that no silver dollars were coined.

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly, sir; with pleasure.

But, Mr. Chairman, though no one-dollar gold pieces were coined before 1849 and none have been coined since 1890, the value of the gold in a gold dollar piece was our standard of value long before 1849, as it has been up to and since 1890; and we have never complained that, because of this noncoinage of gold dollars, gold had been "demonetized."

THE STANDARD UNIT NEED NOT ITSELF BE COINED.

The question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] suggests a thought which is pertinent in this connection. As was well stated by my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] in the opening speech on this bill, it is not necessary that the unit of value should be embodied in the form of a coin.

But, on the other hand, Mr. Chairman, it is essential that, if not so expressed, the unit of value shall be embodied in one or more coins which are either divisors or multiples of that unit.

Thus, while from 1805 to 1835 the actual standard of value in this country was that of 371.25 grains of pure silver, the amount prescribed by law for the silver dollar, the silver-dollar piece itself was not coined. But, Mr. Chairman, it must be remembered that the unit of value was embodied in the form of half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes, so that two half dollars or four quarter dollars could be used in making a payment, say $5, as the exact equivalent of the one-dollar piece.

And while the standard of value since 1834 has been that of 25.8 grains of standard gold, this quantity of gold was not put into the form of a dollar coin up to 1849, as has been stated, and the coinage of the one-dollar gold piece was discontinued in 1890. But through all the period since 1834 we have had multiples of the gold dollar of 25.8 grains of standard gold in the form of eagles, half eagles, and quarter eagles. So that if at any time a person desired to make a payment in gold, say of $1,000, he could do so with the coins named.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I take pleasure in yielding now to the gentleman from Mississippi, as I promised to do some time ago. I yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will ask the gentleman, in the face of the country, if he does not think that when he stands here with a full knowledge of the true history of the period of the time of which he speaks, when half dollars and quarters were being coined as full legal tender and full weight at the ratio—is he not quibbling with the country when he comes to the mere question of the dollar pieces coined? Is it not true that you can quibble about gold just the same and say that no dollar in gold was coined because there were only two-and-a-half-dollar, five-dollar, and ten-dollar pieces? During the period of which you speak, is it not true that, although silver was not coined in the shape of silver dollar pieces, it was coined as ultimate, self-redeeming, full legal-tender, full-weight, standard money, in the form of half dollars and quarters?

HOW ABOUT MINOR SILVER COINS?

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield to the gentleman to permit him to inject a speech into my remarks. I yielded for a question. I am a little surprised, too, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Mississippi, who is usually so courteous and straightforward, should have lowered his usual tone in the asking of his question. Men whose own motives are right, Mr. Chairman, rarely impute to others motives not proper. My friend is an attorney. I understand that attorneys sometimes, when they have a bad case, find it convenient to attack opposing counsel. I must assume, Mr. Chairman, that the lowering of my friend's tone from his usual standard is due to the fact that he recognizes that his case is a weak one.

It will be noted, however, that the gentleman admits the truth of my statement that there have not been any silver dollars coined in our mint on private account for use as money.

Now to the gentleman's question. It is practically the same question as that asked by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. OTEY], which I was about to answer when interrupted. Both of these gentlemen, who are rightly eminent in their party, set great store on the fact that silver halves, quarters, etc., were coined and were a full legal tender. Let us see how much real comfort for them this fact contains. They will find that they have been leaning pretty heavily on a broken reed.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that up to 1853 the silver half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes were coined on exactly the same ratio as was provided for the one dollar silver piece. That is, the half dollar contained exactly half the amount of silver contained in the dollar piece, and the quarter, dime, and half dime in like proportion. It is also true, Mr. Chairman, that all of these coins were a full legal tender, if of full weight.

But, Mr. Chairman, up to 1834 few of these coins, and after 1834 practically none of them, were coined for use as money.

Anyone who will examine the report of the Director of the Mint, where it shows year by year from the foundation of our Government the number of gold and silver coins of each kind and denomination issued annually, will notice that from 1805 to 1835, when our mint was closed to the coinage of one-dollar silver pieces, about 90 per cent of the coinage of silver was in the form of half dollars. In some years no other silver coins were made. Why was this? There were two reasons for it.

In the first place, the men who had been using the United States mint for their own private profit, whose plans Jefferson's order had been intended to thwart, got around the order by having their silver coined into half-dollar pieces. The only change that the order actually made in the operations of the money dealers was to cause them a little more trouble in disposing of their half-dollar pieces in the West Indies than they had previously had in disposing of their one-dollar pieces. During these years, then, much (no one knows exactly how much) of the coinage of silver into half dollars was for the purpose of exporting the coins at a profit.

In the second place, the real monetary standard of the country from 1792 to 1834, as I said before, was the silver dollar (the gold coins, measured in it, being at a premium), and it was regarded as desirable and necessary to have a physical embodiment of that standard. The coinage of the silver dollar having been prohibited, the people used two half dollars—which contained the same amount of silver and were full legal tender—as the exact equivalent of and the most convenient substitute for the silver dollar.

After 1834 practically all the silver coins—including the halves and quarters about which our friends have been inquiring so solicitously—being (like the dollar piece) at a premium measured in gold, were coined chiefly for the purpose of sale and not for the purpose of circulation. And even those that were put into circulation were gradually gathered up and sold by weight at a profit. That was exactly what drove Uncle Sam in 1853 to cease depending on having silver coined on private account and to undertake himself the task of supplying the needs of the country for such coins.

Thus we see, Mr. Chairman, how exceedingly little there was for my friend from Mississippi to get excited over. Can it be, sir, that the gentleman did not know the facts which I have just recited? If he knew them, what ground was there for his asking his question as he did? I would be justified, Mr. Chairman, in retorting in kind, but I have no temptation to do so. I do not claim to be any better man than my friend from Mississippi, but, having a better case, I can afford to keep my temper.

WE HAVE HAD THE GOLD STANDARD SINCE 1834.

A good many people, Mr. Chairman, seem to be under the impression that the gold standard is a new thing in this country. The simple economic and historic fact is that the gold dollar of 25.8 grains of standard gold has been the unit for measuring value in this country for more than two generations; that is, since 1834. I was very much surprised to hear my talented friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] attempt to deny this. Of course I appreciate, Mr. Chairman, the importance of such a denial to the opponents of this bill. But I hardly expected a gentleman so well informed as my friend undoubtedly is to be the vehicle of that denial.

What is meant by a standard? It is simply that with which other things are habitually compared and by which they are measured.

In 1792 our fathers provided by law that the standard in this country should be a dollar. This dollar they undertook to embody in two forms, namely, 371.25 grains of pure silver and 24.75 grains of pure gold. As we have seen, people soon ceased to think of the 24.75 grains of gold as the standard, and used as the actual standard of value the 371.25 grains of pure silver. It is uniformly admitted that from 1792 to 1834 gold coins were "at a premium."

"At a premium" measured in what, Mr. Chairman? A thing can not be longer or shorter, heavier or lighter, more or less valuable than itself. When spoken of as being "at a premium," the gold coins could not have been compared with themselves, nor with the gold unit of 24.75 grains of pure gold. They must have been compared with something else. That something else, whatever it might be, was the standard. The gold coins were at a premium as compared with the silver unit of 371.25 grains of pure silver. That is, Mr. Chairman, the silver unit of 371.25 grains of pure silver was the actual standard of value in this country from 1792 to 1834. By it the value of everything, including gold, was measured.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, after 1834, as has been shown both by my historical résumé and by the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], the silver coins were at a premium as measured in gold. That was why, Mr. Chairman, silver retired from circulation. That was why the act of 1853 was necessary.

WHAT WAS SAID IN 1853.

In discussing the coinage act of February 21, 1853, above referred to, when it was pending before the House, Representative Skelton, of New Jersey, said, among other things:

Gold is the only standard of value by which all property is now measured; it is virtually the only currency of the country.—Congressional Globe, Volume XXVI, second session Thirty-second Congress, page 629.

Representative Dunham, of Indiana, who had the measure in charge in the House, speaking on the same point, said:

We intend to do what the best writers on political economy have approved, what experience, where the experiment has been tried, has demonstrated to be best, and what the committee believe to be necessary and proper—to make but one standard of currency and to make all others subservient to it. We mean to make the gold the standard coin.—Congressional Globe, Volume XXVII, page 190.

In another part of the same speech Mr. Dunham said:

Another objection urged against this proposed change is that it gives us a standard of gold only. * * * What advantage is to be obtained by a standard of the two metals, which is not as well, if not much better, attained by a single standard, I am unable to perceive; while there are very great disadvantages resulting from it, as the experience of every nation which has attempted to maintain it has proved. * * * Indeed, it is utterly impossible that you should long at a time maintain a double standard. * * * Gentlemen talk about a double standard of gold and silver as a thing that exists and that we propose to change. We have had but a single standard for the last three or four years. That has been and now is gold. We propose to let it remain so and to adapt silver to it; to regulate it by it.—Congressional Globe, Volume XXVII, page 192.

And, as showing that the intention expressed by Mr. Dunham was actually enacted, we note that section 4 of the act itself contains this provision:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That such coins shall be paid out at the mint, in exchange for gold coins at par, in sums not less than $100.

From the above, Mr. Chairman, it will readily be seen what was regarded as the standard of value in 1853. Mr. Dunham's statement that we had had the gold standard "for the last three or four years" had reference to the period during which—from 1849 on—we had the actual physical embodiment of the standard in the form of the one-dollar gold piece. But, as I have shown, this physical embodiment was not necessary to fix the fact of the gold dollar being the standard. It had then, in fact, been the standard for fifteen years. The coinage of the gold dollar was the recognition of the preexisting fact.

GOLD THE ACTUAL STANDARD EVEN DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

And, Mr. Chairman, even during the civil war and the years following it, when we had only paper currency, gold was the actual measure of value, the actual standard. The paper in circulation did not even pretend to be money. On its very face it was only a promise to pay money. A measure of length must have length, a measure of weight must have weight, and a measure of value must itself have value. That paper currency, having in itself no value, could not be a standard or measure of value. Whenever people wanted to know what this paper currency was worth, what did they ask? They never asked, Mr. Chairman, how much it was worth in silver. No one ever dreamed of such a question. The question always was, How much is the currency worth in gold?

"COIN" BONDS HAVE ALWAYS BEEN GOLD BONDS.

The act of 1853 completely justified the expectations of its advocates by furnishing to the country all the coin, both of gold and of silver, that the business of the country needed. This became so evident that on the fourth anniversary of its passage—on February 21, 1857—an act was passed repealing all acts giving foreign coins legal-tender quality, and providing that foreign coins received at the Treasury should be recoined on the plan provided in the act of 1853.

Thus, at the breaking out of the civil war we had a purely American coinage, gold being the standard and being coined on private account, the only silver coins in use being the subsidiary coins made on Government account, which by the act of 1853, as stated by Mr. Dunham, were adapted in value to and regulated by gold.

When, therefore, on February 25, 1862, an act was passed for the issue of $500,000,000 of 5-20 bonds, the faith of the Government being pledged to pay them, principal and interest, in coin, that word "coin" meant and could mean only gold coin. We had only, as has been shown, gold coin and subsidiary silver. The silver dollar piece was not even a memory. It would be ridiculous to suppose that Congress meant that a lot of subsidiary silver was to be gathered up with which to pay the bonds. It would be worse than ridiculous, for in the act of 1853 providing for these silver coins it was expressly provided that they should be a legal tender only to the extent of $5.

This act of February 25, 1862, also authorized the first issue of the greenback. It is worth while, therefore, to note its exact language on the matter of paying the bonds. It is as follows:

SEC. 5. That all duties on imported goods shall be paid in coin, and the coin so paid shall be set apart as a special fund and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent of the entire debt of the United States to be made within each fiscal year after the 1st day of July, 1862.

The understanding of the officers of the Government charged with the execution of the law is seen in the fact that they collected all duties on imports in gold coin, except sums less than $5, which could be paid in the subsidiary silver.

Speaking on the bill which authorized these bonds, Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, said:

A dollar in a miser's safe, unproductive, is a sore disturbance. Where could they invest it? In United States loans at 6 per cent, redeemable in gold in twenty years—the best and most valuable investment that could be desired. * * * I pity no one who has his money invested in United States bonds, payable in gold in twenty years, with interest semiannually.—Congressional Globe, Volume XLVI, page 668.

It is plain, therefore, that, though "not so nominated in the bond," these bonds were to be paid, principal and interest, in gold coin.

WHAT LINCOLN UNDERSTOOD TO BE THE STANDARD.

In the fall of 1862 the twenty-year bonds issued in 1842 matured. Although they contained no proviso as to the kind of money they were to be paid in, and although at that time we had in our ordinary business "suspended specie payments," the duty of the country was plain, and these bonds were paid in gold. This shows that Abraham Lincoln and his advisers recognized not only that gold was then the standard, but also that it had been the standard back even to 1842.

WHAT PRESIDENT GRANT SAID IN 1869.

In Volume VII of the admirable compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents made by our colleague from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], the distinguished leader on the other side of the House, I find, beginning on page 27, the first annual message of President Grant. It is dated December 6, 1869. On page 29 I find two paragraphs which are interesting in this connection as showing what President Grant, in common with everybody else, then understood by "specie" or "coin." He said:

Among the evils growing out of the rebellion and not yet referred to is that of an irredeemable currency. It is an evil which I hope will receive your most earnest attention. It is a duty and one of the highest duties of government to secure to the citizen a medium of exchange of fixed, unvarying value. This implies a return to a specie basis, and no substitute for it can be devised. It should be commenced now and reached at the earliest practicable moment consistent with a fair regard to the interests of the debtor class. Immediate resumption, if practicable, would not be desirable. It would compel the debtor class to pay beyond their contracts the premium on gold at the date of their purchase, and would bring bankruptcy and ruin to thousands. Fluctuation, however, in the paper value of the measure of all values (gold) is detrimental to the interests of trade. It makes the man of business an involuntary gambler, for in all sales where future payment is to be made both parties speculate as to what will be the value of the currency to be paid and received. I earnestly recommend to you, then, such legislation as will insure a gradual return to specie payments and put an immediate stop to fluctuations in the value of currency.

The methods to secure the former of these results are as numerous as are the speculators on political economy. To secure the latter I see but one way, and that is to authorize the Treasury to redeem its own paper, at a fixed price, whenever presented, and to withhold from circulation all currency so redeemed until sold again for gold.

WHAT WAS UNDERSTOOD IN 1869 TO 1873.

When in latter part of 1869 the first draft of what afterwards became the much-discussed act of 1873 was sent by Comptroller of the Currency Knox to the Director of the Mint, Dr. Linderman, it contained provision for the coinage of a silver dollar of 384 grains, which was exactly the weight of two of the half dollars, and like them it was to be coined on Government account and to have a legal-tender power of $5.

Commenting on this feature of the proposed measure, Dr. Linderman, said:

Section 11 reduces the weight of the silver dollar from 412½ to 384 grains. I can see no good reason for the proposed reduction in the weight of this coin. It would be better, in my opinion, to discontinue its issue altogether. The gold dollar is really the legal unit and measure of value. Having a higher value as bullion than its nominal value, the silver dollar long ago ceased to be a coin of circulation, and, being of no practical use whatever, its issue should be discontinued.

At that same time Mr. J. Ross Snowden, superintendent of the mint at Philadelphia, in discussing the same point, said:

It is quite true that the silver dollar, being more valuable than two half dollars or four quarter dollars, will not be used as a circulating medium, but only for cabinets, and perhaps to supply some occasional or local demand; yet I think there is no necessity for so considerable a piece as the dollar to be struck from the metal which is only worth 94 cents.

On January 9, 1872, in discussing the mintage act then pending, and of which he had charge, Representative Hooper said on this floor:

The silver dollar of 412½ grains, by reason of its bullion or intrinsic value being greater than its nominal value, long since ceased to be a coin of circulation, and is melted by manufacturers of silverware. It does not circulate now in commercial transactions with any country, and the convenience of these manufacturers in this respect can better be met by supplying small stamped bars of the same standard, avoiding the useless expense of coining the dollar for that purpose.

And on the same day, in discussing the same bill, Representative Kelley, of Pennsylvania, said:

Every coin that is not gold is subsidiary. I repeat it, sir. Every coin that is not gold is subsidiary.

We may note, further, that the "reserve" which was accumulated for the resumption of "specie" payments in 1879 was a gold reserve, and that has been its character ever since.

It would seem unnecessary, Mr. Chairman, to produce further evidence, though it could easily be greatly multiplied, to show that through all the years since 1834 "coin" and "specie" have both meant gold.

The money received for the outstanding obligations of the Government was gold coin of the present standard weight and fineness, or its equivalent, and in simple honesty we should make payment in the same kind of money. This is the expressed purpose of the pending measure.

WHY THE GOLD STANDARD IS REAFFIRMED.

Section 1 of the bill provides that "the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle." Section 2 provides that all obligations of the Government for the payment of money, now existing or hereafter to be entered into, shall be payable in gold coin of the United States as defined in section 1.

In view of the fact that ever since 1834, as we have seen, our actual standard of value has been 25.8 grains of standard gold "nine-tenths fine," the question may be asked why the declarations in sections 1 and 2 are made. Our answer is that the declarations are made with the view of putting beyond cavil or question the integrity of the nation's purpose.

But, since the nation has always dealt honorably with its creditors, why should any declaration of honorable purpose now be necessary? The declaration is deemed to be necessary by reason of the fact that a large number of our citizens, including members of both Houses of Congress, seem to believe that it would be honorable to resume the coinage of silver dollars on private account and with the dollars thus made pay the outstanding obligations of the Government.

About four years ago a resolution to that effect, known as the Teller resolution, received a large number of votes in both Houses; and undoubtedly most of those votes were cast by men who sincerely believed that in so voting they were doing right. Many of those men are both able and honorable. They feel that it should be contended for in the future. It is worth while, therefore, for us to examine candidly the argument by which they justify their action to themselves and to the world.

THE ARGUMENT FOR THE TELLER RESOLUTION.

I shall endeavor to state fully and fairly, though briefly, the argument of those who believe that the action proposed in the Teller resolution would have been honorable then and would be just and honorable now. They say that—

1. Practically all of the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the Government have been issued under the authority of the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, known as the refunding act.

2. The language of that act is that the obligations therein authorized are "redeemable in coin of the present standard value."

3. At the time of the passage of the refunding act the one-dollar silver piece could still lawfully be coined on private account.

4. Therefore, they say, it would be in accordance with the law under which these obligations have been issued, and therefore right and honorable, to resume the coinage of silver dollars on private account and with the dollars thus coined pay these obligations.

5. The correctness of this conclusion, they say, is shown by the fact that when, in February, 1895, President Cleveland recommended the issuance of bonds payable specifically in gold coin, whereby there would be a saving in interest, the proposition was defeated in the House by a vote of 167 to 120.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that practically all of the interest-bearing obligations of the Government now outstanding, even those issued in 1895, were issued under authority granted by the refunding act of 1870. It is true that the obligations authorized by that act were by its terms "redeemable in coin of the present standard value." It is true that at the time of the passage of the refunding act the mints of the United States could still be used for the coinage of silver dollars on private account. It is also true that in 1895 this House voted down a proposition to authorize the issuance of United States bonds specifically payable in gold coin.

The truth of the allegations in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 5 above being admitted, the argument of our friends on the other side would seem on casual examination to be unanswerable and their conclusion, as expressed in paragraph 4, to be correct. It is right here, sir, in the apparent conclusiveness of their argument and the seeming righteousness of their conclusion, that the necessity for and the justification of our proposed action lies. If their argument were less likely to mislead, the necessity for our action would be less great. It is little wonder, sir, that an argument seemingly so well grounded in fact should have misled men who are both able and honest. Herein is the necessity for stating the real truth and putting the duty and purpose of the country beyond all possibility of question; so that at any time in the future, unless a change should be made in the law itself, no matter what party may control the executive department, the good name of the Government may be preserved.

THE FALLACY OF THE TELLER ARGUMENT.

The fundamental trouble with our friends and their argument is that they do not distinguish between form and fact. As a matter of legal form, silver dollars might, in 1870, have been coined on private account for use as money; but, as a matter of actual fact, they had not been so coined for nearly three-quarters of a century. As we have seen, the silver dollar had long since ceased to be even a memory. When men spoke of "coin," they did not at that time think of the silver dollar.

In order to find authority for the coinage of the silver dollar on private account, our friends must hark back to the original coinage act under the Constitution, approved April 2, 1792. Here is an extract from an act almost as old, one approved May 8, 1792:

Every able-bodied citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is of the age of 18 years and under the age of 45 years, shall be enrolled in the militia.

Every citizen shall, after notice of his enrollment, be constantly provided with a good musket or firelock, of a bore sufficient for balls of the eighteenth part of a pound, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints and a knapsack, a pouch with a box therein to contain not less than 24 cartridges, suited to the bore of his musket or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball.

It would be interesting, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, to know how many of us have, at any time in our lives, complied with the plain provision of law requiring us to be "constantly provided with a good musket or firelock, * * * two flints," etc. If arraigned for disobedience to the law, probably nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of our citizens, no matter how well informed they may be as to things in general, would unhesitatingly and somewhat resentfully say, "Why that law was repealed long, long ago, and I am justified in not heeding it. As a matter of fact, I never heard of it before." And yet, Mr. Chairman, it has never been repealed and is to-day one of the laws of the United States, as any one can see by consulting the Revised Statutes of the United States, sections 1625 and part of 1628 of which I have just read you.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what would anyone think of the justice of our Government if it should undertake to enforce that law now and punish anyone for disobedience to it? Though every one of us has failed to comply with the provision of law referred to, every one of us is morally and legally absolved from wrongdoing by reason of the fact that long before we were born that part of the law had fallen into "innocuous desuetude." When enacted it met, as understood by Congress, a public need. It then possessed real vitality. But in process of time and the progress of events we outgrew it; and, although it was never formally repealed, it passed from the memory of men and ceased to have vitality or legal force.

The only provision of law ever enacted in this country authorizing the coinage of the silver dollar on private account was that contained in the mintage act of April 2, 1792. At the time of its enactment that provision met what Congress understood to be a public need. But, like the provision of the militia act above referred to, in the process of time and the progress of events, as detailed fully earlier in my remarks, it fell completely into disuse.

In 1870 the act of 1792 authorizing the coinage of the silver dollar on private account for use as money had no more vitality than had that other act of 1792 which required every citizen of a certain age to be constantly provided with a firelock and two flints. When the refunding act of 1870 was passed there had not been for more than two generations, as we have seen, any silver dollars coined on private account for use as money. Men then old had never used nor seen used an American silver dollar. Although the silver-dollar provision of the act of April 2, 1792, had not been formally repealed, it had long since ceased to serve its purpose, and had fallen out of the memory of practically all men, except the few who, in the language of the petition above given, were "engaged in buying or melting silver coin."

It is right and proper, morally and legally, that the refunding act of 1870, like any other law, should be construed in accordance with the evident intention of those who enacted it. And it is beyond a peradventure that when the word "coin" was used in that act it was not the intention of Congress to include therein the silver dollar piece. Hence there is no ground for the contention that it would now be just and honorable to resume the coinage of the silver dollar on private account and with the dollars thus coined pay the outstanding interest-bearing obligations of the Government.

On the other hand, it is expressly declared in the refunding act of 1870 that all the obligations of the Government issued under its authority should be "redeemable in coin of the present standard value."

What was the coin then recognized as "of standard value?" When talking without this special point in mind our friends on the other side do not even claim that the silver dollar was then at par or that it was the standard. Over and over again we have heard them claim that at that time every silver dollar then in existence was worth 103 cents, that the silver dollar was "at a premium" of 3 cents. At a premium measured in what, Mr. Chairman? When we have answered that question, we have determined what was the real standard of value at that time.

There is only one answer, Mr. Chairman. No one contends that there can be any other. The answer is that the silver dollar was at a premium as measured by the gold dollar of 25.8 grains of standard gold.

Thus by their own testimony, Mr. Chairman, do we establish the fact that in 1870, when the refunding act was passed, the "coin of present standard value" was gold coin made at the rate of 25.8 grains of standard gold or 23.22 grains of pure gold to the dollar. It is in that coin or its equivalent, sir, that we are bound both morally and legally to pay the outstanding obligations of the Government.

That coin or its equivalent, Mr. Chairman. For, as a matter of fact, any and all kinds of money now in circulation in the United States may be used and are used in making these payments, because under our present system all of our money is kept at a parity with the gold coin above described. And the meaning of the bill now pending is that all of the obligations of the Government shall be paid, in the future as in the past, in gold coin or its equivalent, in that which was in 1870 understood by all men to be "coin of the present standard value." [Applause on the Republican side.]

As to the defeat in 1895 of the proposition to authorize the issue of bonds specifically payable in gold coin, it is sufficient to say that nearly all of those on our side of the House who voted against the proposition did so because, holding that all our bonds are payable in gold coin or its equivalent, it did not seem wise to do anything which might be construed as permitting a question to be raised as to the character of payment due on the other obligations then outstanding.

"THE LAST BATTLE."

After the campaign of 1896, Mr. Chairman, the gifted leader of the "free silver" forces, a gentleman for whom I have only kind personal regard, published or furnished the material for a book entitled "The First Battle." In all human probability, sir, he will again be the standard bearer of his party. With him as the leader the platform will be of little consequence. He is his own platform. Under his leadership "free silver" can hardly fail to be a prominent issue, however much his counselors may endeavor to keep it in the background, for with that issue his name and fame are inextricably associated.

It is always risky, sir, to enter the field of prophecy. But I venture the prediction now that next winter the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska will not be burdened with public duties or responsibilities. He will have an abundance of time at his disposal and an abundance of materials in his possession for another book, an appropriate title for which would be "The Last Battle." For, sir, history shows that a nation having so far advanced in civilization as to adopt definitely the gold standard never abandons it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

After another and even more crushing defeat on the question of the standard, in the battle between honesty and dishonesty—for, sir, that after all is the real issue involved—it would not surprise me if our Democratic brethren would take time enough to think the matter over. On recovering from their hysteria they may upon reflection recall the fact that the gold standard, which we are now defending, was given to the country in 1834 by the Democratic party under the leadership of a man who had no sympathy with either dishonesty or disorder—Andrew Jackson. They may, on further reading of their country's history, discover that when the coinage act of 1853 was passed, whereby this country adopted the policy of coining silver on Government account, the Democratic party was in control of both Houses of Congress, and that impartial history credits to the Democratic party the solution of the problem of getting gold and silver to circulate side by side in the channels of trade. What the Democratic party most needs at this time, sir, is an increase in proper party pride to guide it out of the Populistic slough into which it has been led.

THE PRESENT NATIONAL-BANK SYSTEM NOT AN IDEAL ONE.

Turning now to the banking feature of the bill, I regret that the short time remaining at my disposal will not allow me to do more than touch upon a few fundamental principles. I shall not in this part of my remarks, as I did not in those thus far made, attempt to discuss the details of the bill. That field was most admirably covered by my friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

I do not, Mr. Chairman, regard our present national-bank system as an ideally good one. My reasons for thinking so were given in my report on H. R. 10289 in the last Congress and need not be repeated in extenso here. We expect as a nation to pay our outstanding obligations. With the disappearance of our bonded indebtedness, if not sooner, will come the necessity for a complete revision of our banking system. I believe that a better one can be devised. But the present system has certain transcendent merits which must not be lost sight of or allowed to lapse. It is advisable on many accounts that the transition to a better system shall be a gradual one, taking its beginning in what we have. I believe that in the interest of the people our system of bank-note issues should be carefully and prudently liberalized. Because this bill moves in that direction, even though very slightly, I am in favor of it.

Though I do not regard the present banking system as an ideal one, as I have said, I can not forbear defending it from one charge that has been and probably will again be brought against it. Though apparently unimportant this charge has really had much influence on the mind of people unfamiliar with the subject.

THE NOTE-ISSUE IS NOT A LOAN BY THE GOVERNMENT TO THE BANKS.

Some years ago, Mr. Chairman, an old friend of mine said to me: "I am against the national-bank system because it provides a way whereby the banks can make a profit of 900 per cent a year at the expense of the Government." Wondering at his statement, but knowing that he had some reason that was satisfactory to himself at least for making it, I asked him to explain. In answer he said: "The Government lends money to the banks by giving them notes to circulate as money. On this money the Government charges a tax or interest of 1 per cent per annum. The banks lend these notes, getting for their use 10 per cent per annum. So for what costs them $1 they get $10, and that you know is a profit of 900 per cent."

I had supposed, sir, that such notions were buried years ago with the old subtreasury scheme of the Populists. But from statements recently heard on this floor I judge that even some members of Congress still entertain notions akin to those of my old friend. Inasmuch as the national banking system will be under discussion somewhat in the coming campaign, it may not be amiss, as above stated, to correct what appears to be a misapprehension. A plain statement of the truth can do no harm, and may do good.

If one of us should go to a printing office and get a bunch of blank promissory notes to be filled out, signed, and used whenever we wish to buy a horse or other piece of property, which we can not then pay for, would it ever occur to us to say that the printer had given or loaned us money? Hardly. No more than if we wrote the note on a piece of blank paper purchased from him. The note issued is our note. It is to be paid at maturity, not by the printer, but by us.

Would it alter the case any if there were only one printer who could print blank notes and he required every person getting blank notes from him to leave with him sufficient property to guarantee that the notes would be paid when due? No; because the printer would then become simply the trustee or custodian of the property furnished by us to secure our own notes. But under such circumstances the printer would probably print on the face of the note a statement to the effect that it was secured by property held by him; and then to protect his own good name he would find it necessary to print on each note the amount promised by it, so that the people to whom the note blanks might be issued could be prevented from filling them in with amounts greater than the property held in trust for their payment would justify.

The Government is the printer of the blank notes for the national banks. The promise to pay is the promise of the bank, not the promise of the Government. The bank, not the Government, must furnish the means of payment. The Government is also the custodian of the property of the bank, which is held in trust for payment in case the bank should fail to pay out of its other money or property. What the Government hands out to the bank is simply the blank note of the bank—the bank's promise to pay—which, on being signed by the proper officers of the bank, becomes the obligation of the bank.

It is apparent, therefore, that the note issue is not in any sense a loan by the Government to the banks.

WHY THE GOVERNMENT PRINTS THE NATIONAL-BANK NOTES.

But why does the Government do the engraving and printing of the notes of the bank? And who pays the expense of such engraving and printing?

The answer takes us back to the origin of national banks. In the midst of the civil war the credit of the Government had sunk so low that it became necessary to take extraordinary steps to increase its credit and create a market for its bonds. With this object in view an act was passed that banks issuing circulating notes should be taxed at the rate of 10 per cent per annum of the face of such notes. But provision was made that circulating notes might be issued with a tax of 1 per cent if the issuing bank would comply with certain conditions, the most important of which, in connection with our present inquiry, was that each bank desiring to issue notes should buy Government bonds and deposit them with the Treasurer of the United States as security for the payment of the notes issued. Upon the deposit of bonds, as aforesaid, the bank was authorized to issue notes not to exceed in amount 90 per cent of the face value of the bonds deposited. With this brief and incomplete statement before us, we are in position to answer the questions proposed above.

Why does the Government engrave and print the national-bank notes? There are at least three good reasons for that course:

1. Under our system of bond-secured notes it is necessary for the Government to have charge of the engraving and printing of the notes in order to control the volume of their issue. On the face of each national-bank note is the statement that it is secured by the deposit of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States. If the Government could not control the volume of notes issued by each bank it would be possible for the banks to issue more notes than the deposit of bonds would justify. The first and great reason, then, why the Government engraves and prints the national-bank notes is to be sure to keep the issue of each bank within the bounds prescribed by law.

2. An incidental gain in having the notes all printed at one place is that thereby is secured to all the notes uniformity of appearance. Instead of having to become acquainted with a thousand different forms of such currency, people have to learn to recognize only one.

3. Another incidental gain in having the Government do the engraving and printing of the notes is that in that way we secure always the very best of engraving, and thereby the danger of counterfeiting is reduced to a minimum.

All the expense of engraving and printing is paid for by the banks, respectively, each paying the expense connected with the issue of its own notes.

As to the alleged profit in issuing national-bank notes, it will suffice here to say that after buying its bonds at a premium and paying the expenses incident to the note issue the national banks find little or no profit in the note issue. Their principal profit in organizing as national banks comes from the fact that the very title "national bank" gives them a certain prestige in the community, whereby they increase their business.

THE ISSUE OF PAPER CURRENCY IS NOT A GOVERNMENT FUNCTION.

Many good and honest people sincerely believe that the issue of paper currency is a Government function. Indeed, my talented friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], for whom I have great admiration, surprised me the other day by saying in his speech that he entertained that opinion. I am sorry that my friend is not here this afternoon, for I would like to ask him a question. But perhaps some other strong man on that side of the House will answer it.

The question is this: If it is the function and duty of the Government to issue the paper currency, why, during all the years before the civil war, when the Democratic party for so long controlled the Government—why, I say, was no Government paper currency then issued? And if it be good Democratic doctrine that the Government should issue the paper currency, why did the Democratic party oppose the issue of the greenbacks? Are the utterances which we hear, Mr. Chairman, to be taken as further evidence that the Democratic party of to-day is denying the faith of the fathers of the party?

A distinguished son of Connecticut, Mr. Jacob L. Greene, in an address before the Hartford Board of Trade on November 23, 1897, put this matter so admirably that I can not forbear quoting a part of his address. Mr. Greene said:

CREDIT CURRENCY BUT AN INSTRUMENT OF TRADE.

No statement can be more apparently trite and unnecessary than this: That the distinguishing characteristic of a paper currency, because its only source of value, is that it is a credit currency; that it is not money in any accurate sense, for it is not the substance of value—that is, property itself; that it simply represents either the metal money it promises or some other actual property substance of a value expressed in terms of that money, which money or value have not yet passed to the possession of the credit holder, but are promised him thereby; that it is but a title deed to property purchased, but yet to be delivered; that its value as currency depends entirely on the existence of and its control over the money or other property the right to which it conveys. But this simple, but oft forgotten, distinguishing fact bears directly on and determines three points, viz: (a) Who should utter such a credit—that is, who should be a borrower, emitting a currency evidencing his debt and promising its payment to bearer at sight, expecting it to be commonly and unhesitatingly received? (b) Where is the property, whence derived, and by whom held which is to liquidate the promise? (c) How is that property secured to the performance of the promise?

Another fundamental fact with a like definitive and limited bearing is this: Money and those other forms of currency which are not money themselves, but which promise it, are but the instruments of trade, have no use or existence apart from it, are developed out of, and in their nature and incidents are properly determined by, the exigencies and convenience of trade, which is the exchange of properties by their owners for mutual advantage, one property for another property, either of which may be actual money, or some other form of property substance or of service, measured in quantity by its value in such money. Money is useful and valuable only as it is or can be employed in trade and commerce. The credit currency is truthful and useful only as it has behind it the actual money or other property convertible into money, which it professes to promise or to represent, ready to be produced as properly demanded.

A third equally trite but fundamental and determining fact is this: Government is the organized instrument of a people in their political capacity only, and for the accomplishment of political purposes. Trade is not a political act or matter. The properties in exchanges are not owned by political bodies, but by private persons; they are not exchanged by governments, but by the citizens of governments; and the ownership and exchange of properties, whether material substances or valuable services, by the citizens of a government are not by virtue of their political relationship nor in their capacity as citizens, whether under one political form or another, but by virtue of the purely natural, economic, mutual relations of persons, each of whom has something the others need and needs something the others have. Every relation of trade, of need and supply, of production and consumption, of possession and want, as well as as every incident of the complex machinery whereby each most effectively answers the call or meets the offer of the other, is purely personal, individual, and nonpolitical; personal, individual, and nonpolitical in the need; personal, individual, and nonpolitical in the possession and exercise of the talent and faculty which can make response.

GOVERNMENT UNFITTED TO ISSUE CREDIT CURRENCY.

Two main propositions grow inevitably out of these facts as they bear upon the matter of a credit currency—the one by necessary exclusion, the other by necessary inference and as the only alternative:

First. The government, not being in trade, being neither buyer nor seller, producing and owning none of the properties which enter into trade, and having no property or resources whatever, except such as it takes from its citizens through taxation for its expenses of administration of whatever character, has no natural relation to the creation of a credit currency except to provide proper and effective legal remedies to safeguard it, and is not the proper party to issue it. Such an act is wholly foreign to its political functions of which commercial operations are no part in theory or fact. Moreover, government can not issue a credit currency and get it in circulation except by borrowing the amount for which the issue is made, nor can it make such a borrowing for such a purpose anything other than a forced loan unless it pays interest on its currency issues and sells it for what it will bring on its interest basis. It has no property with which to redeem, and only by taxation of its citizens can pay its debt to them, which act would extinguish the currency itself.

Manifestly, a government can not be an issuer of a legitimate and permanent credit currency. It can, by coinage, certify the quantity and quality of the money metals brought to it for that purpose by its citizens, and provide the proper remedies and machinery for the enforcement of the many commercial contracts made by them. These are its proper political acts respecting the commerce and business of its citizens. But it has no other natural or permanent relations with trade, the properties involved in and constituting which are the foundation and only source of all true credits—that is, of credits with existing property behind them for their solvency. For property precedes and creates credit. Credit which precedes property is speculation.

It is a common assertion that a currency issued by government or one founded upon other debts of the government has the whole wealth of the nation behind it for its solvency—a promise to the ear which has been broken to the hope through all history. A government currency, no matter what its name or form, has behind it only that margin of the wealth of the country which can be extorted by taxation for the purpose of currency redemption. The question of the solvency of a currency in anywise representing a government debt is the question of how much taxation the people will stand in order to pay the debt. Our own colonial and Revolutionary history alone has been full of answers upon that question, fatal to the truth of the theory. The wealth of the country is actually available for such a purpose in only a very small part.

THE MAKING OF NOTES IS A PERSONAL RIGHT.

If a farmer needs a team of horses to put in his crop but has not at the time the means to pay for the team, and if a neighbor has a team which fills the bill and which he is willing to let the farmer have on his written promise to pay at a specified time in the future, whose permission would you deem it necessary for the farmer to ask before giving his note and closing the deal? Does anyone believe that the permission of any public officer should first be secured? Does anyone need to be told that the right to issue that note is an inherent personal right of the farmer?

Suppose that three or four farmers conclude that they would like to buy and operate a threshing machine, but have not the means at hand to pay for one. Suppose that the threshing machine company is willing to let the men have the machine, to be paid for later, taking in the meantime their written promise to pay. Whose consent should those men be required to get before giving their joint note? Is there anything necessary except that they give the note voluntarily and that with equal freedom of choice the machine company accepts it?

Take the case of a cooperative creamery company which needs a new piece of machinery which it can not at the time pay for. Suppose that a company which manufactures such machinery is willing to let the creamery company have the machine, taking its note, properly signed by the officers of the company, whose business is it? Whose consent is needed other than that of the creamery company and that of the machinery company?

Suppose that the farmer who in the first illustration sold the team, taking the farmer's note, wishes to buy a flock of sheep from a third party and that third party is willing to accept in payment the note of the farmer given for the horses. Whose permission should be asked before the trade is made? Is it not evident that the note could be passed on from one person to another as a means of effecting exchanges, the condition being that each party to each transaction proffered or accepted the note of his own free will?

Would it alter the case any if the note were one payable on demand instead of at a future time? Certainly not. Would it alter the conclusion if the note were issued by several people jointly and payable on demand? Most assuredly not. Would it invalidate our conclusion as to the inherent right of note issue if the note were made payable on demand and were issued by a company, say by a creamery company? Certainly not. Would it be considered a detriment to the note or an objection to its issue if the company issuing it kept itself at all times ready to pay on demand, as promised? Hardly. But the only kind of a company which, in the nature of things, can keep itself at all times ready to meet its demand obligations is a bank. Therefore what?

It will be found upon examination, sir, that legislation in relation to banks does not confer privileges, but restricts natural rights.

THE EFFICIENCY OF BANK CURRENCY.

Bank checks and drafts and bank notes constitute by far the most important part of our currency. For example, on January 1, 1898, the total volume of our currency was as follows:

Gold coin and certificates	$584,126,049
Silver coin and certificates	503,906,973
Government demand notes	409,239,863
Total Government currency	1,497,272,885
National-bank notes	223,827,755
Deposits subject to check	3,210,705,758
Total bank currency	3,434,533,513

In the above table the "deposits subject to check" are those in national, State, and private banks. This does not include deposits in savings banks or other deposits not subject to check.

The volume of bank currency, therefore, is more than double that of government currency. Moreover, it does an immensely larger proportion of the actual work of commerce. The last investigation of the Comptroller of the Currency to determine the relative usefulness of our various forms of money and currency, made July 1, 1896, showed that of every $100 of business transacted through the banks the several forms were used in the following proportions: Gold, 60 cents; silver, 50 cents; greenbacks, silver certificates, Treasury notes, and national-bank notes, $6.30; bank checks, drafts, etc., $92.50. The clearing-house returns of the country show that the bank checks and drafts constitute a currency which annually performs exchanges of property to the amount of over $50,000,000,000; and a great many checks, estimated at $20,000,000,000, are used as currency every year which do not go through the clearing houses.

WHY THERE ARE LIMITATIONS ON BANK-NOTE ISSUES.

No one would think of objecting to a bank's receiving deposits payable on demand on presentation of checks. But the bank note is simply a demand obligation of the bank, essentially like the check. Why, then, should the public interfere with the issue of bank notes? Why should the Government limit the right of the bank to issue its demand obligations in the form of notes, which for some of its customers may be a more serviceable form than the check? The purpose is not primarily to protect the holder of the note from loss, because he accepts the note voluntarily, and has his legal remedy as when he takes any other note. The bank note has no legal-tender quality as between individuals, and of course should have none. No note should be of compulsory acceptance. No one should be compelled to accept a promise, no matter by whom made, as the fulfilment of an obligatton.

Until well along in this century the issuing of notes was regarded, and is still in certain sense regarded, as inherent in the nature of a bank. The reason for the regulation of bank-note issues was exceptionally well expressed by former Secretary of the Treasury Hon. Charles S. Fairchild in his statement before the Committee on Banking and Currency in January, 1898. He said:

I conceive that the way Government gets its right to interfere as to these demand obligations is this: They were found to be a most useful instrument in transferring property and services from man to man. To attain their highest usefulness, however, it was necessary that they should have great rapidity of movement, and in order to attain that rapidity of movement the receiver of them must be saved the necessity of looking to the credit of the issuing party, whoever he might be.

Therefore Government properly came in and devised a system by which they shall be issued and then certifies that they are issued under that system. So that a man who takes a note, if he knows how good the system is, can know how good the note is, and he does not have to stop to look further. He has to know one large thing instead of a vast number of smaller things.

Now, that is the same service exactly that the Government performs when it coins pieces of bullion. In the case of silver another service is performed, because with the silver dollars the Government has put a certain degree of promise behind them; but take a piece of gold—and it would be the same way with silver if we had the free coinage of silver with no Government credit behind it—and what the Government does in that instance is simply to take the piece of bullion from the owner of it and put it in a certain form and certify that it is such a quantity and of such a quality. The Government does not contribute any capital; it does not put anything into the bullion transaction; it does not confer much benefit upon the owner of the bullion, because he could put the weight and the quality on it if the Government did not do that, but it does confer a very great benefit upon the people who want to use that bullion for the transfer of their property and services, in that it saves them the trouble of assaying and weighing.

The Government does the same thing with a bank note. It does not put any capital into it. It does not give it any credit, except that it provides a system and certifies that it is issued under that system. The Government performs a great service in that way, of course, to the people who want to use bank notes, and in both cases it performs a great service to the whole community in that it diminishes the amount of bullion and the number of bank notes necessary to carry on the transactions of the community, because it gives them both greater rapidity of movement and causes less of them to be required for the same volume of transactions.

If that is a true statement of the Government's functions in regard to bank notes, it has always seemed to me we should approach the subject with the fact in view that the duty of Government is not to repress these things, but to go on in the direction of the principle, the philosophy, which has given it its right to interfere at all, and simply provide for the greatest facility of movement, that being dependent on the goodness of the system that it devised, and, having done that, leave the people to take care of themselves.

Mr. CLAYTON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in view of what the gentleman from Minnesota has said, I would like to ask him if he would favor a return to the issue of State-bank notes?

Mr. McCLEARY. My dear friend, the memory of years gone by admonishes me that there is a place where the police power of the Government had better be exercised. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Many years ago a man running a steamboat down the Missouri River found that he was almost out of wood. He kept watching the shore line to find some. You know the Missouri River is not prolific of wood piles throughout its whole length. He finally came to a clump of trees, and right on the bank was a pile of wood. He said, "Ahoy there!" No answer. Again he said, "Ahoy there!" Pretty soon a man came out and said, "Well, what do you want?" "Is that wood for sale?" "Yes; what do you think I piled it up here for? Just for fun?" "Will you take State-bank notes for it?" "Why, certainly." "How?" "Even up, cord for cord!" [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] That, sir, indicates what my answer to the gentleman's question might be.

Seriously, however, Mr. Chairman, the odium attached to many of the State-bank systems does not apply to all. The systems of Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Indiana, and Louisiana were all safe and performed an exceedingly valuable service. They are well worthy of our study to-day.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. McCLEARY. Certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. Would it not, in your opinion, be better to redeem the greenbacks and destroy them utterly than to treat them as you people are treating them in this bill?

Mr. McCLEARY. As the gentleman says, this bill does not in any way point to the retirement of the greenbacks. It simply makes provision against what has come to be known as "the endless chain."

On my own responsibility as a man and as a Representative, and disclaiming any right or purpose to speak for anyone else, I am perfectly willing to say to the gentleman, since he asks my opinion, that in my judgment it would be the wise thing for the Government to keep its promise, gradually and prudently pay the greenbacks, put them into the fire and burn them up, or otherwise retire them from circulation, just as you or I would do with our promissory notes. [Applause on the Republican side.] This view I have expressed to my constituents on numerous occasions; and while some of them honestly differ with me on this point, they expect me to speak the truth and express my convictions here or elsewhere.

It is to be understood, sir, that what I have just said is said on my personal responsibility. I do not presume to speak for anyone else.

Mr. HILL. Count me in.

Mr. RIDGELY. I hope that the Official Reporter will note the applause on the Republican side of the House in response to the proposition to burn the greenbacks.

Mr. McCLEARY. The proposition to retire the greenbacks should be met with approval by Democrats, for in the national Democratic platform of 1876 there is a plank "denouncing" the "failure, for all these eleven years of peace, to make good the promise of the legal-tender notes, * * * the nonpayment of which is a disregard of the plighted faith of the nation."

Mr. CARMACK. I understand the gentleman to say that he thinks that will eventually be done.

Mr. McCLEARY. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, sir. I am merely saying what I should like to see done, because I believe in my heart of hearts that it is the wise thing for the people of the United States to do.

WHY THE GREENBACKS SHOULD BE RETIRED.

And now, Mr. Chairman, since the subject has come up, let me give one or two of my reasons for thinking that the greenbacks should be retired. This will divert a little from the course of my remarks, but the diversion may not be amiss.

Mr. HILL. It is a good diversion.

Mr. McCLEARY. My time has almost expired, and I must be very brief. Moreover, I discussed the subject at length in House Report No. 1575, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.

In the first place, they should be retired because national honor demands it. When these notes were issued, the action was justified only by the necessities of the nation. Their issue was believed to be necessary to the carrying on of the war for the preservation of the Union. But it was expressly stated and understood that as soon as possible after the necessity had been met they should be paid and, of course, canceled and retired.

And no sentiment of gratitude can here weigh in the minds of those who believe that "the greenbacks saved the Union;" for even if that were granted, which it is not, the sentiment could only apply to those particular notes which were in circulation during the war, and they were all canceled and destroyed long ago. Those now in use had nothing to do with the war. Their continued use must be defended as part of a system if it can be defended at all.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ALLEN of Maine). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McCLEARY. I should like about ten minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will get the extension of time. You could not give it to a gentleman who would handle the subject better on your side.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have ten minutes more.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suppose that is to be charged to your side?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Charged to this side.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLEARY. I thank the committee for its courtesy, and shall try not to trespass on its patience.

As I was about to say when the Chairman very properly interrupted me, I shall not attempt to discuss the matter in all its phases or try to present all of the many reasons for the retirement of the greenbacks.

One great reason for retiring them—one that has not, so far as I know, been clearly brought out—is that, being a credit instrument in form and partly in substance, they yet fail to perform and stand in the way of the performance of the chief function of a credit instrument, namely, to effect a reduction of interest rates. It must not be forgotten, Mr. Chairman, that there are borrowers as well as lenders in this country. A proper system of credit instruments and agencies helps to lower interest rates. Let me illustrate.

CREDIT CAN BE LOANED CHEAPER THAN CASH.

The corner stone of my argument on this point is the proposition that credit can be loaned cheaper than cash.

Suppose that I own a farm with a nice meadow and a good stream of water. It is a fine farm for fattening cattle, but I have few to feed. A short distance away lives a man who has bought a lot of cattle only to find that he lacks the faculty and his farm the facilities for handling cattle successfully. He offers his cattle for sale. I come to you and lay before you this proposition: "I can buy the drove for $500. Having plenty of pasturage, I can fatten the cattle in a few months and turn them off at a profit. I ask you to lend me the $500."

You inquire why the man owning the cattle wishes to sell them and I tell you that he owes the $500 to Mr. Blank. You say, "I know Mr. Blank. He does not need the money. He has simply become afraid to trust the other man. He and I have done business together for years. I will tell you what I will do. Instead of lending you the money, I will indorse your note. The man with the cattle will accept your note with my indorsement, because he can soon find out, if he does not already know, that Mr. Blank will gladly accept that note and discharge the obligation of the man who has the cattle."

Now, I ask which you could afford to do for me at least expense to me—go down into your pocket and let me have $500 in cash, every dollar of which cost you a hundred cents' worth of labor or property, or let me have the use of your good name; that is, your credit? There is no room for doubt as to the answer. Credit can be loaned so cheap that we often loan it to a friend without making any charge. That, of course, is friendship, not business, but it illustrates what I desire to impress—that credit can be loaned cheaper than cash.

In the case cited, after fattening and marketing the cattle I could pay the note which you indorsed for me and have a good profit left. This profit was made possible by reason of your kindness in loaning me your credit or insuring mine. By insuring my credit you rendered me a valuable service, for which I could well afford to pay you a reasonable sum.

THE FUNCTION OF BANKS.

If you should go into the business of insuring credits for others as you did for me, guaranteeing the credit of any man of good character engaged in legitimate business, like that in the illustration, it would not need any proof to show that you would be performing a valuable public service.

But that is precisely the function of banks—to insure the credits of people engaged in business. Originally the banker simply indorsed the note to be insured, as in the illustration. Later he kept the note and gave his own instead, exchanging his well-known credit for the less-known credit of his customer. Later still, he gave his customer a credit on his books and authorized him to check against it.

The banker should be able to effect this exchange of credit in the way that will best accommodate his customer. In places that are thickly populated, so that the people have convenient access to the banks, the form of bank credit usually preferred is the book credit to be checked against. But in the country districts the form preferred is the note or "bill," because it can be used by simply passing from one person to the other.

BANK NOTES VERSUS GREENBACKS.

The true bank note is just like your note or mine in that it comes forth when needed and retires when its work is done.

In the illustration above, where the cattle were bought, my note was brought into existence by the purchase of the cattle. It remained out, and passed on to the hands of a third party, performing the function of currency in satisfying a debt, and finally was paid and canceled when I sold the cattle. It was just as important to me to have it retire when its work was done as it was to have it promptly usable when I needed it. Speaking of that note as part of the currency, we notice that it was created in the process of producing something to satisfy man's needs, and was canceled in the process of consumption. Similarly, a true bank note comes forth when needed in business, circulates from hand to hand while there is work for it to do, and then when it is no longer needed it goes back into the bank.

The important thing to note is this: While the bank note is in the till of the bank it is costing the community little or nothing, because it costs the bank practically nothing to keep it in its till, just as it would cost you nothing to write a note payable on demand and then put it away in a safe place without using it.

But if the bank lends greenbacks the community must pay for them, not only while it is using them, but also while they are in the vault of the bank, because to the bank they are property which contains an investment of a hundred cents to the dollar.

Did you ever stop at a "summer hotel?" Did you ever wonder why the rates are higher than at a regular commercial hotel, open the year round, giving the same quality of service? You can readily figure out the reason. The "summer hotel" is open and earning money only two or three months of the year. But the owners have their money invested in it the whole year round. So those who go to the "summer hotel" must pay in the few weeks enough to give a return on the investment for the whole year. Hence the rates must be high.

Those who stay at the hotel must pay not only for what they get while there but also a share of the cost of carrying the property during the season when it is earning nothing.

Let us see how this illustration applies in the case of banking. If the bank can lend only gold, silver, and greenbacks or Treasury notes, each of which costs it a hundred cents on the dollar to get hold of, it must charge interest sufficient to cover not only the time that its funds are loaned out, but also for the time when they are lying in the till of the bank unloaned. Like the hotel, they are property, and must be earning returns not only while the community is getting the use of them but also while the bank is holding them in readiness for the community to use.

But suppose that the bank can issue, under a system which will make them absolutely safe in the hands of the people, true bank notes. The notes go out and serve the community, and for that service the community pays. The cattle buyer takes the notes or bills out into the country and buys cattle. The farmer uses part of them to pay his men. The men use them to buy goods with. The merchant deposits them and takes a credit on the books of the bank, to be checked against as he wishes. The notes have gone the round and served their purpose and are now back in the vaults of the bank. While lying in the vault of the bank they are not costing the bank anything, unlike the greenback under similar circumstances, and consequently the bank does not have to charge up to the community anything for carrying them.

In other words, the community must pay for the use of the greenbacks all of the time, whether it uses them or not, while it has to pay for the use of the bank notes only while it is using them. Change "community" to "country" and you will have the truth as applied to the country as a whole, namely, that the use of the greenback costs the country a great deal more than the same service through bank notes would cost. The interests of the country, therefore, are those which demand the retirement of the greenback.

It is evident that my argument is in the interest, not of the banker, but of the borrower; not of a class even, but of the country.

As I said before, this bill does not look to the retirement of the greenbacks. It looks only to rendering their existence as little dangerous as possible; and there is little likelihood that in the immediate future the question of their disposition will have serious consideration. But I submit that it is quite possible that in the not very distant future the question of the currency, whether it shall be issued by the Government or by the banks, may become a matter of controversy in this country. And it behooves every man, especially every man who is in responsible public position, to give some thought to this question lest, as so many did in the silver question, he commit himself to a view which careful study will show to be untenable.

Personally, after considerable study of the subject, I am firmly of the opinion that we should move away from a political currency toward a business currency; away from an inelastic and unresponsive currency toward one which is elastic and which responds promptly to the demands of business; away from the expensive currency which necessitates high interest rates to the currency which will give us, as a people, the best interest rates in the world. At some proper time in the future I expect to discuss more fully the question of this paper currency. Time permits me now only to touch upon it.

While this bill goes only a little way toward liberalizing the bank-note issues, it probably goes as far as public opinion will now justify. The provisions which it contains are substantially those, so far as they go, which were contained in the bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committee last year. While this bill does not move as far as that bill did, it moves in the right direction, and therefore I shall vote for it.

WHAT ABOUT SILVER IN THE BILL?

Mr. SIMS. As the gentleman is always so kind in yielding to questions and so frank in answering them, I would like to ask him whether, from his point of view, it would not be better to call in the silver dollars and sell them as bullion than to attempt to keep them at a parity in the way provided in this bill?

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Chairman, the bill gives to silver, either as coin or as silver certificates, the entire work of pocket money. It is believed that in this way all the tremendous amount of silver which the Government has bought can be safely used and that none need be sold.

Answering my friend's question, I would say—again on my own personal responsibility, and binding no one but myself thereby—that since we are coining silver on Government account, the Government owes it to the people to see that they are supplied with all the silver coins that they need for business purposes and that the denominations of the coins should be those which they find most convenient. The quantity of silver bought should be determined wholly by this consideration. The Government has a right to buy silver for just one purpose, namely, to meet the demands of business for silver coin. It should buy silver on exactly the same principle as that on which it buys oats for its cavalry horses. It buys the oats to feed the horses, not to please the man who has oats to sell, and the amount of its purchases of oats should be determined by the needs of the horses and not by the urgency of the owner of the oats. If at any time the Government finds that, judging by the demands for silver coin, it needs more silver, it should buy enough to serve its purpose. If at any time it concludes that it has been prevailed upon to make an overpurchase, it should unhesitatingly sell the surplus.

CONCLUSION.

At some proper time in the future, as I have said, I hope to state at length what I conceive to be the ideal toward which our efforts in currency reform should be directed. But for the present I have trespassed long enough on the indulgence of the committee.

We are nearing the close of the nineteenth century. How rich in memories of national achievement is that century! How splendid the glories of its sunset! Ere its close the people of the United States will again have spoken. Their verdict will be a vote of confidence in that party whose wisdom and patriotism they have never depended on in vain. Again will they place in the White House the far-seeing statesman and courtly gentleman who now adorns it. And the radiance of the present will shine far out over the years of the coming century! [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Analysis of Bill H. R. 1.

OF

HON. JESSE OVERSTREET,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, December 11, 1899,

On the bill (H. R. 1) entitled "A bill to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. OVERSTREET said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The most urgent subject of the proposed bill is the question of a monetary standard and provision for its maintenance. The strengthening of the public credit, by the removal of all doubt concerning the policy and practice of the Government relative to the unit of value, is of paramount importance. To effect this result by a complete guarantee of the quality and parity of all our money, without any disturbance by change in the quantity or kind, is the chief purpose of the legislation proposed.

The other provisions are such as will meet the demand for an increased supply of subsidiary coin and small notes, required for change in the daily business transactions of the country, and provision for utilizing the full loanable capital of banks and its proper distribution in the simplest manner.

The single remaining provision, viz, the repeal of the tax upon bank circulation and the substitution of a tax upon bank franchises, is for the purpose of removing restrictions against the full use of bank circulation and for the purpose of equalizing the taxes upon all national banks.

SUMMARY AND ARGUMENT.

The bill is drawn in eleven sections. Sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 provide for the establishment and maintenance of the gold standard.

Sections 5 and 6 provide for the coinage of subsidiary coin and worn and uncurrent coins, and the repeal of the statute limiting the issue of subsidiary coin and fractional currency to $50,000,000.

Section 7 provides for the issue of United States notes and Treasury notes in such denominations, not less than $1, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and also for the issue of silver certificates in denominations only of $1, $2, and $5.

Sections 8 and 9 provide for the issue of national-bank note circulation to the par value of the bonds deposited for their security.

Section 10 provides for the repeal of the tax upon national-bank note circulation and the substitution of a tax of one-fifth of 1 per cent upon the franchises of national banks as measured by their capital, surplus, and undivided profits.

Section 11 authorizes the organization of national banks with a capital stock of $25,000 in towns having a population of 2,000 inhabitants or less.

THE GOLD STANDARD.

The first and most important feature of the proposed bill, as contained in the first four sections, is the establishment of the gold standard in law. The element of value is just as essential to a standard of value as the element of weight to a standard of weight, or of length to a standard of measurement. Firmness, stability, and constancy are characteristics which any standard must possess if it shall meet the demand upon it by universal use for honest and true measurement, whether of value, weight, or length; firmness in adherence to the principle and purpose to which it is dedicated; stability in its individual strength, and constancy in its character to preserve its integrity. Adaptability to the uses of trade, simplicity of terms to meet the requirements of small transactions equally with large concerns, and uniformity of reputation are qualities necessary to the successful operation of any standard.

There can be but one standard of a given measurement at one time. An attempt to couple two standards differing in any degree in essential characteristics will shift the standard to the weaker link. If the basis of a standard of value should be two metals, each possessing characteristics essential to true measurement, there would still be, in effect, but one standard. Value is determined by such a multitude of circumstances, bearing such complex relations to each other, influenced by supply and demand, utility, durability, human desire, and other causes without number, that exchanges of property can be easily effected only by the common use of a variety of mediums of exchange, each representing accurately the units of value as measured in the standard into which it can be converted on demand.

Voluntary and universal exchanges in coppers, nickels, silver and gold, bank notes, greenbacks, and certificates mark the true test of a standard into which each can be converted with ease. Law does not create this condition. It merely recognizes it and operates as a check against its disturbance. All efforts to effect, by law, a double standard of value have been futile; and the laws of trade and commerce, indifferent to statute law, have universally and consistently recognized as the standard that metal the intrinsic value of which has been most stable and most free from fluctuations. A bimetallic currency is feasible and practicable. Two metals will circulate with ease, but the measure of value must be a single standard. The immutable laws of trade, which control such condition, would suffer no more by a statute than an effort to change the tides by a royal edict. To dispel all lingering doubts from the minds of the public, and to give clear expression to the nation's purpose relative to financial obligations, is the object of the legislation proposed.

When the standard shall be permanently established and all doubt of its stability removed, the parity of all our money will be fully recognized, and the kind of money in which payments shall be made will rarely, if ever, be the subject of dispute. When certainty shall take the place of doubt, and the integrity of our credit be as fixed as the honor of the nation, the national debt can be readily refunded at lower interest rates, and future loans negotiated with ease upon better terms than ever before. The rapid development of American trade, and its vast expansion, bringing our people into closer relations with the leading nations of the world, makes it imperative that the standard of value in which settlements are made shall be the best known to the highest civilization, and shall safely appeal to intelligent and successful experience.

Recent events, shaped by causes beyond our control, bearing obligations which national honor requires shall be courageously discharged, open new fields for American statesmanship. Channels of trade yet unknown to American enterprise and avenues of commerce yet to welcome American products will surely result. Such conditions emphasize the necessity for a standard of value which shall remain firm throughout the vicissitudes of competitive trade. Its permanency and stability should be above suspicion. Its security should be absolute. Some question of expediency might be raised if the proposition were new or we were assuming a position at variance with other nations. But the gold standard is recognized by all leading nations, and the statute proposed merely reaffirms the policy followed by us for over sixty years, so reenforced and plainly expressed that the question will be placed forever beyond dispute.

Such are the general conditions of trade, as well as the condition of the National Treasury, that no disturbance whatever can possibly be caused by the legislation proposed. The volume and variety of our interstate and foreign trade has never before been equaled. The supply of labor fails to meet the demand offered for employment. Bountiful harvests and the output of manufactories strain the means of transportation. Vast enterprises for extension of shipping facilities by land and sea are in progress. No clouds yet appear to cast a shadow upon our prosperity. The national revenues have been abundant and satisfactory notwithstanding the expense incident to the war with Spain, which has been concluded with success and honor, nor the expenses incurred by the insurrection in the Philippines. The taxes imposed by the Government to meet the increased expenditures are being patriotically borne by our people without a murmur. The Government has been able to meet its obligations with ease and has declared its willingness to anticipate its interest payments so as to quickly return the money to the channels of trade.

The net gold in the Treasury on the 2d day of October, 1899, was $254,328,820. There is more gold in the United States now than ever before. The world's product of gold in 1898 was the greatest in history and exceeded the product of 1897 by $48,616,600 and of 1896 by $85,177,600. The product of gold from the mines in the United States in 1898 was the greatest in the history of the country, exceeding the product of 1897 by $7,100,000 and of 1896 by $11,375,000. The output of gold, both of the world's product and the product from American mines, has increased annually since 1890. The output of silver for the same period has varied in different years, but its value per ounce has had a uniform tendency downward, declining to 59 cents per ounce in 1898, its lowest register.

The present conditions are most favorable and the time most opportune for the clear and unequivocal adoption of the gold standard. Prior to the year 1896 the gold standard had been legally adopted by the following countries, viz: Austria-Hungary, Brazil, British Honduras, Chile, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, Germany, Great Britain, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, and Turkey, and since 1896 the gold standard has been adopted by Costa Rica, Japan, Peru, and Russia. The coinage of silver on private account was suspended (prior to 1896) by the United States, Belgium, France, Holland, Italy, Spain, India, Switzerland, Greece, and Venezuela, thus effectually, although not absolutely, fixing their status as gold-standard countries.

If under all these conditions the United States shall clearly by law adopt the gold standard, it will pass to the new condition with even less friction than was experienced by the resumption of specie payment. The Government is fortunate in being able to act in so important a matter under such favorable circumstances. The general policy of the Government and such declarations as have been made by Congress are entirely consistent with this proposition.

The law of February 22, 1873, specifying the one-dollar piece at the standard weight of 25.8 grains of gold as the unit of value, sought to legalize what had, for a great many years, been the policy of the Government relative to the standard of value. While no subsequent law has deviated from this interpretation, yet the quantity of our silver money so largely increased under the operation of the laws of February 28, 1878, and July 14, 1890, and the value of silver bullion so depreciated that the ability of the Government to maintain the parity of gold and silver was seriously doubted. From the moment that doubt arose our monetary standard was weakened, and it has since been called the "limping standard."

Although the further increase of silver money was stopped by the repeal of the coinage feature of the laws of February 28, 1878, and July 14, 1890, the doubt continued, and the danger to the credit of the Government assumed grave proportions. An effort to reenforce the nation's credit was made on November 1, 1893, when Congress declared its purpose to maintain its gold and silver money "of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts."

By the first and second sections of the bill it is sought to legalize the gold standard by a plain and definite statute which shall remove the question from all doubt, and so establish the standard that it can be changed only by Congressional action, in this way giving "the people's purpose the vitality of public law."

In declaring gold to be the standard of value the bill clearly states that we are already operating under such standard. The first provision is, "That the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar, and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle." While claiming that gold is now the standard, its reenactment acts as a reaffirmation and dispels all doubt which may have arisen in the public mind.

The plain declaration fixing the gold standard would be impracticable except for the provision of payment of Government obligations in that standard and providing for all obligations, both public and private, for the payment of money to be performed in conformity with the standard so established. Such provision in nowise interferes with the legal-tender quality of the present forms of legal-tender money, nor prohibits payment of a different character especially provided by contract. It merely seeks to make full provision for the proper operation of the standard of value as fixed by statute. Private obligations shall be performed, not by payment necessarily in gold, but in conformity with the standard; that is, in money equal to gold in value.

The recognition of the standard is reflected in the method pursued by the Government in the payment of its obligations. Mere statutory declaration would be idle unless the conduct of the nation toward its own debts were consistent with the statute. Law and conduct both must be free from ambiguity. National honor and national credit are closely allied. In the discharge of its debts the Government has always followed the practice of making payment in money equivalent to the best money known at the time. Every dollar received by the Government, for which its credit has been pledged, has been as good as gold, and the discharge of such debt in money of less value would be repudiation.

Section 3, providing for the creation of a division of issue and redemption in the Treasury Department, requires the Department to keep separate from the fiscal operations of the Government the coin and bullion especially designated as a redemption fund and the deposits pledged for the payment of specific notes outstanding, and prohibits the use of the same except for the purposes to which they shall be especially dedicated. The provision in this section for the retention in such division of an amount of gold equal to 25 per cent of the amount both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14, 1890, outstanding, to operate as a reserve fund to meet the demand for the redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes when presented, is based upon the well-established practice of the Government providing for the redemption of these two Government obligations.

There is now no specific law authorizing any particular sum to be held as a reserve to meet the redemption of the greenbacks, unless it is contained in the provision of the law relating to the issue of gold certificates, directing that no more gold certificates shall be issued whenever the gold in the Treasury falls below $100,000,000. Such practice should be legalized and based upon a specific statute. A reserve fund of one-fourth of such notes outstanding is deemed sufficient to guard against any sudden demand of holders for the redemption of these obligations. Especially is it thought that such sum is sufficient in view of the provision contained in section 4 of the bill, wherein it is stipulated that all notes and certificates, when redeemed or exchanged, shall be held, and not be withdrawn nor disbursed, except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said notes or certificates were redeemed or exchanged, save only when transferred by the Secretary of the Treasury from one fund to another.

The different funds which would by this section be referred to such division of the Treasury, together with the respective amounts, on the 30th day of September, 1899, are as follows:

1. Gold coin and bullion, represented by outstanding gold certificates	$135,591,119
2. United States notes, represented by outstanding currency certificates	16,100,000
3. Silver dollars, represented by outstanding silver certificates	405,197,504
4. Silver bullion, represented by outstanding Treasury notes	91,167,280
5. Gold coin and bullion equal to one-fourth of the United States notes ($346,681,016) and Treasury notes ($91,167,280) outstanding	109,462,074

The first four items enumerate the special deposits dedicated to specific payments. As these obligations are met the deposits are correspondingly reduced.

In the absence of a law providing protection to the gold reserve, it is always subject to encroachment in expenditures to meet the general expenses of the Government. Whenever such encroachment seems probable, a fear has arisen that the Government may not be able to meet its demand obligations, and a run upon the reserve for the redemption of the demand notes has followed. This situation is responsible for the so-called "endless chain." By separating the reserve fund from the general fund and prohibiting its use, except for redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes, the dangers to which it has been so greatly subjected will be removed. These demand notes are being redeemed in gold now and always have been, and no additional burden is imposed upon the Government. It is sought to simplify and legalize the practice, and create a division in the Treasury where the whole business of issuing and redeeming notes may be transacted, and to establish complete confidence in the redemption of our demand obligations.

Section 4 of the bill seeks to provide a complete safeguard to guarantee the permanent maintenance of the gold standard by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever it is necessary for such maintenance, to issue and sell bonds of the United States, payable in gold coin, and for the exchange of gold coin for any other money issued or coined by the United States, should the Secretary of the Treasury deem such exchange necessary in order to maintain the parity and equal value of all the money of the United States. The legalizing of the gold standard and provision for the equality of all forms of money at a parity with the standard will so remove all doubt of the soundness and integrity of our money that there will be little occasion for the exchange of one kind of money for another.

And yet, in order to make complete guaranty against any contingency which may arise, authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to meet such emergencies, should they arise, by the sale of bonds or the exchange of any money issued or coined by the United States, is deemed advisable. The provision in this section that no note or certificate, once redeemed or exchanged, shall be withdrawn, except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which said note or certificate was redeemed or exchanged, save only when the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the transfer from one fund to another, will forever put an end to the so-called "endless chain," which has so embarrassed the Government in the ever-recurring redemption of the greenback. There can be no contraction of the currency under this system, for the reason that either the note is in circulation, or, if redeemed, its equivalent is in circulation.

Where the revenues fail to equal the expenditures, the Government has no other recourse to obtain money except the sale of bonds. This section advances no new proposition. It clearly defines the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury toward the protection of the gold reserve, and provides for the issue of bonds at a lower rate of interest than at present authorized by law.

The maintenance of the parity of all our money is fully guaranteed by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange gold for any other money, should he deem such exchange necessary. If such an emergency shall arise, it is best that the duty of the Government shall be clear. This will not increase the responsibility beyond the burden which now rests upon the Government. It will discharge the duty directly which is now met indirectly. Indeed, it is confidently believed that less embarrassment will follow from the direct method. The demand for such exchange will be reduced in proportion as the certainty of the exchange is made manifest.

Furthermore, the bill contains two provisions which will prove great obstacles against the presentation of any considerable sum for exchange at one time. First, any note or certificate, once redeemed or exchanged, shall be held in the Treasury and not be withdrawn nor disbursed except in exchange for an equivalent amount of the coin in which such exchange was first made, except as before set out. Second, the breaking up of the silver certificates above $5 in denomination will distribute the silver, either in coin or certificates, for use in the small transactions of everyday trade. The expense of transportation of the dollar piece will retard such movement, while the distribution of the certificates, as well as the dollar pieces, will render it extremely difficult to collect a sufficient amount to make their presentation dangerous or even embarrassing.

A few bills of large denominations, aggregating a very considerable sum, might be readily obtained, but it would be difficult to gather and transport a million silver-dollar pieces and very troublesome to withdraw from the channels of daily trade any considerable sum of certificates of denominations of one, two, and five dollars. With the absolute assurance of the Government's intention to maintain the parity of all our money, with authority of law to sell bonds to procure sufficient gold in which full exchange will be made, it is confidently believed that no necessity for such exchange will ever arise.

SUBSIDIARY COINS.

Sections 5 and 6 provide for the coinage of subsidiary silver coin from any silver bullion in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, and the recoinage of worn and uncurrent coins, and the repeal of the present law, which limits the amount of subsidiary coin and fractional currency to $50,000,000. The great demand for small change in the everyday transactions of business makes it necessary to remove the limitation which the present law fixes upon subsidiary coin and fractional currency. While the present law limits this issue to $50,000,000, the demand has been so great that the law has been necessarily disregarded, and the issue has so increased that on September 30, 1899, the total amount was $76,523,333.

The issue in excess of the limitation should be legalized. Owing to the growth of population and the great volume of small transactions, a further increase of subsidiary coin will be quickly absorbed. The silver bullion in the Treasury pledged to the redemption of the Treasury notes of 1890 is a practical source from which to obtain an additional supply of subsidiary coin. The law authorizing the issue of the Treasury notes provides for their cancellation as rapidly as the bullion purchased under said law should be coined and used for the redemption of said notes. Experience has shown that a greater number of silver dollars have been coined by the Government than the people care to accept. They fail to be absorbed by general trade, and are largely used as a pledge for the issue of silver certificates, which are preferred.

Of the total number of silver dollars coined by the Government up to September 30, 1899, viz, $490,388,614, there were deposited in the Treasury $405,197,504, upon which certificates were issued, leaving but $85,191,110 in circulation, $5,023,285 of which were, on that date, in the Treasury, unrepresented by certificates outstanding. In other words, on September 30, 1899, there were in actual circulation only 80,167,825 silver dollars. It seems that a part of the silver bullion purchased under the law of 1890 could be coined into subsidiary coin without embarrassment and Treasury notes corresponding in amount canceled. The only authority of law for the recoinage of worn and uncurrent coins is the provision in the annual appropriation bills. So important a matter should be made the subject of a statute more permanent in its effect. As soon as a coin becomes so worn as to render it uncurrent, it is promptly returned to the Treasury for redemption. Frequently the amount on hand aggregates several millions of dollars, and unless provision for recoinage and return to trade is made, the shortage in small coins becomes embarrassing to business.

SILVER CERTIFICATES.

Section 7 gives authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue or reissue United States notes or Treasury notes, in denominations not less than $1, as he may prescribe, and provides that all silver certificates hereafter issued or paid out shall be in denominations only of $1, $2, and $5.

Two objects are sought by this section: First, to empower the Secretary of the Treasury with discretion for the supply of small notes to meet the demands of the business world as the same shall arise. This necessity has been prominent of late on account of the vastly increased business of the country, requiring change in small transactions. Under the present law the Secretary of the Treasury does not possess this discretion, but is required to reissue such notes in the same denominations as redeemed, and the rigid enforcement of the law greatly embarrasses general business where such demand for small notes exists.

While provision is made in this section for the issue of United States notes and Treasury notes of such denominations not less than $1, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, yet it is presumed that such discretion will be exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury only for the purpose of meeting an urgent demand for small notes, and that, in the absence of such emergency, silver certificates will largely comprise the note issue of the Government under $10. Rather than operate as a restriction of the note issues under $10, such provision will afford a relief by an increase of circulation of small notes.

The second object of the section is to break up the large silver certificates. The breaking up of the large silver certificates will place upon silver, either in the dollar or in the certificates representing the silver dollars, a great proportion of the burden of daily business transactions, and thus so scatter the certificates that, even if an effort were made to embarrass the Treasury by their presentation for exchange, the difficulty of procuring them would, very largely, if not completely, defeat such effort.

The total amount in silver certificates on September 30, 1899, was $405,197,504, of which $175,064,553 was in denominations of one, two, and five dollars, and $230,132,951 was in denominations over $5. The total number of silver dollars coined up to September 30, 1899, was 490,388,614, so that on that date there were outstanding 85,191,110 silver dollars. Of this last sum there were held by the Treasury, unrepresented by certificates, $5,023,285, leaving but $80,167,825 actually in circulation. If the field of daily business transactions, or the "pocket trade," shall be given over to silver, it would be quickly absorbed, and once distributed would become the permanent medium of exchange in small transactions among our people. It could fill no greater nor more honorable use.

The total amount of our money on September 30, 1899, in denominations under $10 (except the fractional currency, subsidiary coin, and gold dollars) was $470,830,791, divided as follows:

Silver dollars unrepresented by silver certificates	$85,191,110
Silver certificates	175,064,553
Greenbacks	82,289,173
Treasury notes of 1890	52,295,450
National-bank notes	75,990,505

The breaking up of the silver certificates over $5 would increase the money in denominations under $10 by $230,132,951. But the discretionary power given the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the issue of greenbacks and Treasury notes in denominations under $10 renders possible the withdrawal from circulation of such denominations of the greenback and Treasury note, aggregating $134,584,623, and their reissue in larger denominations. Hence the minimum of increase of small notes would be the difference between the total amount of silver certificates over $5, or $230,132,951, and the aggregate of the greenbacks and Treasury notes under $10, or $134,584,623, which is $95,548,328. If the national-bank notes under $10 should be converted into larger denominations, the minimum increase of small notes would be but $19,557,823. The demand for money of small denominations has been most urgent and it is believed that the cash transactions of the people will give employment to the increase here provided without increasing the strain upon the Treasury.

BANK-NOTE CIRCULATION.

Sections 8 and 9 merely amend sections of existing law so as to permit the issue of bank circulation to the par value of the bonds deposited for their security, and in this way allow the full use of the loanable capital of the bank. The law as originally drawn, limiting the note issue to 90 per cent of the bonds, was so drawn for the reason that Government bonds at that date were not worth par. The amendment of this law as herein provided has been urged by five Secretaries of the Treasury and four Presidents, and there seems to be no good reason why the amendments should not be made.

TAX UPON BANK FRANCHISES.

Section 10 seeks to repeal the tax of 1 per cent upon bank circulation and to substitute therefor a tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent each half year on franchises of national banks as measured by their capital, surplus, and undivided profits. Under the present law the tax falls unequally upon small banks, while the larger banks, and especially those which do not issue note circulation, escape the burden of the tax. A bank of small capital stock nearly exhausts its capital in the purchase of bonds required by law and the creation of its reserve funds, and realizes the necessity of the issue of circulation to provide a sufficient loanable fund. A bank of $50,000 capital must purchase $12,500 in bonds, an amount equal to one-fourth of its capital. And when a premium is exacted and the reserve funds required by law are established the tax of 1 per cent upon the circulation it may issue becomes a burden. The large city banks, having better chances for deposits, do not feel the need of issuing circulation. Furthermore, no matter how large the capital of a bank of over $200,000, it is required to purchase no more than $50,000 in bonds, or one-fourth of $200,000. The investment of $50,000 in bonds will embarrass a bank of $1,000,000 capital much less than an investment of $12,500 by a bank of $50,000 capital. Not feeling the need of adding to its loanable fund by the issue of circulation, it escapes the tax entirely.

By the removal of this tax upon note circulation all restrictions will be removed against such issue, and the full power of bank-note circulation will be gained, thus increasing the loanable capital of the country. The substitution of the tax upon the franchise of the bank is for the purpose of equalizing the burden upon all banks in proportion to their ability to bear the burden. The per cent fixed is such that the amount of tax received by the Government from this source will be about the same as realized from the present tax, any difference being in favor of rather than against the Government. The tax under existing law for five years ending June 30, 1899, was $9,469,948.39. The tax under the proposed bill for the same period would have been $9,778,858.12.

Provision is also made in this section fixing a penalty for the failure of any bank to make the proper report, so as to show its liability under this act, and providing for the information to be obtained by the Secretary of the Treasury in the event any bank should fail or refuse to comply with the law.

SMALL BANKS.

Section 11 amends section 5138, United States Revised Statutes, so as to authorize the organization of banks of $25,000 capital in communities of 2,000 inhabitants. The growing demand in the sparsely settled districts of the country for banking accommodations, so as to create distributing points for the loanable capital of the country, is met most easily by permitting the organization of banks of small capital and thereby creating money centers of small degree in various localities where the convenience of the system will greatly aid in the moving of crops at the season of year when, under the present methods, the procuring of money for short-time loans is difficult.

As a proper restriction against a possible danger of too far an extension of the system, a limit is placed upon the capital of such banks, as well as upon the population of the communities in which they may be organized. A careful examination of the subject seems to lead to the conclusion that limitation upon the capital to $25,000 and upon the population to 2,000 inhabitants will effect a reasonable and safe adjustment of the demand.

Urgent Deficiency Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. J. M. QUARLES,

OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 17, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 6237) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and for prior years, and for other purposes—

Mr. QUARLES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am heartily in favor of that provision in the bill under consideration which makes an appropriation for rural free delivery. This system of mail delivery is a matter that deeply concerns and affects the welfare of the farmer. The benefits that must come to him from its general adoption throughout the country are varied and can not well be overestimated.

We learn from the reports of the Postmaster-General and his First Assistant that rural free delivery is now shown to be a success and is receiving the approval of the people wherever it has been properly tried. The Postmaster-General tells us that—

The free delivery of mails in the rural districts has proved to be one of the most important among recent developments of the postal service, and presents in its possibilities a question of the largest proportions. The results already attained have been of a significant character, and the practical evidences bearing upon the feasibility of the system, upon the degree of its self-support, and upon the effect and the sentiment in the communities where it has been tried deserve the most careful consideration. How far the system shall be extended is submitted for the determination of Congress, with a full presentation of facts upon which to base a conclusion.

The Postmaster-General further informs us that "it is the opinion of the officers having it in charge that the experimental stage has been passed," and in that view he says that he "coincides." We further learn from the Postmaster-General that the system is now in successful operation from 630 distributing points, scattered among 40 States and 1 Territory, giving service to 452,735 people, at an average cost of 66 cents per capita.

The tests that have been made of this service have demonstrated the fact that the postal receipts will be increased wherever it is fairly and judiciously extended. Many of the new deliveries in this country upon being established became almost immediately self-sustaining. In Great Britain, where an extension of rural free delivery on a broader scale has been in operation since 1897, the number of additional letters mailed because of additional facilities afforded is estimated at 50,000,000 for the present year. It may be fairly assumed from what has already been seen that the postal receipts in this country will so grow by a reasonable extension of the service that it would not be long before it would be self-supporting.

I would impress upon the House the great and beneficial results that will accrue to the agriculturists from an extension of this service. Among them may be enumerated the enhancement of the value of farm lands and better prices obtained for farm products by prompter communication with the markets; the improvement of the highways made necessary to facilitate free delivery; higher educational influences, broader circulation of the means of public intelligence, and closer daily contact with the business world.

The farmer, Mr. Chairman, is a business man and should be brought as close to the business world as conditions can be made to admit of. His daily mail delivered to him will keep him informed as to prices and values and all that is transpiring affecting his interests.

I am astonished that there is anyone in this House opposed to rural free delivery. Instead of $150,000 being appropriated, it should be ten times that amount, which should be distributed equally among the States and Territories in proportion to the rural population. Millions of dollars have been expended in the past and are being expended every year by the Government out of the Treasury in the erection of fine and costly post-office buildings in cities and for free delivery there, and it seems to me that it is now time that so large a class of the taxpayers as the farmers are should begin to receive a bestowal of their share of the public favors and funds in the direction of better mail facilities and free mail delivery.

Mr. Chairman, the stability and future of this Republic depend upon the farmers. The great Daniel Webster once said:

When tillage begins other arts follow. The farmers, therefore, are the founders of human civilization.

And it may be truly said that they are the founders of republics and the preservers of human liberty. When defense of home and country is needed, the farmer is always ready to make the sacrifice in blood and treasure. "The agricultural population," says

Cato, "produces the bravest men, the most valiant soldiers, and a class of citizens the least given of all to evil designs." Keep them posted and in touch with the affairs of the country, and the Republic will continue to live and the liberties of the people will be safe. Edmund Burke said:

The people never give up their liberties but under a delusion.

While the farmer is so important a factor in the development of this country materially and the preservation of our institutions, he has not been fairly dealt with in recent years by Congress in its legislation. They have, in the main, been legislated against. Mr. McKinley, when he was looking forward to the Presidency and paving the way to that high office, seems to have been, judging from his speeches, watchful of their rights and interests, as he understood them. In February, 1891, at Toledo, Ohio, in criticising ex-President Cleveland's opposition to silver, he said:

During all these years at the head of the Government he was dishonoring one of our precious metals, one of our own great products, discrediting silver and enhancing the price of gold. He endeavored even before his inauguration to office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards, and to the end of his administration, persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the terms of commerce, limit the volume of money among the people, make money scarce, and therefore dear.

He would have increased the value of money and decreased the value of everything else—money the master, and everything else the servant. He was not thinking of the "poor" then. He had left their side. He was not standing forth in their defense. Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these, professing to stand guard over the poor and lowly. Was there more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption? He believes that poverty is a blessing to be promoted and encouraged, and that a shrinkage in the value of everything but money is a national benediction.

At that time Mr. McKinley appeared to think much of "the poor and lowly" and talked much about them. But a few years thereafter he became President, and what a change came over him. He "doth protest too much." He, too, left their side. He is not standing forth in their defense. His administration is doing the bidding of the trusts, banks, and syndicates. These great powers are molding, shaping, and directing his administration to suit their base and sordid purposes.

During the campaign of 1896 the Democrats charged that the trusts, banks, and syndicates were furnishing money to influence and to purchase the election of Mr. McKinley. His election was secured and the accumulated evidence convinced every fair-minded man that it was carried by the corrupt use of money and by intimidation. Why need then anyone be surprised that the trusts, syndicates, and banks direct the policies of the administration? Did not the consideration pass from them, and must not the administration carry out its part of the agreement as made for it by the Republican party? The administration has been faithful to the trust imposed and has yielded to every demand made by the trusts, banks, and syndicates.

Hardly had Mr. McKinley taken his seat as President before he called an extra session of Congress for the purpose of having a high protective tariff law enacted. This law, known as the "Dingley tariff law," was passed by the Republican party, and it was made to suit the demands of the trusts and manufacturers and in disregard of the interests of the people. It has proven to be more than a protection to manufacturers; it is a fosterer of trusts. This was the first return, Mr. Chairman, made by the Republican party for the aid rendered by the trusts in the election of 1896. Under this tariff law in the last two years more trusts, in amount of capital, have been formed than were formed in all the years that preceded that period. This fact distinguishes the present administration from all other administrations. It stands out as the great friend of the trusts. It may be appropriately termed a trust administration, and will doubtless be known as such in history.

Mr. Chairman, the trust system is the product of Republican legislation. The tariff, originally intended to protect infant industries, has been made and used by the Republican party so as to give birth to, foster, and protect the trusts. We have it from a distinguished Republican, the head of the sugar trust, Mr. Havemeyer, who knew what he was talking about, that "the tariff is the mother of all trusts." And what is a trust? It is a conspiracy for enriching the few by despoiling the many; it destroys healthful and natural competition and extorts unjust profits; it reduces wages to a minimum, while it puts up prices to a maximum. It deprives thousands of people of employment, enslaves labor, and all are made to pay unjust tribute.

We know much of the trusts by actual experience. "By their fruits ye shall know them." We have seen the wage-earner by the trusts turned out to tramp and to starve, and yet they were secure in controlling the market as to their respective manufactures. We have seen in the last eighteen months or two years nearly all of the great staples controlled by the trusts arbitrarily put up in prices to a rise from about 25 to 200 per cent, and with an average rise of at least 50 per cent, and the farmers are compelled to buy at these exorbitant prices, while what they have to sell, with few exceptions, is as low as when Mr. McKinley was elected President. And I call particular attention to this fact, that the rise in the prices of the staples controlled by the trusts came with the destruction of competition.

It would seem that war at home, foreign wars, and famine in foreign lands would stimulate the prices of farm products, but these evils have not blessed us. The old Republican argument that the starting up of industries and the giving of employment to laborers increase consumption, and in that way always increase the prices of farm products, is refuted by the present condition of affairs. The industries under the trust system have started up, trust prices have risen until they are oppressive, but the prices of farm products generally remain low. And this is true though we have an army greater by 75,000 than we had before the Spanish-American war, all of whom are consumers and contribute nothing toward production. Mr. Chairman, the trust prices are evidently artificial—they are fixed by the trust magnates without restraint and without mercy.

The enactment of the Dingley tariff bill into law was not the only obligation incurred by the Republican party in the Presidential election of 1896.

The banks furnished their quota of the campaign fund for the election of Mr. McKinley. This was believed and charged during the campaign. They now claim and demand from the Republican party compensatory legislation in return for what they contributed toward the success of that party in 1896 and for what they are to do in the future. This demand is that the currency bill now pending before Congress shall become a law. This bill, conceived and framed by the banks for the banks, if it shall pass Congress, will create one of the greatest banking trusts the world ever saw.

In the first place, this currency bill makes every debt, public and private, payable in gold. When the gold in this country is hoarded or withdrawn to foreign countries, as may be the case, to the extent of making it scarce, as it was in 1896, how will the debtor be able to pay his debt in gold without suffering a loss that may bring distress and want? When all the legal-tender money is retired as may and will occur, except gold, and that has either fled the country or is hoarded by the banks, I again ask, what will the debtor do when called on to pay in gold? Many a creditor may not wish to oppress, but many will oppress, and will not a state of things be created that the indulgent and forbearing creditor will not desire?

This feature of the bill should condemn it in the judgment of all good citizens. This currency bill does not present the question whether we shall have it as a law or 16 to 1, but whether we shall have a law producing a new financial system or continue the present system; whether the proposed new system is better than the present system. There is another feature of this bill more objectionable than the one I have just discussed. It is this: The effect of the proposed law will be to retire all of the redemption money but gold, and the banks, having the right to issue notes to the full face value of the bonds they will deposit in the Treasury, will have full and complete control of the volume of the credit money, and with such control it will be in the power of the banks to control and determine the values and prices of property.

This will be the inevitable result flowing from the enactment of this currency bill into law. It is an established principle in political economy that the quantity of money in use determines the general level of prices. This proposition applies in general to primary money, yet it is said to apply also to credit money, for a time at least. Certain it is that the banks, having full control over the credit money—the bank notes—and holding most of the gold in this country in their vaults, would have the power to shrink or expand the currency to suit their purposes. So, Mr. Chairman, the sovereign power of the Government to control the money and its volume is to be abdicated to the banks, and they, with one great head bank directing affairs, will manipulate the money market, will swell the volume of money and raise prices, or will contract it and depress prices, as may suit their sordid and wicked purposes. They will be the masters and the people the slaves.

This currency bill brings before the people a great question. It is, Who shall control the volume of the money? Shall it be done by the banks or the Government? This question means much to the American people. If the people are turned over to the banks, where is the power that will save them from the greed and avarice of the banks?

Not only will the banks under the proposed currency law have control of the volume of the currency, but they will possess the power of forcing an issue of bonds whenever they may so desire; and instead of the endless chain we will have an endless issue of bonds, and the banks, with the Republican party in power, will be the favored purchasers.

The Republican party is in a hurry about passing this currency bill. The campaign understanding with the banks must be carried out. Another Presidential campaign is at hand, and more money will be needed by the Republican party for campaign purposes. The people and their interests are not considered; they are ignored. Burdened already by the taxes incident to the prosecution of an unholy war, declared in violation of law by the President against the Filipinos and which is being waged in violation of every tradition, policy, and principle of our Republic, and subjected, too, to the robbery now being perpetrated upon them by the trusts, still this is not enough for the people to bear. The Republican party would increase the burdens and distress of the people by delivering them over to the banks by the enactment of a most audacious and iniquitous scheme into a law.

The Republican party, very early after the election and inauguration of Mr. McKinley as President began, through Secretary Gage, to fulfill its obligations to the Standard Oil Trust magnates. The directory of the National City Bank of New York consists of the Standard Oil Trust representatives and other great trust representatives, and the correspondence between Stillman and Hepburn, president and vice-president, respectively, of the National City Bank, and Secretary Gage, sent by Secretary Gage to Congress in compliance with its request, discloses transactions between this bank and the Government which amount to a national shame. The Standard Oil magnates contributed money toward the election of the Republican nominee for President in 1896, and on June 5, 1897, three months after the inauguration of the President, these magnates, through the vice-president of their bank, sent in their "bill" to Secretary Gage for payment, which reads as follows:

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: The National City Bank of this city, of which I recently became vice-president through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any change which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect. We should like to remain a United States depository, as at present. Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors you will see that we also have very great political claims, in view of what was done during the canvass last year.

Yours, very truly,

A. B. HEPBURN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

What did Secretary Gage do? When requested to confer special favors upon the Standard Oil bank because of "very great political claims," did he rebuke Hepburn? Did he ignore his letter? Did he refuse to use the people's money in a way to satisfy the political claims of the Standard Oil magnates? No; he proceeded to pay the "bill." Let us see how he responded to this letter. On May 14, 1897, before Secretary Gage received the Hepburn letter, the Government had on deposit in the Standard Oil National City Bank $200,000, and after the date of the Hepburn letter, in 1897, the same bank received of the $58,000,000 in settlement of the Union Pacific debt $24,000,000. On the 14th of July, 1898, the balance of Government money deposited without interest in the National City Bank was $19,576,000, and on September 20, 1899, the balance was $29,000,000.

In the floating of the war loan of $200,000,000, in June, 1898, in which 318 banks participated, the National City Bank received $14,000,000, and on January 7, 1899, the Government balance in the National City Bank was $20,565,000. On July 8, 1899, the balance in that bank was $10,500,000, showing that the bank had the free use of over $10,000,000 for six months. It will be observed that the Government deposits rose suddenly from $200,000 to millions, and averaged $10,000,000 through six months. There was other correspondence which goes far to establish the charge of the partnership relation existing between the Government in the hands of the Republican party and the Standard Oil magnates. I call special attention to certain extracts from letters of Secretary Gage to the officers of the National City Bank, Stillman, president, and Hepburn, vice-president, and Mr. Stillman's reply to him of October 30, 1897, as furnishing convincing proof of favoritism shown to that bank:

DEAR SIR: * * *. I have expressed a preference for your institution as the original recipient and distributor of the fund.

In reply to your inquiry, or rather expression of hope that a suitable portion of the fund will be left with the bank for a sufficient length of time to offer a reasonable profit, * * * I can only say that while we can make no specific promises in that direction, the purpose we have in using depository banks for the fund * * * will induce us to practice wise discretion in covering the money into the Treasury proper. There probably will be no disbursements from the fund until January 1 * * *

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

Mr. A. B. HEPBURN.

OCTOBER 30, 1897.

DEAR SIR: * * *. I note with pleasure the contents of your letter, received this morning, with reference to the length of time which these deposits will be allowed to remain. * * *.

JAMES STILLMAN,
President National City Bank.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE.

Secretary Gage makes further settlement:

NOVEMBER 10, 1897.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 29th ultimo, and by virtue of the authority conferred upon me, * * * the National City Bank of New York is hereby designated a depository of public moneys, especially to receive deposits only on account of proceeds of the sale of the Union Pacific Railroad. * * *.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

VICE-PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK.

Secretary Gage succumbs again:

APRIL 11, 1898.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which is expressed a wish that the remainder of the deposits on account of purchase of the Union Pacific Railroad be allowed to be held by the special depository banks in New York City until July, and to inform you that due notice will be given you as to time and amount of the proposed withdrawals, should any be required before the time mentioncd in your letter.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

VICE-PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK.

After more than fifty weeks of delay:

DECEMBER 21, 1898.

SIR: This is to advise you that it is the intention of the Department to close the special account of the Treasurer of the United States on account of proceeds of the sale of the Union Pacific Railroad with the several depositories in your city. * * * Accordingly, the Treasurer will draw on your bank each week for that amount, * * * beginning Wednesday, December 28, 1898. * * *.

O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

CASHIER NATIONAL CITY BANK.

I now call attention to a new favor which Secretary Gage arranges:

FEBRUARY 25, 1899.

DEAR MR. STILLMAN: It is probable that by the 15th of March the Treasury Department will realize an advance payment of $12,000,000 or thereabouts on account of the Central Pacific Railway, * * * in view of your suggestion that you would qualify to take any deposits on that account that the Department might see fit to make with you, I now write to inquire whether you would be disposed to put up the bonds required and accept the deposit * * *

LYMAN J. GAGE.

Furthermore, on the 3d day of July, 1899, Secretary Gage sold the custom-house property in New York City to this same Standard Oil bank (National City Bank) for $3,265,000, and the bank simply gave the Government credit for $3,215,000, leaving $50,000 unpaid. The Government received a certificate of deposit for $3,215,000, and the bank retained that amount of money on deposit, without interest, and besides collected from the Government rent amounting to about 4 per cent interest on the deposit of $3,215,000; and this transaction was so made that it saved to the bank the taxes on the property, to wit, about $75,000, the title being withheld by the Government for that purpose.

Mr. Chairman, this jugglery in respect to the sale of the custom-house property deserves especial condemnation, though it exhibits only a part of the favoritism shown this bank, because it involved a violation of law, since the statute under which the sale was made directed expressly the purchase money to be paid into the United States Treasury.

These special favors to the Standard Oil bank were conferred by reason of "very great political claims," and evidence what reckless disregard the administration has for right, justice, and duty.

I have faith in the integrity and patriotism of the people of this country, and I can not believe such gross, flagrant, and wanton abuse of power by the Republican party will by them be long endured. Such prostitution of power to the service of the trusts, syndicates, and banks will surely have "an avenging day," and that day, I confidently believe, is not far distant—it will come with the first opportunity the American people will have—it will be the 6th day of November next. [Applause.]

The Late Hon. William L. Greene.

REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM L. STARK,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 10, 1900,

On the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska.

"Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the business of the House be now suspended to enable his associates to pay proper tribute of regard to his high character and distinguished public services.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect the House, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, do adjourn"—

Mr. STARK said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This hour is set apart by special order of the House as a mark of respect for our deceased colleague, late a Representative from the State of Nebraska, and to enable his associates to point to some useful lesson that may be learned from a review of his life and public services.

I first met him at Hastings, Nebr., at a political meeting held in 1884, and was greatly interested in his speech, which impressed me as being unique in its treatment of the issues of the day, and which was full of quaint sayings. His illustrations were taken from the Scriptures. He announced that he was a "soft-money Democrat;" that Peter Cooper had made the best use of his wealth in founding the Cooper Institute and had taught the best system of finance, and that "he had glued himself to that school."

I met him frequently after that, and recall that he once tried a case in my court. In the early days of Nebraska, whenever a jury trial was in progress it attracted much attention. The people seemed to enjoy the legal tournament, and many would become so engrossed that they would stay for hours to hear the verdict. When the jury were ready to report, the sheriff would hunt up the judge, court would be convened, and the verdict would be read in a stillness that could almost be felt. Then followed a heated discussion as to the merits of the case, and soon you would hear the swish of the quirt as the citizen loped his pony across the prairie to his home. While this was some time ago, it seems but yesterday that judge, sheriff, and spectators were "all cluttered up" in the judge's office, the majority of the men smoking corncob pipes in a fierce sort of way, while Lawyer GREENE for as much as three hours told Indian stories that so interested the audience that when the jury came in everybody looked displeased, as though they feared that meant the end of the entertainment.

When the People's Independent party put up a ticket in our State (1890) Mr. GREENE was one of its leaders and strongest stumpers. In 1893, when the fusion forces had a majority in the legislature, he was a preferred candidate for United States Senator, but not all of the fusionists would vote for him. Factional feeling ran so high that it appeared very doubtful whether an election would result. Mr. GREENE finally succeeded in getting the other candidates together and made them a talk along the line that the cause was greater than any man, and that it was the duty of all to get out of the way so that a new name might be presented which would prove unobjectionable to everybody. He then announced his withdrawal from the race, although he lacked but a few votes, and his counsel and example resulted in the first representation ever secured by the Populists of Nebraska in the United States Senate.

Shortly after this he was elected as one of the district judges of our State, and in that capacity made a most enviable record. In 1896 he was nominated by the People's Independent and Democratic parties for Congressman from the Sixth district of Nebraska, consisting of 33 counties (larger than some States of the Union), and the principal industry of which is cattle raising. It is a hard district to campaign because of its immense area and the scarcity of railroads. Judge GREENE covered this district. I believe he went to every county. Sometimes his evening meeting was 30 or 40 miles from his afternoon appointment and the only way to get there was across the rough and broken country by pony express—that is, in a stout spring wagon, with some half-broken broncbos as the motive power. He was just as much at home standing on a branding shute backed up against a sod corral out on the range as some gentlemen are in making a political speech in an opera house with brass band and torchlight accompaniment, reenforced by a glee club and numerous vice-presidents and applause starters.

Some time ago I noticed in the Judge a picture of a dirty ruffian with a big revolver sitting in a saloon. Upon the bar was placed sixteen glasses in a row and underneath was a printed statement to the effect that "Nimble-toed Mattox from Nebraska would bet anybody $20 to $5 that he could knock the whole row down with one shot." No such incident ever happened in the State of Nebraska and never will, and it is a matter of astonishment to a Western man what fools some Eastern mortals are on the subject of alleged happenings in the West. The stockman of Nebraska is one of our best types. He dresses in accordance with his business, but his person is clean and presentable. He is usually fairly well educated in books and holds a college degree in the teachings of nature. They are law-abiding, self-reliant, with muscles of iron and nerves of steel. The stockman is hospitable to a fault, tries to treat everybody right, and expects fair, square treatment in return.

When a man makes a political speech in that country, he is expected to talk from his heart, to advance nothing but sound argument, and be decent. Their way, when a speech consists principally of abuse of the other side, or when the speaker gets in the attitude of throwing bouquets at himself, is to get up and go away. They regard that man as "trying to run a whizzer on them." Perhaps this is the reason so many Eastern men fail as political speakers in the West. This may seem out of the ordinary in passing a eulogy on a deceased colleague, but I simply describe his environments to call attention to the fact that he lived in a community where worth and sincerity are appreciated, and this explains why, when the news went over the district that Congressman GREENE was dead, the eyes of strong men filled with tears, because they knew that he had been faithful to them everywhere and in every place. They were proud of his oratorical ability. They knew he had faults, but they measured his life not by the weakest link in the chain, but by the sum of his accomplishments; by what he had succeeded, not what he had failed in doing. They knew that he was neither an aristocrat nor a pharisee.

Neither saintly nor selfish, he was not a perfect man. Perfect men are scarce in this world of ours, and those who approximate perfection are not always pleasant companions. He had his faults and would be the last person to desire that a friend should maunder over his memory or seek to attribute to him virtues that he did not possess. He was what he was—robust of mind, big of heart, a kind husband, a loving father, and a man that stayed by his friends. His soul was always in harmony with the heart beat of humanity. I am convinced that the citizenship of Nebraska is on higher ground because of being brought in contact with his life—a genuine life, no veneer, open as the day. I believe that you gentlemen who knew him only in an official capacity have profited by association with his better attributes. So the lesson I learn from the life and public services of this manly man is that it brings the highest measure of success in all fiduciary relations to be genuine, honest, and faithful to those you serve.

Sleep on, brave soul, in the prairies of the State we love so well. You have acted well your part. You have quitted yourself like a man.

At the request of Mrs. Greene, I include in my remarks the funeral sermon on the late Hon. WILLIAM L. GREENE, of Nebraska, Tuesday, March 14, 1899, delivered by Rev. Idell H. Wood, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Kearney, Nebr.:

"Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him; for he knoweth our frame, he remembereth that we are dust."—Psalms ciii, 13, 14.

The silver cord is loosed; the golden bowl is broken; the pitcher is broken at the fountain and the wheel at the cistern; man has gone to his long home and the mourners have gone about the streets. It is not for us to measure the length of the cord, or to tell the capacity of the bowl, or to determine the drawing power of the wheel. He who holds the water in the hollow of His hand, and metes out heaven with a span, and weighs the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance, now has the soul in His own keeping. We may not replace the pieces and say: This was the man. God alone can put the fragments together and estimate their worth.

It is not for the speaker this afternoon to value his place in this community, or to call up memories of his career since boyhood, or to say exactly what was his strength or his weakness. Let me rather stand as one would who felt that in the casket was his own father carved in the marble of death, and it were his own mother that wept, and this was his brother and these were his own afflicted sisters, and this congregation were friends who knew and loved.

God knows our frame, He remembers our frailty, and therefore He pities us as a father his children.

God knows. A skillful instrument maker best knows the qualities of the product of his brain and fingers. He understands its strong points and its weak ones, for he is the creator of it all. So there is One who knows precisely where in our nature we are at fault, where the sweet, loving deeds arise, where tension is strongest, and where resistance can least be made.

He knows the body best because He fashioned it. He is fully aware of all that is involved as a result of such creation. Friends can not appreciate us; they can not rightly measure the good that we possess; they judge from the outward appearance; they do not see behind the result the great motive; they fail to realize that what we do is but a small proportion of what we really are. Friends may say to-day they regard his talents aright, but do they fathom the deeps from which the deed springs? Do they appreciate the outpush of his ambition, the splendid hopes he entertained for the future? We see the bud cut off from the plant and stop with the thought that there is only a bud. Another with better vision has already seen the beauty and the radiance of the flower that is to be. We see the bud of a life; we say that is all; but there is One above who sees the promise of fruitage, knowing what twenty or thirty years more of activity can accomplish. We see the bud; God sees the flower.

Least of all may our opponents judge us. They exaggerate defects, obscure or even forget excellences, are prejudiced, unable to give an impartial verdict. Even a good reputation may be beaten by the scandalous flail of abuse. Nor may we know ourselves. We live for the moment; we are in a maze; we can not summon ourselves to see ourselves. We are a bundle of energies. "The soul is the enigma" to itself. What we are in the depths of our being we can not fathom. The only solution is God.

God knew the frame of our friend. He saw there the struggle which is the heritage of mankind. Anyone who is perfect here will not understand it. Everyone else knows of that battle in the arena of the soul. Everyone else at some time cries out, "Wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?"

And when the good rises triumphant he exclaims, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." With some the contest is not on the surface, and yet it is going on. With others, as the black angel of evil locks shields with the white angel of good, the world sees the conflict and is a spectator of the immediate issue. God knows how hard it all is. He sees the good we long to accomplish, the evil that we wrestle against. Often we stumble and are weary, but we know that the contest will be again renewed.

He knows your sorrows, you who mourn. The heart of the Eternal is most wonderfully kind. He loves with an everlasting love. He knows the heartache and the agony. He knows, too, the kindly deeds of your loved one. Many here will never be informed of all the little acts of kindness, tokens of a forgiving spirit, which were almost forgotten at the time; the desire for the welfare of others. But not so with the Heavenly Father. As you treasure up sacredly the memory of the departed, God is aware of how many tender chords are moving and throbbing.

God remembers. He remembers that we are dust. It is our frailty that appeals to Him. He recalls all the good that has been planned and wrought. He remembers how in yonder room, with genuine sorrow for his fall, he pleaded the forgiveness of this church and won it. And shall the good God be outdone in forgiving power by his sinful creatures? He remembered when he stood and as a preacher of the gospel besought even with tears men should strive after Christ and salvation and hope and all that should prove true and abiding. At the closing of Congress, when others thought only of patriotic songs, his voice started the grand old doxology, and the inspiration passed from one to another until the Hall of Representatives thrilled with the rhythm of that devout hymn of praise, and men who were not supposed to be religious came to him and expressed their appreciation of the lofty sentiment of the time-mellowed strains. Let his friends and his family to-day, even while their eyelids are bedewed with fast-falling tears, try to join their trembling voices, as he would have had them, and repeat:

"Praise God, from whom all blessings flow;
Praise Him, all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host;
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

That scene is not forgotten by the Heavenly Father, nor is anything that is noble and forgiving and patriotic and honest and manly and Christ like and talented and lovable in him. During the last week of his public career he fought for his constituency in favor of one bill and as earnestly labored for their sake against another.

He stood for his district; he purposed having their wishes regarded. There was nothing personal in it. The people he loved had rights that must be respected. Those weary days and protracted nights of indefatigable exertion exhausted his frame. But his honest efforts after a clean record as a Representative will not be forgotten.

The Father of Spirits, to whom he has gone, understood his love for his family. How he was idolized by his friends, respected by his political antagonists, and almost worshiped by his adherents; how he had no enemies, and how he toiled and sacrificed to hasten back with laurels of honest triumph to the place he loved to call his home. "He will not have allowed his faults to be forgotten," some one says. No; the Almighty is just; but He has seen down within the inner circle of the man the great struggle, the fight carried on against his particular sins. You do not know how he suffered and how earnestly he prayed and how fervently he hoped and how strong his convictions were that—

"My mistakes His free grace will cover;
My sins He will wash away,
And the feet that shrink and falter
Shall walk through the gates of day."

That secret is hidden with himself and the One who has all along remembered that He was dealing with the dust.

God pities. He might know us through and through. He might remember every trait and word and act, and it would be little satisfaction for us. But after his thought and remembrance He pities—as the father pities his child, only infinitely more; as the mother her infant, but with surpassingly greater tenderness. So that He invites the widow to leave her fatherless ones in His care and He will be as kind as a husband to her.

The pity of God! It shone forth in the face of His Son as He went forth on His mission. As Jesus wept at the grave of His friend, so God weeps. As when the Saviour said while they drove the iron into His quivering nerves, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," so God pities His offspring even when in their blindness they oppose His will. God is affected by every tear that stains the cheek, at every moan. He aches in every heartache. He agonizes in each struggle. He loves in every noble emotion. He says, "When thou passeth through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee." Bring your grief and your sorrow to Him, for He cares for you. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him, for He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are dust.

He died suddenly. Quick comes the call summoning the soul into the presence of the Creator. It says, "Perhaps thy turn will be the next." Are we ready? You whose hair is whitening fast, have you made wise preparation for the great change?

He labored for the people. What he was to city, district, State, and nation we shall discover more fully when his work is tested by time. How much he was to his family you may surmise, but they alone know.

He would have had me say, "Forgive your enemies. Be charitable, be generous, be brotherly. Wherein I was strong and good and manly, emulate my strength. Where I was weak, be very strong. Honor God and revere His name. Turn your hope to Christ. Behold the Lamb of God."

Representative-Elect from Utah.

OF

HON. WALTER P. BROWNLOW,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 25, 1900,

On the following resolution:

"Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant."

Mr. BROWNLOW said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is a condition, and not a theory, which confronts this honorable and deliberate body. Were it the latter it could be disposed of readily without prolonged discussion, excitement, apprehension, or detriment to any public interest. Theories play no part in shaping events and molding destinies until they ripen into actual and living facts.

Stripped of all quibbling, evasions, sentimental rubbish, and legal technicalities, the question is, Should Brigham H. Roberts, bearing the regular and required credentials of election, be admitted to this floor as the Representative of the State of Utah?

The law bearing on this case and all the relevancies growing out of it has been exhaustively presented pro and con, and if there be any member of this House who is not thoroughly enlightened upon its legal features he has certainly turned a deaf ear to a brilliant, learned, and profitable discussion or has not the mental capacity to understand the English language. To add anything, were I able, to the array of arguments presented by those wise and skilled in law would be a wearisome work of supererogation.

Owing to the tyranny of circumstances my law education was woefully neglected in the rosy and exuberant days of youth. From necessity as well as from choice, I was manufacturing cups, wash pans, dippers, cake pans, coffeepots, and butter and lard cans in a tin shop, or stoking wood on or manipulating the throttle of a railroad engine, when I might have been adsorbing the juicy and refreshing literature of legal tomes. With this disadvantage in early life it can not be reasonably expected that I am such a prodigy as to be able to fathom the profound depths, thread the intricacies, and solve the knotty problems of the law nor determine where the hairsplitting discriminations properly and artistically come in, yet I felicitate myself upon the self-assumption that I can understand a legal proposition that is good common sense and is advanced to protect virtue and honor, manhood and womanhood; to defend and uphold the principles of common honesty and enforce the faithful and complete performance of contracts and obligations.

There is a higher law than that written in constitutions and legislative enactments. It is written on the tablet of every man's heart, and the silent monitor within him is its priest. Individuals are amenable to it first. It is of binding force in every part of God's inhabited universe, Utah, the infant of the Republic, blighted, cursed, and rotten with the moral leprosy of Mormonism, not excepted.

The Decalogue, graved on tables of stone by the hand of God and delivered to the Lawgiver of Israel on the summit of storm-swept and thunder-riven Sinai for the government of all people to "the last syllable of recorded time," gives it simple form and terse and forceful expression.

"Thou shall not commit adultery" is a command direct from the lips of Jehovah and the parliament of heaven. This divine statute against beastly lust and social pollution—against the daring crime and terrific evil of "more wives than one"—is the angelic spirit of the leading feature of moral renovation and the most puissant force of a pure and true civilization. It is the chief corner stone of the social fabric. It setteth the solitary in families; it ennobles and purifies manhood; it honors and glorifies womanhood, and with flaming sword guards its most precious jewel—virtue; it solemnizes and sanctifies the marriage vow; it sacredizes the altar of home and makes its temple shrine the white citadel of purity.

Individuals who brazenly and persistently violate this law sink to the level of brutish instincts and passions, lose all sense of shame and decency and become ultimately the helpless, unpitied, and shunned pariahs of society. In the degradation and pollution of unbridled lust man is no better than a brute, and woman, the angel all gone out of her soul, is as bad as a fiend. The nation that tolerates or patronizes licentiousness, whether the serpent trails the dens, dives, and slums, or shows its eye of fire, tongue of flame, and fang of death amid the tawdry mockeries of religious fanacticism, must forfeit its own instinctive self-respect and abandon all claim to the recognition of the civilized world. In time, however, strong and firmly intrenched, its bulwarks will crumble, its pillars shatter, and it will be forced on the grim registry of wasted powers and decayed glories; it will be swept, small or massive, into the flaming vortex of God's unrestrained wrath.

Years ago this abomination of lechery and moral death known by the sacrilegious name of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints was organized at Nauvoo, Ill. Joseph Smith, the fraud and pretender, who set claim to an immediate revelation of the Divine will engraved on metallic plates, found just where he and some other villainous libertine had placed them, was at its head. It dared and defied God in claiming that polygamy was His express injunction, and that his hot displeasure would rest upon those who refused to obey it. Its creed was the charter of social crime and its adherents shamed the world by their revolting practices. This nightshade of moral poison and death grew in a region where nature spread her royal bounties in forests and level plains of exhaustless fertility and where the inland sea of the Republic afforded unrestricted opportunities for travel and commerce. The impiousness of Mormonism, sinking its infatuated devotees to the level of brutish instincts and passions, flourished as all crime flourishes where there is no sentiment of moral purity and rectitude to arrest its revolting excesses and to resist its daring aggressions.

No doubt Joseph Smith, the revelator and the prophet and the priest of this abomination, fancied that he was secure in his infernal deceptions and the temple of lust which he had built and dedicated to the degradation of the people he was leading to ruin would last at least until he was forced to retire from the service by the infirmities of age.

But Joseph Smith did not know that the consecrated and courageous ambassador of God, that holy character upon whom the polygamist is always ready to vent his implacable hate and impotent rage, was seeking out this plague spot with the Bible in one hand and the standard of a pure civilization and true freedom in the other. The pioneers, who had come from the staid and sturdy communities of the old States and were building home altars in the surrounding regions and who still retained vivid impressions of their moral training in Sunday schools, churches, and in associations with the pure and undefiled, were aroused.

A resistless tornado of public execration assailed this den of libertines and harlots, and Joseph Smith, its presiding deity and genius, was swept from his intrenchments. It was an upheaval, with its counterpart in the earthquake, that shook and sank the fertile stretches of this plague spot. Jo Smith was slaughtered by the outraged and infuriated defenders of a pure home and a pure womanhood, and went in a flash and straight as an arrow to the Mormon's home in the bosom of his Satanic majesty. Righteous retribution!

But the serpent of Mormonism was not killed, only scotched. It could no longer crawl and coil in its filthy slime; no longer hiss and strike in the place of its conception and nativity, and sought and found a new den in a sweet valley in the shadow of the Rockies, near 2,000 miles from the abodes of civilization. Here were fertile plains, crystal waters, all varieties of climate, and a health-insuring altitude. Here were landscapes reposing in the soft silences of dreaming nature. Here were scenic grandeurs that fascinated the beholder by their fantastic and ever-changing forms and awed him by their aspects of terribleness.

Mountain summits hooded with eternal snow sent down the invigorating ozone to the warm plains undulating with the rank luxuriance of perennial grasses, whilst summer evoked every wild flower from the generous soil and spread her green livery over the forests. Snow-fed streams coursed their silvery way in idle beauty. Here was a treasure house with an exhaustless plenitude of material wealth. Here was a paradise for the invalid, farmer, miner, artisan, architect, shepherd, and stock raiser.

After a tramp of hundreds of miles through a trackless wilderness, their harems and bastard progeny along with them, the polygamists, driven from the pale of decent society, here halted, settled, and built their gorgeous palaces of sin and prostitution and their shrines of impious irreligion. Under the peculiar creed and institution of Mormonism the population multiplied like the frogs and flies in Egypt—with the fecundity of maggots in a rotting carcass. They assured and comforted themselves with the dream that, sequestered in these solitudes and hundreds of miles from the borders of a malignant civilization and the persecutions of implacable foes, the edicts of brutal courts, the decisions of bloody juries, and the oppressions of ruffian law officers could never interfere with the largest exercise of their personal liberties; that they could preach and practice the pollutions of Mormonism and build up an empire on its creed and institutions without let or hindrance.

The chiefs of this polygamist enterprise, the sovereigns of the harems, the priests who officiated in the Tabernacle and officered the Endowment House, were not slow in discovering that they had struck "pay dirt," and were not any slower in appropriating for their own special enjoyment and the delectation of their courtesans the advantages and opportunities of their new environment. They projected industrial enterprises and compelled the common trash, whom they held in thrall and fear, to do the menial work without compensation. The libertines and prostitutes led the gayest of lives, the cares and burdens of a multitudinous bastard offspring they placed on others, while they fared sumptuously every day and whiled away the dreamy hours in the elegant leisure, pomp, and glorious circumstance of royal sovereignty. Everything went on swimmingly for Brigham and his favorites; they were kings and queens to all intents and purposes, and their sole occupation was an unbroken revel in the damning sensualism they impiously apotheosized as "the religion and service of Jesus Christ." Orchards, gardens, farms, and stately architecture where the wilderness had been embellished the perfect work of nature. The mountains were full of the finest timber, granite, and the precious metals and were starred with the fires of mining camps. The thrifty Mormon mixed business and the unpaid toil of the ignorant, deluded, and oppressed common class with degrading pollutions and sensualities.

By and by the gentile brother, in his migratory search for better fortune and larger opportunities, penetrated this El Dorado, and was charmed with its beauty, promise, and natural wealth. The panorama unrolling before his astounded vision enchanted him with its strange and varied loveliness, and he pitched his tent for a permanent residence. He had brought with him aspirations for a higher, broader, and worthy life, the civilization of his old home, a robust reverence for the cardinal virtues and the true religion, and the unyielding determination to be a Christian and a gentleman, even among libertines, prostitutes, and savages.

The Mormon chiefs did not welcome this invasion. They regarded the daring and ambitious gentile as an interloper, trespasser, and an emissary of evil, and his coming as "criminal aggression." With a keen remembrance of the bloody scenes at Nauvoo and the slaughter of their chief in fraud and immorality, they saw in it an element of danger—a most perilous menace to their creed, institutions, and practices. Nemesis had tracked polygamy to its lair in the heart of the wilderness, and her pioneer column had come to seek the best positions of offense and defense and mark out the battle line. The Latter-Day Saints fixed on the gentile invader, who never winced nor flinched, the scrutinizing glare of suspicion's keen and watchful eye, and hounded, badgered, ridiculed, and ostracized him, and tried in every conceivable way to harass and defeat him in his plans and enterprises and drive him from the country. But he only thrived and multiplied the more. He nourished and cultivated the elements of "benevolent assimilation" within him. The rapidity of his increase, the prosperity of his undertakings, the courage of his convictions, and his fierce and valorous denunciations of the modern Babylon struck terror to the king of lust enthroned in this fair domain of God.

The apostles conceived and organized a perfect system of oppressions and persecutions, including arson and slaughter, as the midnight burning of gentile homes and the Mountain Meadows massacre will testify to all the ages. The conflict for supremacy then began in terrible earnestness. It was the tiger of polygamy against the lamb of purity, and a corrupt and lecherous priesthood against morality and Christianity. It was the home against the brothel. The gentiles were courageously aggressive and unyielding. The faith and fortitude of the missionary was their inspiration. The "saints" resorted to every excess of desperation to hold and defend their lodge, knowing that driven from it they could find no place of secure seclusion. The people were aroused and realized what a venomous and deadly serpent the nation was holding in its bosom. The Government was forced to take a hand in the conflict. Through the machinery of its Territorial courts it brought the Mormon leaders into apparent subjection, and apparent only. Under the Edmunds Act of 1882 they were indicted, tried, and convicted of adulterous practices and sentenced to the penitentiary, and the very man Brigham H. Roberts, named for the Beelzebub of the Mormon priesthood, and who comes here to insult this body and affront the whole country by his insolent and shameless demand for admission into Congress, was one, and a prominent one, of this infamous layout.

Under Territorial conditions the polygamists could no longer hold their liaisons with their plural prostitutes in the open, and they were compelled to seek the covert for the gratification of their hellish passions. And this is the reason, and the only reason, for such an absorbing desire for Utah to become a star on the flag. After repeated efforts and failures, statehood was only granted on the express condition that the chief feature of the Mormon creed should be relinquished and the occupation of the Mormon chiefs abandoned. They gave this promise, in the form of official sanction and solemnity, to induce the President to turn their convicted felons out of their prison cells. Every Mormon party to this compact was the head devil of a harem and the father of a numerous bastard offspring. These polygamists have no more regard for this compact than for the clouds which sail over Salt Lake City. They are faithful only to their "league with hell and covenant with the devil." They only wanted statehood to escape the condign punishment of the Federal courts and that they might intrench their defiant and sacrilegious creed in the statutes of the State. Polygamy is as rampant in Utah, but only hidden, as it was in the palmy days of Brigham Young.

That the infant of the Republic is in the grip of the whoremonger and swaddled in the scarlet robe of harlotry is fully evidenced in sending to this body a notorious and self-confessed polygamist, a penitentiary bird with at least two concubines and the unshamed father of a bastard offspring, to represent its interests and maintain the charter of its statehood. The State of Mormonism sought admission into the Union to escape the heavy penalties of the Federal courts. This admission was accomplished by deliberate fraud, misrepresentation, and moral perjury, and its statehood rests on a pledge and covenant which is a web of woven wind, openly disregarded and defiantly violated since she, a bedizened and painted prostitute, entered into the pure sisterhood of the States.

Utah, reeking in her immoralities and where the devil of lust is the legislator and the court, has forfeited every right she may have had under the flag and in the council halls of the nation, and now is the time, the set time, for the American people to give emphasis and force to this fact.

If there are no polygamists in Utah, if polygamy has been abandoned as a church creed and a church practice, then there is no slum in any American city but what is a shrine of purity, virtue, and morality.

Brigham H. Roberts may be a man of integrity in the business world; outside of his adulterous life he may be a clean man; he may have the necessary qualification of intelligence; but this only makes his case the more inexcusable and the insolence of his demand to become an integral part of the lawmaking power of the country, under the warrant and commission of the Mormon Church, the more reproachable.

What a disgusting spectacle, what a shock to every feeling of refinement and every elevating sentiment of purity, would a Congress of polygamists be! Can a Congress tolerating, patronizing, and condoning this "sum of all villainy," with all its frightful adjuncts of depravity and soul blight, and according honor and recognition to one who practices and defends this unutterable crime under the unhallowed sanction of religious cant, bigotry, and fanaticism, be morally any better?

I have no feeling of bitterness and hostility toward Mr. Roberts. He is not the head and front of this offending. But in voting against his admission I feel and I know that I am striking a blow at the foul system of immorality of which he is the exponent, representative, and defender. I would not have this great Republic, whose laws we should obey, whose institutions we should cherish, and whose flag we should love and uphold, chained to the monster of Mormonism as the Roman prisoner was chained to a body of death. I would not have the world to know, as it is entering upon the mission of redeeming and renovating other lands, its civilization is tainted with the pollutions of free love and sexual degradation.

I know that Congress is not, and never was designed to be, a Sunday school or a theological seminary, and perhaps will not compare favorably in religious consecration and moral sentiment and practice with a Presbyterian synod, a Methodist conference, a Baptist association, or a convocation of Roman Catholic prelates; yet it should ever stand, as the tribunal of the people, for the nobility of man, the honor and glory of womanhood, and the virtue and purity of the American home. And to this duty I most cheerfully and eagerly give my heart, voice, and vote in shielding my country, its virtue-loving and God-fearing people, this House, and myself as well from the shame and humiliation that the admission of Roberts would bring with the same certainty that disease and age brings death.

Representative-Elect from Utah.

OF

HON. SAMUEL W. McCALL,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 25, 1900,

On the following resolution:

"Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant."

Mr. McCALL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Deeming the constitutional questions involved in the case of the member from Utah of grave importance, I desire to avail myself of the general leave which the House has granted and put upon the record a brief expression of my views.

Both the majority and the minority of the special committee to which this case was referred found that Roberts was legally elected to this House by the people of Utah, that he has been for seven years a citizen of the United States, and possesses the other constitutional qualifications for the office. They find also that he is a polygamist, and the majority reports a resolution excluding him from the House without permitting him to take the oath, and declaring his seat vacant. I find myself unable to accept such a conclusion. The right of representation lies at the very basis of our institutions. It is the one right which we should expect to find guarded by the Constitution.

The proposition to exclude a legally elected and qualified Representative for any cause which a bare majority of the House may at any time see fit to assign is the proposition put forth by the majority of the committee. If that is a sound proposition, then the right of a State to representation is indeed limited. The choice by a constituency is made subject to ratification by a majority of the members of the House. It requires no argument to show that if the House can set up the test proposed in this case it can set up any test. It can exclude a man, if it sees fit, because he has no property, or because he is rich, or on account of the color of his hair. The will of a majority of the House is set above the law and the Constitution. I believe that such a power, in the highest degree in derogation of the rights of the individual constituency, should have a clear warrant in the Constitution.

So far, however, from being clearly in favor of this proposition, the clause of the Constitution relied upon by the majority can not fairly bear any such construction. That clause is as follows:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Under this provision has it ever been seriously urged, even in the most partisan contested-election cases, that under the pretext of judging of the elections and returns the House could hold an election of members in its Hall and make returns? I imagine that no such idea has ever entered into the mind of any man. But that would be as rational as the contention that the power given the House to judge of the qualifications of its members gives it the authority to create new qualifications.

The power given in each case is not that of electing or of creating qualifications, but simply of judging. What qualifications is the House to judge of? Any arbitrary ones that it may see fit to set up after an election has been held and which the constituencies never heard of, and to which, therefore, they could not conform? Clearly it is to judge whether those qualifications exist which are set forth in that very article of the Constitution. Having enumerated qualifications upon a matter of fundamental right, the Constitution did not leave it open to the whim of the Legislature, much less to the whim of the House, to add or take from these qualifications.

To my mind, the phraseology of the Constitution is clear, and I do not think any extraneous help is needed for the purposes of construction; but if we go outside the instrument and consider those things which are usually considered in construing doubtful provisions, the meaning of the clause in question is emphasized. It was urged by those who opposed inserting qualifications for Representatives in the Constitution that if they were set forth in that instrument the Legislature would have its hands tied and could impose no new ones. No one even then thought, apparently, that the House alone could prescribe them. But those who favored an enumeration of qualifications prevailed in the convention. Madison said that—

Qualifications of electors and elected were fundamental articles in a republican government and ought to be fixed by the Constitution. If the Legislature could regulate those of either, it can by degrees subvert the Constitution.

The Federalist, which is the great contemporary interpreter of the Constitution, declared that the qualifications of Representatives had been fixed and were unalterable by the Legislature. Take, then, the fundamental character of the right which we should expect to find rooted in a constitution establishing a popular government, the words themselves of that instrument, the debates in the convention, the most authoritative contemporary construction, and add the opinion of the great writers upon the Constitution, like Story and Cooley, and can there be any reasonable doubt as to the construction?

This view is further strengthened by another consideration. The Constitution requires a two-thirds vote to expel a member. If the right of the people to be represented by the man of their choice was so dear and cherished a right in the eyes of the framers of the Constitution that a member might assault the Speaker, might by violence stop the House in the transaction of its business, and might bring it into reproach by the vilest conduct, and yet could be expelled only by a two-thirds vote, how monstrous is this present contention that, although a Representative were unanimously chosen and had every qualification set forth by law, a bare majority of the House can exclude him for any cause it sees fit to assign. How inefficient and nugatory is the safeguard of the two-thirds vote when a bare majority can exclude.

But we are told the precedents sustain the claim that the power of exclusion exists. This House has never shown a great veneration for precedents in election cases, and it rarely decides such a case in which it does not overrule precedents, but in my opinion the condition of the precedents is damaging to the majority proposition. With but a single exception, every one of them which has been adduced was based upon the alleged treason of the member-elect and arose during and just after the civil war, when the Government was struggling for its life or so far as possible to secure by the laws the future of the country against the recurrence of so tremendous a struggle. It was at a time when the Constitution was strained, if not broken, in every part, and necessarily so, in the supreme effort to save the Union.

The precedent I have excepted is found in the case of Whittemore, who had resigned to escape expulsion, and, having secured a reelection, returned to that very House and at the same session. The House apparently treated the proceeding as an attempt to evade its authority and met him at the threshold by an adverse vote. The debate, too, shows that the question now at issue was hardly alluded to, and it was not such a debate as should have preceded the settlement of a great constitutional right. These precedents all arose in the ten years during and following the war. For the other one hundred years of the history of this House not a solitary precedent has been produced. It is hardly conceivable that during that century there have not been men of all kinds of character and reputation elected to the House; men who were notoriously guilty of violating the laws. The fact that in all that time there has arisen no case in which the House attempted to pass on the character of a man whom a constituency had chosen is a pretty strong circumstance and tends to show that there was no general belief in the existence of the power.

It can as strongly be argued that a bench of judges has the inherent power to exclude from its membership any man who should be chosen to it who, in the opinion of the majority of the court, was not fit to be a member, and who, by his character, might bring reproach upon the bench. The members of the court are chosen by the President and Senate, but the members of the House are chosen by the people, who, in theory at least, are the superiors of every one of their official agents, however chosen. An unworthy judge can be removed in impeachment proceedings by two-thirds of the Senate, but an unworthy member can be removed in expulsion proceedings by two-thirds of the House. In my opinion the proposition of the majority involves a clear and flagrant usurpation of power, and is a blow aimed at one of the most fundamental of all the rights of the people under our Constitution.

But it is said that the homes must be protected. However important that may be, it can not justify this proposed proceeding. Our homes can not be in the long run protected by the destruction of our institutions. As the gentleman from Missouri aptly said, those who urge this argument as a justification for overriding the Constitution "stand with a rope in their hands." The proposition involves the very essence of lynch law. If we are to set aside the Constitution in one case, however flagrant it may be, we will soon be called upon to set it aside in another case, possibly for base partisan motives. Our only safety lies in following the straight path. Macaulay, in the following passage from one of his essays, very well illustrates the advantage to a nation of adhering, even in extreme cases, to the maxims of a well-ordered liberty:

> Ariosto tells a pretty story of a fairy, who, by some mysterious law of her nature, was condemned to appear at certain seasons in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her during the period of her disguise were forever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed. But to those who, in spite of her loathsome aspect, pitied and protected her, she afterwards revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their houses with wealth, made them happy in love and victorious in war. Such a spirit is Liberty. At times she takes the form of a hateful reptile. She grovels, she hisses, she stings. But woe to those who in disgust shall venture to crush her! And happy are those who, having dared to receive her in her degraded and frightful shape, shall at length be rewarded by her in the time of her beauty and her glory.

The House has a very clear power for its protection. The Constitution gives it the power of expulsion. By a singular process of mind those who are so free in their interpretation of the Constitution as to imply or imagine the far-reaching power of exclusion, limit the meaning of its plain language with reference to expulsion. The power of expulsion is expressed, and is in the broadest possible terms. The House can exercise it for any cause which may seem good to two-thirds of its members. The committee has found that Roberts is now a polygamist. There can be no doubt of the power of the House to expel him. I believe that the power of expulsion should be exercised with great caution and for no slight cause, but to my mind the cause in this case is sufficient. The power, at least, is clear. There would be no usurpation. I would far rather follow that course than the dangerous procedure which is proposed, and which, if followed, will create the only deliberately established precedent in our history in time of peace, a precedent that will very likely be applied hereafter to the great detriment of the country.

The Late Garret A. Hobart.

OF
HON. JOHN J. GARDNER,
OF NEW JERSEY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, January 26, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of GARRET A. HOBART, late Vice-President of the United States.

"Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate"—

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The frequency with which this body is called upon to pay the last sad tribute to the memory of the eminent dead is a most forceful reminder of man's mortality. Verily, "He cometh forth like a flower and is cut down." The generations appear like the leaves of spring and flourish for a season only, then, smitten by the breath of the Destroyer, fall, even as the leaves that wither and scatter in autumn's searing blasts. But the earth itself, the abode of man, shall perish; the visible heavens shall pass away; for there is nothing permanent but the law and the love and the kingdom of God.

We pause in our labors to-day to do homage to the memory of one who was not a member of this House, but who, in his high office, represented the suffrage and the majesty of the great Republic.

GARRET A. HOBART had, from his early manhood, been singled out by common consent in his own State as the personality most abounding in promise of great service and future honor to his State; but he was greater perhaps than we knew, for when he rose to a commanding position among the nation's lights, it was seen that he was in his sphere; and when he died, all knew that a luminary of great power had fallen from the national sky.

The career of Mr. HOBART is another of those oft-recurring lessons of the opportunities offered to young American manhood, and demonstrated that energy, integrity, and courage, if seconded by real ability, may conquer all the weary paths that lie between the lowly and the highest estate and lead triumphantly to the most exalted station; for he rose with no aid but his merit, with no friend but his deserts, and with no claim to recognition but his fitness.

GARRET AUGUSTUS HOBART was born on a farm near Long Branch, N. J., in 1844, of New England and New Jersey ancestry which ran back to the English and the Dutch.

Quickness of perception and comprehension, energy, physical and mental stamina, fidelity to duty, high courage, and an entire veracity of mind were his by inheritance and were ineradicable. It is difficult to believe he ever had a vice to overcome.

Young HOBART was educated in the common schools and by his father, until he entered Rutgers College, from which he was graduated in 1863, before he was 19 years of age. After a brief period as an educator he began the study of law in Paterson, N. J., under the tutelage of his father's friend, also of New England stock, Socrates Tuttle, a gentleman of great ability, fine attainments, and splendid character. He was graduated from Mr. Tuttle's office, and admitted to the bar of New Jersey; then began his real career.

Mr. HOBART later was united in marriage with Miss Jennie Tuttle, daughter of his legal preceptor. Of that union I shall speak but briefly now, for to dwell upon it would seem like the mingling of notes of discord with the funeral dirge, and an unpardonable rudeness to her who did so much to hedge round his life with happy environment and to crown his days with joy. Let it suffice to say that the story of their wedded life and home in Paterson, when told, will be "A sweet savor wherever happy homes are recognized as the citadel of virtue and the hope of the world."

Mr. HOBART grew at once in professional and in public esteem. Had his abilities been entirely and continuously devoted to his profession, he would have attained the very first rank among its masters, for his great talents were legal and judicial to the last degree. In all his business life he never had use for any lawyer but a "close lawyer." But the public and the great business interests would not allow Mr. HOBART to practice his profession as he would then have desired. He was ever pursued with offers of office and of business. He was sought with proffers of opportunity which other gifted men strove for in vain.

Before he was 27 years of age he had been the legal counsel of his city and his county and was being asked to go to the legislature to mold the laws. He was elected to the assembly and afterwards to the senate of New Jersey. Whatever political body Mr. HOBART entered, he was placed at its head. The New Jersey assembly made him its presiding officer; the New Jersey senate made him its president; the State Republican executive committee made him its chairman, in which capacity he conducted many of our most important campaigns. He also represented New Jersey in the national Republican committee for many years, and nobody ever thought of a successor.

Whatever Mr. HOBART did was so well done that opportunity, as I have said, was ever seeking him. I have never heard a criticism of his management of a business matter. Governments and courts felt secure in the management of their charges when in his hands. His great capacity and integrity, winning universal confidence, must have, as they did, rewarded his business efforts and discretion with affluence.

nI the career of Mr. HOBART there was nothing sensational or episodical. He never sought but rather shunned notoriety. His aims were definite; his purpose steady as the granite hills; his efforts as sustained as the motions of the planet. To every task he brought the energy of a splendid hope. With him all objects were specific and every duty great, and to his conviction of duty, his definite aims, his tireless energy, and steady purpose, quietly pursued, are largely due the success and honors that crowned his life.

He was a man of most magnificent courage, never more composed and hopeful than in the hour of defeat. When he had given to the service of his party all his splendid abilities during one campaign after another, closing with apparent disaster, he could regret without being cast down, deplore and be not discouraged; and even in that campaign in his State when he sought to realize the political ambition of his life, and when success had seemed assured until the last days of the contest, when the tides changed and new forces overwhelmed him; and his hosts of loyal friends were downcast and discouraged, he appeared as a rock left by a melting shore, which still lifts its head in majesty above the waters and forms a headland about which the yielding currents must eddy and rebuild the broken line.

So, too, in that sad day when he returned to his country leaving his beloved daughter, in a foreign soil, dead on the threshold of womanhood; though his heart was bleeding, he turned the same pleasant face to the world, and, while a little drawn perhaps, the old smile was there. And at the last, conscious of his own approaching dissolution, when the soul makes the awful query that most affects all that live and die, he smiled with the fortitude and hope and confidence of a hero and a Christian martyr.

Mr. HOBART was endowed with more admirable and enviable qualities than any one man I ever knew. All men agree that his was a most lovable personality. Informed men spoke of his acquirements; churchmen, of his rectitude and deep religious convictions; the philanthropist, of his unostentatious charity; business men marveled at his business judgment; politicians wondered at his clear perception of the character and the value of issues; statesmen, at his wide and ready knowledge of national and international affairs; and all alike, at his ready powers of solution, readily mastering problems, however weighty and however intricate. His sympathy was as broad as the field of human struggle, and all classes felt its touch, so that when the dreaded message of his departure flashed over the country, the bitter tear fell at every hearthstone, for all alike felt the loss of a friend.

When Mr. HOBART was nominated for the Vice-Presidency, factions in New Jersey at once lost their identity and party lines became confused. Regard for policies largely gave way to confidence in the man. What part of the 89,000 majority the State gave in that election was due to the personality of Mr. HOBART and the esteem in which he was held as a man can never be accurately stated, but it may be safely stated the result was a magnificent tribute from the citizenship of New Jersey to her gifted son—an expression of confidence in his patriotism, abilities, and exalted character.

His example has been a beneficent influence in the community in which he lived and died, in the State which he served and honored, in the nation which came to know and honor him, and to the civilized world which has now heard of him and his life, which, in its business energy and integrity, private Christian purity, and fidelity to every trust imposed, is a model for all men in all countries. He adorned society, lent a dignity to common affairs, and elevated every office he filled.

He died as the Christian dies, and he will be remembered here; therefore he has triumphed over death "in time and eternity."

HON. JOSHUA S. SALMON,
OF NEW JERSEY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, January 26, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of GARRET A. HOBART, late Vice-President of the United States.

"Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate"—

Mr. SALMON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I would not attempt at this time to add to what has been so well said in the Senate and in this House upon the life of our lamented Vice-President, were it not that his home was so near my own and my acquaintance with him had been so pleasant. It is natural for men to value an acquaintance with one who has risen to a position of honor and distinction. The memory of such acquaintance is inspiring and encouraging.

I first met Mr. HOBART in 1878, when he was a member of the New Jersey senate and I of the house of assembly. I well remember his quiet, genial manner, and his smooth yet decided way in dealing with matters requiring his attention. He never impressed his partisanship upon those who differed with him, while at the same time he was earnest and strong in his efforts to secure his object. I met him occasionally between our first acquaintance and his election as Vice-President, and he always exhibited the same genial manner and courteous dignity.

Mr. HOBART had a comprehensive mind with quick perception, and he was thoroughly executive in character. He wielded his power not by physical force or menacing threats, but by an irresistible force of reason and persuasion that so rarely accompanies the strong will and determined purpose. His tact in leading others to accept his conclusions was more than ordinary.

Goethe said, "The difference between great and little men is in the amount of energy applied to their undertakings." Mr. HOBART was a hard worker. He applied his mind closely and incessantly to his business. I know of his expressing weariness and a lack of satisfaction in mere business success before his election to the Vice-Presidency. His soul was too great to be satisfied by the mere accumulation of wealth. Though it may not be said that he made opportunities, yet by his fortunate location opportunities were offered, and he had the grasp and energy of mind to take advantage of and develop them.

The city of Paterson, to which, from his native county of Monmouth, he came when a young man, has been progressive beyond most Eastern cities. Since the civil war it has grown from a mere town to a city of about 100,000 people. It is a thoroughly manufacturing city. Its industries are and always have been varied. Its iron manufactories and silk mills are extensive. Because of the great number and varied character of its silk factories it has been called the "Lyons" of America. With this enterprising people Mr. HOBART made his home when a young man, and there he found opportunities for the employment of his rare energy and tact.

The lessons taught by his life are different from those taught by the lives of most men whose names are honored in our country's annals. Few indeed are they who, having gained high political station as well as eminent business success, retain the esteem and love of their fellow-men to the time of their death as he did.

Mr. HOBART has been called from this life at an age when he might reasonably have been expected to be in the vigor of health and mental activity. He was but little past 55 years old at the time of his death.

> He gave his honors to the world again,
> His blessed part to heaven, and slept in peace.

The years he lived fell far short of the allotted length of man's life; yet if we measure life by what is accomplished, there have been few in our country who have lived as long as he lived.

If any are discouraged and feel that they can not succeed, they will find in the history of his life an inspiration to hope and persevere; if any are inclined to believe that kindness and courtesy are not proper elements in the character of the strong and successful man, they should recall the scene at the funeral of the deceased Vice-President, where thousands gathered and with bowed heads attested their sorrow because of his untimely demise.

> Patriots have toiled, and in their country's cause
> Bled nobly; and their deeds, as they deserve,
> Receive proud recompense. We give in charge
> Their names to the sweet lyre. The historic Muse,
> Proud of the treasure, marches with it down
> To latest times; and Sculpture, in her turn,
> Gives bond in stone and ever-during brass
> To guard them, and to immortalize her trust.

The Late Hon. Lorenzo Danford.

HON. R. B. GORDON,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Saturday, January 20, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for paying tributes to the memory of Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Ohio.

"Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

"Ordered, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate"—

Mr. GORDON said:

Mr. SPEAKER: After an active life, an eventful career, Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, crowned with military laurels and civic honors, passed into the great hereafter. Gentlemen who served with him in the House of Representatives and knew him intimately have portrayed in fitting language his personal qualities and public services. They have detailed his birth in Ohio, his admission to the bar and subsequent practice of his profession, his military duty, wherein conspicuous bravery brought promotion, and his Congressional service.

In speaking of the dead, intimate association alone qualifies one to discuss those attributes of personality which, after all, make the man as we know him. I regret that fortune did not favor me with such relationship to Mr. DANFORD. But his public worth as a soldier, a citizen, and statesman is known of men, and I wish to place on record my tribute to one who was prominent in many walks of life, and each illumined by his purity of purpose and deed and his consecrated devotion to duty. His was a well-rounded life, and when the inexorable summons came it found him in the service of his State and country.

Mr. Speaker, it is a wise course which the Federal Congress pursues in suspending its strict legislative functions to review the lives and public services of Senators and Representatives who die while in the discharge of their official duties. In honoring them honor is reflected upon itself. It furnishes to the youth of the country lessons in patriotism and public and private virtue which are all the more forceful in that they are examples rather than precept. The study of such lives gives inspiration to many toiling beneath oppressive burdens and directs the efforts of the living generation, as it will of generations to come, to higher and nobler aims.

Especially is this true in a country having the institutions of our own, where titles of nobility and hereditary rank are unknown. In repudiating the divine right of kings, the wise forefathers also disavowed the superiority of selected strains of blood. And so the life of everyone who, from the ranks of what the immortal Lincoln termed the common people, rose to eminence in public life or private station stimulates to better endeavor the youth of our country. In this category Mr. DANFORD'S life stands preeminent.

Mr. Speaker, death affords a vast field for philosophic study and historical research. It is a subject so infinite that the finite mind, whether endowed in abundance or favored in less fortunate degree, has never reached a conclusion which dissipated doubt. But with the faith that is in us, it is sweet to believe that on some favored shore the hosts assemble in eternal peace.

LORENZO DANFORD lived a Christian life and died a Christian death. In every relation of life he did his duty as an enlightened judgment dictated and a quickened judgment approved. On the anniversary of his birthday, when he had attained the three-score and ten years allotted to man, he fell asleep.

"Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

On the Late Garret A. Hobart.

OF

HON. MARTIN H. GLYNN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 26, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of GARRET A. HOBART, late Vice-President of the United States.

"Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate."—

Mr. GLYNN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In behalf of a number of my fellow-Democratic Congressmen from New York State, I lay a laurel wreath at the door of the tomb of GARRET A. HOBART. My words but echo their thoughts; their thoughts but reflect the feelings of their hearts; their heart-feelings but mirror forth the opinions and beliefs of the American people. Mine was not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the distinguished statesman whose memory we revere to-day. Had it been, I would feel myself better qualified to speak the eulogy which I am about to utter, but public men live in their works as authors live in their books and as artists abide in their pictures—there to be the subject forever of discussion at the pens of writers, the tongues of speakers, and the minds of critics. No one living to-day had a personal acquaintance with Jefferson, Shakespeare, or Michael Angelo, yet who living to-day in this broad land can be said to be unacquainted with Angelo, Shakespeare, and Jefferson, who live, though dead? In the analogy of this thought lies my reason for uttering the following sentiments of respect, shared in common by my Democratic conferees.

To voice a proper description of GARRET A. HOBART would be to delineate the last four years of the political history of the United States, to epitomize the political incidents of the State of New Jersey for a decade at least, and to narrate many chapters in the commercial annals of the upbuilding of American commerce and the fostering of American manufacturing. However much one may differ with the political principles advocated by the late Vice-President, he must confess that in the workings of his own personal career, in the undertakings of his legal profession, and in the consummation of his business plans, GARRET A. HOBART was a constructor and not a destroyer. Most men die without creating; few die without destroying. He has lived well upon the tombstone of whose grave can be carved the verity, "Herein lieth a man who was a creator and not a destroyer." In his tribute President McKinley paid as grand a eulogy to the memory of GARRET A. HOBART as man could utter when in his last message to Congress he said:

> His private life was pure and elevated, while his public career was ever distinguished by large capacity, stainless integrity, and exalted motives. He has been removed from the high office which he honored and dignified, but his lofty character, his devotion to duty, his honesty of purpose, and noble virtues remain with us as a priceless legacy and example.

In the life of GARRET A. HOBART can be found the lesson that inspiration comes of working every day. He, as much as any other man of his time, has given proof that genius is encompassed in the ability of doing a hard day's work and doing it on every working day in the year. He did all things well because he did all things intensely. He had learned that in things where the heart is not, the hand is never powerful. From his life we learn that greatness flows not from chance, nor from a mere happy combination of events, but simply from the magic of unwavering determination, clear apprehension, and ceaseless toil. GARRET A. HOBART became a great man because he possessed these qualifications and because they enabled him to fill great occasions. He had the abilities, the confidence, and the stamina to meet momentous occasions, and therefore such occasions marked him and called him to be what the successes of his abilities, confidence, and stamina would make him. Jackson, Lincoln, Clay, Blaine, and Tilden all drew their greatness from this same fountain head; aye, more, all the great master spirits, all the founders and lawgivers of empires, all the defenders of the rights of men, all the upbuilders of the greatness of a nation, are made by these same laws.

It is fitting that we should pause in the rushings of our work-a-day world to pay tribute to a man who, by the sheer force of ability, carved his way from "a man with the hoe" to be the occupant of the seat of the Vice-Presidency of the United States. Only from the facts of a life like this is composed substantial thought. All other thought is mere speculation, mathematical philosophy, a puncture by the rapier of probability into the clouds of guess-land. It is well that we should pause and reflect upon the incidents of such a life, because, when events daily increase in the growing magnitude of a nation like ours, history becomes a dwarf and passes into biography and there is need in the rapidity of national advancement for the microscope to be placed on every honored son of the Government, so that he may be seen in his true grandeur and taken at his true worth. To the student the life of GARRET A. HOBART must drive home the fact that glory is only a furrow in the dust, but at the same time it can not help teaching that it is worth while to stamp that dust under foot, so as thereon to leave an impression by which the world and posterity may know that we have once journeyed along the road of life.

Some one has said that death transforms an opponent into a friend. In a political sense this can not be said to apply to the man whose loss we mourn to-day. Even his hardest political opponents never allowed the smoke of the fiercest political battles to blind their vision as to the sterling worth of HOBART. They recognized that in politics, as in war, the greatest men are those who never capitulate. They realized that while men of different political faiths differ as to everything on earth, they may some day be united in what is larger than everything mundane, in what embraces the sum total of life and thought——the arms of Providence. History teaches us that as great men see the right more rightly than small or mediocre minds, so they see the false more falsely. The knowledge of this fact brings to opponents in politics a brotherhood and a manliness that almost deify differences of opinion and sweeten the acrimonies of opposition.

From a farmer's son GARRET A. HOBART worked his way through college and made himself a legal light of his State and a power in the politics of the nation. His ascendancy was like the atoms of the soiling charcoal that we little value, becoming by wise combinations and gradual arrangements the resplendent diamond which every eye admires. Grandly, indeed, in all the workings of his life did this son of the masses attest the fact that from the pure, untainted blood of the common people come the rulers of the world. Grandly did he perform his business functions for his associates, his official functions for his country, and accomplish projects which scores of mediocre minds could never accomplish. The people of his native State loved him, his business associates loved him, his opponents respected him, and men are not wont to cherish so deeply that which is not deserving of their love and admiration. According to Edmund Burke—

> Reproach is concomitant with greatness; envy grows in a direct proportion with fame, and censure is the tax that every man must pay the public for being eminent.

In the main these assertions are true, but in the history of GARRET A. HOBART is found the exception which proves the rule of their truthfulness. Throughout all his undertakings Mr. HOBART exercised an indomitable will to acquire and retain success. He found no joys in the intrigues of the wanton courtier; his heart was not wedded to the revels of pleasure; his soul always took flight beyond the ticklings of sense. With him one great goal was always in view and the desire to reach it was father of all his efforts. Such ambition has served the world in good stead. It has worked like the desire of the philosopher's stone on the chemists of old. The object of their search was truly a chimera, nevertheless it was productive of a real good in the shape of modern chemistry. In like manner civilization owes inestimable advantages to such ambition as HOBART'S, though the honor which is the object of its quest may prove a will-o'-the-wisp. It was the spur that goaded HOBART on from business triumph to business triumph, from office to office, only in the end to find himself Vice-President and this country the richer for his ambition. It is the motive power that has ever kept the wheel of progress in motion and prevented the world from loitering on the path to advancement. Far be it from my intention to canonize Mr. HOBART. In his career he must have made some mistakes—else he would not have been a man—but that man is the greatest who makes the fewest, and HOBART'S missteps are far outweighed by his many noble deeds and kind offices. In fact, to whatever shortcomings may have been his we can apply the words of the poet:

Motes in the sunshine, foam-bells on the ocean,
Cloud shadows flitting o'er the mountain's breast—
His faults but marked the mighty play, the motion
Of a grand nature in its grand unrest.

To say that GARRET A. HOBART was an eloquent man would be to do injustice to the great men who have attained eminence by the arts of Demosthenes and the attributes of Cicero, and at the same time to make that assertion would be to cast a shadow of disrespect upon that grand instrument by which Mr. HOBART achieved distinction, that most potential of instruments within the grasp of man—personal influence. Those who carefully note the comparative value of lives in a community soon learn that the element which counts for most is that subtle thing called personal influence. In it there is something more potent than money or speech, a mystic force which flows out from it and magnetizes all that come within its range. It is to the successful man what fragrance is to the flower, what light is to the lamp. It is part and parcel of his personality; yet it reaches outside and beyond himself. That GARRET A. HOBART was endowed with this magnetic power in a remarkable degree is evinced from the facts stated in this House to-day by the gentleman who knew him well and knew him long. The value of this personal influence was greatly augmented by a great human sympathy and a massive manly sense, communicating to his associates and allies new life and energy, touching and unsealing in their breasts the springs of resolution and self-help, and flooding them with soul-cheer.

In life there is nothing except what we put in it. In the fifty-three years of his life GARRET A. HOBART crowded so much work, so many successes, so numerous duties as to merit from the American people that most eloquent tribute paid to Goethe by the Emperor of Germany when he met him and exclaimed: "You are a man." Michelet has gone into raptures over the force of that compliment paid to the great German poet, and the American people may well be pleased that there died in harness as the second highest official in the land a man who could well be called "a man." From his generosity we know that he appreciated the fact that flowers fade without dew and light. From his amiable personality we are sure that he realized the imperishable truths that charity and love are the dew and light of the human heart. He was not of the pessimistic mind, which holds that while nations ascend in civilization, governments descend in administration. He was not of those who are constantly living in the dusk of the past, but rather one of those who by the light of the past purpose to see to it that the administration of governments keeps step with the civilization of nations. From the fate of Lot's wife being turned into a statue of salt for turning back, he had garnered the determination to press ever onward in accordance with the thought that he only lives who acts in the present and thinks of the future.

Despite the millions and millions of people on earth, the world knows only two kinds of minds—minds that are metaphysical pure and simple and metaphysical only, and minds that are not. In Robespierre and St. Louis we have examples of the mere metaphysical mind. Those that are not metaphysical are more or less fatalistical. The minds that work out the most for the amelioration of mankind are the minds that are not only metaphysical, but also reflective of their antithesis. In Charlemagne and St. Augustin we have the greatest examples of this sort of mind, while in HOBART it is duplicated in essence, though perhaps not in totality. It is such a mind that makes man the ardent believer in the dispensations of an all-wise Providence, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York, the leader of the majority, represent Mr. HOBART to have been.

In his religious inclinations and political enthusiasm he must have been somewhat akin to Cardinal de Berulle. Students of French history will remember that when La Rochelle, under Louis XIII, resisted Richelieu so handsomely, Richelieu became frightened and wanted to effect a treaty. Cardinal de Berulle persuaded Richelieu to deviate from this course on account of a certain something, he knew not what, which he called "trust in God." Richelieu, a strong-minded man, made fun of him and insolently asked De Berulle when God was to keep his promise. De Berulle replied with magnificent simplicity, "I am without enlightenment, but not without thoughts, and, since you command, I will tell them to you. I count on La Rochelle as I counted on the Island of Rhe. I expect success, not from the siege, nor from the assault, nor from the blockade, but from some prompt and unexpected effort." And so with HOBART; if he thought his cause was right, he was ready to fight—to fight calmly, easily, diplomatically, so as to make little bluster and but few enemies, but confident that he must win, because he thought he had right with him and because he believed that right would somehow win, even if it had to be helped from above by "a prompt and unexpected effort."

The political career of GARRET A. HOBART affords an interesting comparison between the politics of to-day and the politics of years ago. Cæsar Borgia was a giver of battles with poison. Bonaparte was a giver of battles with cannon. HOBART was a giver of battles with diplomacy, sagacity, and parliamentary etiquette, and so typifies the methods of the present as against the methods of the past, as found in Borgia and Napoleon in the olden days, when they were wont to destroy men so as not to destroy nations by allowing them to hurl themselves one against another. In those days personalities occupied the whole space of the political arena, masses none. In our day the masses are the unit of the political battle, personalities simply the kindling wood of a little enthusiasm. Battles took place then between prince and prince. A mere ordinary man was an obstacle, and was treated as such. That was called politics, and, bad as it was, for those who love humanity it was better than war. Politics then was a game between elevated heads; now it is a contest between millionaire, lawyer, laborer, and men in general, in which GARRET A. HOBART has proved that in the United States of America the son of a poor farmer can, by his own merit and his own ability, become a Cæsar of the purest type and a Napoleon in both finance and politics of the greatest influence. The lives of Cæsar Borgia and Napoleon show that murder and force were the instruments of success in the politics of olden days. The life of HOBART gives proof that the political triumphs of to-day are the victories of intellectual supremacy—not perhaps of one man, but of some party, some principle, as represented by supporters and champions.

GARRET A. HOBART is no more. In the councils of his party there is a vacant chair; in the halls of our National Legislature there reigns an air of mourning; in the business circles of the country there are being written resolutions of respect and memorials of condolence; but for all this sorrow there is consolation in the fact that while he lived he was a power among men; consolation in the knowledge that in honor of his memory the hand of History will write upon her everlasting tablets and beneath the name of GARRET A. HOBART:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

The Gage Resolution.

HON. WILLIAM D. DALY,
OF NEW JERSEY,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 19, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the pension appropriation bill—

Mr. DALY of New Jersey said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is not my intention to discuss the merits of the appropriation bill pending, but rather to take advantage of the opportunity offered by Congress, sitting as a Committee of the Whole, to discuss some features of the "Gage resolution" and the answer of the Secretary thereto.

All the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury in reference to the sale of the custom-house property in the city of New York were conferred by virtue of an act of Congress entitled "An act to supplement and amend an act entitled 'An act for the erection of a new custom-house in the city of New York, and for other purposes,'" which act was approved March 2, 1899.

Among other things it provided that—

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale to the highest bidder, after due advertisement, but for not less than $3,000,000, the present custom-house property in the city of New York, bounded by Wall, Williams, and Hanover streets and Exchange place, and to deposit the proceeds of the sale, after payment of the usual incidental expenses, in the United States Treasury.

Contrary to the provisions of this act, the Secretary deposited the amount of the consideration, namely, $3,000,000 or more, in the National City Bank (the purchaser), without depositing it in the United States Treasury, as required by law, thus giving that bank the use of this money for an indefinite period.

No other power was conferred or could be conferred except by these provisions. They were plain and explicit. There was nothing in the act or surrounding the act that in the least admitted of doubt, but it was a positive declaration that the proceeds of this sale should be deposited in the United States Treasury. If the money was to be deposited in any other place, such as a depositary, I have no doubt the statute would have so declared. By what system of reasoning they could extend this act to mean a United States depositary named by the Secretary of the Treasury, I do not know.

No better principle of law can be applied to this declaration of the statute than the principle in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, volume 23, page 298, under the title "Literal construction," which says:

If the law is clear and admits of but one meaning, there is no room for construction. It is not allowable to interpret that which has no need of interpretation. In such a case any departure from the language used would be an unjustifiable assumption of legal power, and where the language is susceptible of but one meaning it must receive that meaning, although such construction leads to results that are absurd and mischievous. There can be no departure from the plain meaning of the statute on the grounds of its unwisdom or of public policy.

The Secretary of the Treasury seeks to shield himself from his unlawful conduct by claiming that he acted by virtue of the provisions of section 5103 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

All national banking associations designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be depositaries of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government; and they shall perform all such reasonable duties as depositaries of public moneys and financial agents of the Government as may be required of them. The Secretary of the Treasury shall require the associations thus designated to give satisfactory security, by the deposit of United States bonds and otherwise, for the safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents of the Government. And every association so designated as receiver or depositary of the public money shall take and receive at par all of the national currency bills, by whatever association issued, which has been paid into the Government for internal revenue or for loans or stocks.

True it is that a general power was vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to designate depositaries and deposit therein public moneys, but it can not be insisted that this general power conferred by the statute on the Secretary superseded the special direction of the act of 1899, namely, that the money should be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Depositaries of the United States were created for the convenience of the Treasury Department. In this particular instance the mandatory provision of the statute was not for the convenience of the Treasurer, but a mandate upon him that this money should be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

Under the rule of construction cited in the English Encyclopedia of Law there could be no escape from his duty in the premises. If the Congress of the United States meant that he should have deposited the money in a depositary, they would have said so, but when they said it must be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, it recognized an existing institution which is in reality the only permanent institution of the Government for the safe-keeping of public moneys.

It is contended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he insists that he is sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, as well as by the Solicitor-General of the United States, in the case of Coudert ex., etc., vs. United States, that the depositing in a national-bank depositary was payment into the Treasury of the United States. This contention can not be sustained, for the reasons I have heretofore stated. By the statute it was expressly commanded that the money should be paid into the Treasury of the United States, and under the act under which the Secretary of the Treasury attempts to justify himself public moneys are placed in depositaries of the United States for the special purpose declared in the act itself, namely, "The safe-keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them," thereby creating the national banks as mere disbursing agents of the Government of the United States, to honor checks or such drafts as might be drawn upon them in order to expedite the business of the Government instead of forcing the creditors of the Government to attend upon the Treasurer or subtreasurer of the United States.

No other power was conferred or intended to be conferred by this act, and the depositing of the money received from the sale of the custom-house property in the National City Bank to meet the stringency of the money market in Wall street was illegal and a departure from that which was authorized by law. There is no law that contemplates that the Secretary of the Treasury can use the funds of the Government to assist any national bank or banks. Each bank must stand on its own bottom, and each bank must so conduct its affairs that conditions will not exist which will place the institution on any other basis than a sound one. It would be strange insistment, indeed, if in times of panic or financial disaster the Treasurer of the United States could use an arbitrary discretion to come to the assistance of any national bank.

In the face of this mandatory statute that the money should be placed in the Treasury of the United States, I have no hesitancy in declaring that if the bank had failed during the period that this money was in its possession the Secretary of the Treasury would have been personally responsible, or he would have been liable for the misappropriation of the public funds. [Applause.] When a man undertakes to depart from the strict letter of the law, he being a public officer, he must abide by the consequences which attend that act of misfeasance or nonfeasance in office. The Secretary of the Treasury can say, now that no serious consequences have resulted from his act, "I did it for the public good." What would his answer be had the contrary result happened and during this money panic the bank had gone under and the public money with it? Do you think that before a court or jury of his peers he could say, "I did it for the public good?" In that case he would clearly be held for criminal misconduct and the law would be invoked. The statute must be construed strictly, and his failure to deposit the money as required by law would be his criminal act. This was a specific statute enacted for a specific purpose, and every requirement of that act must be carried into effect so that its letter and its spirit shall be obeyed.

Mr. Chairman, I have looked in vain to find some excuse for the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. There is not a man sitting on this side of the Chamber who would reflect upon or unduly criticise the conduct of a public official if the facts did not warrant it, or if there was a reasonable doubt as to his misconduct in office; but when I read his answer to the inquiry of the House and the circumstances surrounding the depositing of these moneys in the National City Bank, I am impelled to say that the motive which actuated him was a desire to pay political obligations growing out of the election of 1896. [Applause.] You need go no further to reach this conclusion than to read what is known as the "Hepburn letter," dated at New York, June 5, 1897, which is as follows:

MY DEAR MR. GAGE: The National City Bank of this city, of which I recently became vice-president through the consolidation of the business of the Third National with it, is one of the banks designated as a United States depository, and I write to request that in any change which may be made under the Administration we may not be disturbed in this respect. We would like to remain a United States depositary as at present. Of course the bank is very strong, and if you will take the pains to look at our list of directors you will see that we also have very great political claims in view of what was done during the canvass of last year.

Yours, very truly,

A. P. HEPBURN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE,
United States Treasury, Washington, D. C.

Here is a bold, flagrant bid to remain a United States depositary, and the reason urged is "political claims in view of what was done in the canvass of last year!" It means that this bank or the directors of this bank had aided in creating a corruption fund to bribe the American voter. It means that the board of directors of this bank violated the law, and for their part in its violation they demand recognition at the hands of the Republican party.

If Mr. Gage had been adequate to the occasion, or had it not been true as stated in the letter that they had aided the Republican party financially, he would have hurled back the suggestions contained therein with all the scorn, dignity, and contempt that an honest public official would have done when such improper suggestions were made.

I can not refrain, Mr. Chairman, from further calling attention to some of the correspondence bearing upon this subject, which I will now read:

OCTOBER 28, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I have expressed a preference for your institution as the original recipient and distributer of the fund [the $62,000,000 from the Union Pacific sale].

In reply to your inquiry or expression of hope that a suitable portion of the fund will be left with the bank for a sufficient length of time to offer a reasonable profit, I can only say that, while we can make no specific promises in that direction, the purpose we have in using depository banks for the fund * * * will induce us to practice wise discretion in covering the money into the Treasury proper. There probably will be no disbursements until January 1.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

A. P. HEPBURN.

OCTOBER 30, 1897.

DEAR SIR: I note with pleasure the contents of your letter received this morning, with reference to the length of time which these deposits will be allowed to remain.

JAMES STILLMAN.

Hon. LYMAN J. GAGE.

NOVEMBER 10, 1897.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 29th ultimo, and by virtue of the authority conferred upon me, the National City Bank is hereby designated a depository of public moneys, especially to receive deposits only on account of proceeds of the sale of the Union Pacific Railroad.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

VICE-PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY [STANDARD OIL] BANK.

APRIL 11, 1898.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 8th instant, in which is expressed a wish that the remainder of the deposits on account of the Union Pacific Railroad be allowed to be held by the special depositories in New York City until July, and to inform you that due notice will be given you as to time and amount of proposed withdrawals, should any be required before the time mentioned in your letter.

L. J. GAGE, Secretary.

VICE-PRESIDENT NATIONAL CITY BANK.

SIR: This is to advise you that it is the intention of the Department to close the special account of the Treasurer of the United States on account of proceeds of the sale of the Union Pacific Railroad with the several depositories in your city. * * * Accordingly the Treasurer will draw on your bank each week for that amount (10 per cent of its holdings), beginning Wednesday, December 28, 1898.

O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

CASHIER NATIONAL CITY BANK.

FEBRUARY 25, 1899.

DEAR MR. STILLMAN: It is probable that by the 15th of March the Treasury Department will realize an advance payment of $12,000,000 or thereabouts on account of the Central Pacific Railway. In view of your suggestion that you would qualify to take any deposits on that account that the Department might see fit to make with you, I now write to inquire whether you will be disposed to put up the bonds required and accept the deposit.

LYMAN J. GAGE.

The New York World, commenting on these letters, says:

These letters show, first, how completely Mr. Gage fell in with the scandalous suggestion of the Hepburn letter; second, how easily the Standard Oil crowd pursuaded him to leave large deposits of Government money with them when his intention had been to withdraw them; third, how he gave them valuable tips as to the length of time they could keep the Government money to speculate in Wall street "call loans;" and fourth, how Gage had no sooner arranged to close up this first big favor than he had a second one to offer.

It would have been better had the writer of these letters admonished the recipients to burn them, and my country might have been spared the humiliation of having the misconduct of its Secretary of the Treasury paraded before the civilized world. [Applause.]

It is a notorious fact that during the Presidential election of 1896 the Republican party subsidized and bribed the press, and the channels of money were opened in this country as well as from abroad, and poured into the Republican canvass in order that the honest will of the people might be defeated and the power of the Republican party perpetuated. It is a sad commentary upon the degeneracy of the times under Republican Administration that men occupying the high positions that Mr. Hepburn and the directors of this banking institution do can flaunt their wickedness, and the Republican party in the Congress of the United States dare not offer or concede an investigation to inquire into all the transactions referred to in the resolution of inquiry. During all of this criticism on the conduct of Mr. Gage, in the press and on the floor of the House and Senate, not one in the Republican party has dared to defend his conduct or insist upon a full and free opportunity to investigate, that Mr. Gage might be placed on the witness stand and cross-examined, that the facts might be laid bare to the American people as to whether or not he was actuated by an honest motive or desired to pay tribute to those who furnished the means by which the American ballot might be degraded.

I have heard it said that the Hepburn letter would not have been disclosed in the correspondence if Mr. Gage had not been honest in this transaction—that he might have secreted or prevented its production. True it is, he might have done all this, and I charge that it was an oversight on his part; that he never intended it to be disclosed, and its production in Congress is only another evidence of the truthfulness of that old adage, "Murder will out." No person ever committed a crime who did not believe after its perpetration he would be free from detection, but he always left a trail behind him or some evidence of his guilt, and at the time he thought he was safest and most free from suspicion, it was then his guilt was made apparent and his detection sure. So, me thinks, this is only one of those accidental trails which has laid bare the infamy of this transaction. The American people and the American press are demanding a full and complete answer to these accusations, and this persistent effort on your part to shield the Secretary by answering that his reply is complete in itself without inquiry will not do it. We charge Mr. Gage with misconduct in office, and we insist he shall make a true, full, and complete answer to these allegations.

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH
HON. GEORGE W. STEELE,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. STEELE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Two years ago our friends on the other side of this Chamber were clamoring loudly for war, jeering at the majority because we were waiting until the President had exhausted all reasonable means to relieve by proper diplomacy the distress and suffering of the inhabitants of Cuba, knowing that he was at the same time, with all the resources at his command, making absolutely necessary preparations for war if war must come.

You have been pursuing a waiting policy—

Said Mr. NORTON of Ohio, upon this floor on March 31, 1898.

Your President is waiting, and you are waiting now, while the worst flotilla that ever started out under the flag of any nation is pushing its nose toward the city of New York, and may throw their shells into New Orleans. Wait in your imbecility; wait in your cowardice; wait in the humility and in the patience of greed and avarice; wait with the blush of shame indelibly stamped on your brows forever.

Only one thing is certain—

and that is that the stock gambler is very busy and prosperous, while all true Americans are humiliated, and the flag is without honor. Our sailors are impatient; our soldiers are indignant; our wives and mothers and daughters are weeping in sympathy with the mothers and sisters of 266 murdered American seamen.

These are only sample echoes from the inconsiderate and unreasonable clamor raised for political purposes in the midst of a grave national crisis. A very few of our friends on this side listened to it. The rest of us were willing to trust to the wisdom and the patriotism of the President, and we were not disappointed.

When the President had exhausted all honorable means to avert war and gave the signal, in an incredibly short time the troops we had were called into action. The Oregon began its long trip around the Horn to join the squadron on the Atlantic coast; ships we had been buying for the purpose while gentlemen on this floor were crying out that the President was inactive were transformed into transports, gunboats, and supply boats; our war ships were manned to their full complement and cleared for action. Volunteers responded readily to a call, were organized, equipped, and trained, and with our scattered regulars were ordered to the seaboard or into camps from which they could easily be called to the national defense. Commissary stores of the greatest variety and the best quality ever furnished to the soldiers of any country were bountifully supplied.

Our Asiatic Squadron, under Commodore Dewey, sailed to Manila Bay and carried out the President's order to capture or destroy the Spanish fleet. Manila was within our grasp, an army was dispatched across the Pacific to cooperate with Dewey, and in a short time Manila and the Philippines were ours. Our squadrons on the Atlantic maintained a successful blockade of Cuban and Puerto Rican ports, guarded our harbors from prospective invasion by a Spanish fleet, and convoyed our transports carrying an army to Cuba. Three-fourths of the soldiers on these transports probably had never been to sea. They were tumbled ashore in the heat, rain, and mud of Cuba. Without having time for rest or recuperation, they were ordered into battle, and at El Caney, San Juan, and Santiago drove the enemy before them until the Spanish army surrendered. The Spanish fleet, which had been training its guns on our soldiers, sailed out of Santiago Harbor and was destroyed by our squadron under Sampson and Schley, or Schley and Sampson, as you prefer. The fall of Santiago was followed by the surrender of the Spanish forces in Cuba to General Shafter and those in Puerto Rico to General Miles.

A magnificent record! Such a one as every lover of heroic deeds must honor; of which every lover of his country must be proud.

Spanish domination in the Western Hemisphere came to an end. It has disappeared, never to return. In view of all this, why do we not all join in praising, in encouraging, and in holding up the hands of our Commander in Chief, the President of the United States? Why, before the smoke of battle had cleared away, gentlemen on that side of the House had commenced their cries of derision and dissatisfaction—"embalmed beef," "imperialism," "emperor," and "king." I do not wish to believe that in your hearts you feel the sentiments you utter or applaud when uttered by others.

You know that the President is an able, honest, kind-hearted man, and that he has the very best interests of the country at heart. His responsibilities did not end with the elimination of Spanish domination in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. Those in the Orient whom we had wrested from Spanish oppression turned against us without the shadow of excuse, and fired upon our soldiers. Your position is that Dewey should have sailed away when he had destroyed the Spanish fleet, leaving men, women, and children, whose means of defense he had destroyed, to the mercy of an enraged and half savage people. Oh, no; I do not care whether or not Aguinaldo was or had been our ally. When he ordered his soldiers to fire upon ours—to charge our lines, expecting to kill our men or drive them off—it was the duty of the commander of our army to strike back and to pursue Aguinaldo and his followers until the last hostile in arms had surrendered or was captured or killed.

The Army and the Navy have about finished their work, have performed their duty gloriously, and have given no excuse for derision or disgraceful antagonism upon this floor or elsewhere in this country. I am glad that I do not remember to have heard a soldier on your side of the House join in the unseemly clamor.

My information is that Cuba is better off, commercially and socially, than she has ever been before, and will within a few months be in condition to organize a "safe and stable government of her own." Puerto Rico is in a deplorable condition, and is entitled to our best consideration. She has not only been a long and patient sufferer from misrule, but in August last was swept by a hurricane which killed 3,000 of her people, razed their humble huts to the ground, and destroyed the crops, thus not only depriving the owners of the farms of the means of relieving distress, but destroying the coffee industry, in which a large majority of the people in the country are employed.

They are thus left without employment and without any other means of securing the necessaries of life. Their coffee trees were stripped of the buds and leaves, and the trees that shaded the plants were torn down. Acres upon acres of land slid down the mountain sides in great landslides. It will take two years before the owners of farms in Puerto Rico will be able to take care of themselves or the laborers. The old-fashioned sugarhouses throughout the island, largely out of use on account of onerous taxation, were blown down, so that it will be impossible to work the cane if the acreage could be increased. That the acreage devoted to tobacco culture will be increased there seems to be little doubt, but not to such an extent as will greatly relieve the distress of the very poor by employment the present season.

By the special report of the Bureau of Statistics we are informed—

That there is not a single school building on the island, and that fully nine-tenths of the people of the island can neither read nor write;

That throughout the entire island there is a horde of office seekers whose salaries consume nearly all the taxes collected;

That there are only seven roads worthy of the name on the island—two good ones and five moderately so;

That in the coffee country there are no roads—only bridle paths for pack trains; and

That it is said to be the most densely populated country on the globe—about 800 people to the square mile (while in Illinois there are but 63 and in Indiana 61 to the square mile).

About 200,000 of its population live in cities and villages. In San Juan, for instance, the wealthier class live in the upper stories of the houses on the principal streets and the poorer people are huddled together in the basements.

A few yards of cotton cloth for the adults and nothing for the children meet their principal requirements for clothing.

Bananas and other tropical fruits, with very little rice, flour, or beans, constitute their food supply.

They have not now either the rice, flour, or beans, excepting it be paid for by charitable donations or out of the Treasury of the United States, and can not hope to have for some time to come; hence we must provide for them. How best to do it?

Our Democratic friends propose to give them free trade with the United States, which means tons upon tons of sugar and tobacco, now in the hands of well-to-do people or speculators on the island, shall come into the United States and they receive all the difference in price, about $1.60 per hundred pounds on the average, instead of $1.20, as proposed by the pending bill, this sugar and tobacco having been produced by miserably paid labor, and now destitute people, having no part of the benefits or profit.

What are they to live on? Our Democratic friends offer them the Constitution, and while they would seem to sleep with it and make bread of it, the destitute of Puerto Rico are not used to it, and yet you insist they shall take it as the only sweet morsel you have to offer. You will, perhaps, visit the island and tell the poor people how much you loved "the immortal Lincoln," and how you hate the only Democratic President you remember, in forty years, or ever will, I hope. You will tell them what a great man General Miles was, what glorious promises he made, but you can not tell them that he was authorized to commit the Government or the Administration in any wise, or that attempting to do so was not born of presumption. To sustain your proposition for free trade you quote from the President's message of December 5, wherein he said:

> Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

But you do not quote from the same message wherein he asks that—> the regulation of tariff rates on merchandise imported from the island into the United States have careful consideration and action—

thus recognizing the power of Congress to regulate tariff between the United States and Puerto Rico, and vice versa.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I believe nearly every member of the committee, agreed with the President as to what our plain duty was with reference to giving free access to Puerto Rican products to our markets by the abolition of customs tariffs. The chairman introduced a bill proposing this as a remedy and providing ports of entry, delivery, etc. But we had not at that time consulted Hon. Henry K. Carroll, our special commissioner; Governor-General Davis; J. R. Latimer, a provision broker, or George I. Finley; nor had the President when he sent his message to us on December 5 last. After hearing these gentlemen, your committee concluded that the revenue laws of the United States, applied to the island, would be difficult, if not impossible, of execution, and be onerous and burdensome to a very large proportion of the people.

This being so, the landholders and commercial men being hopelessly in debt, owing, it is estimated by the best obtainable figures, $50,000,000 (there is an average of $40 per acre even on the poor lands, devoted to the raising of coffee), your committee reported the bill under consideration as a means of temporary relief, to be in effect only until better conditions shall prevail. It does not take a dollar away from the Puerto Ricans; on the contrary, it puts every dollar collected in Puerto Rico from the United States and other countries and every dollar collected from Puerto Rican importations into the United States in the hands of the President, to be used for the benefit of the people of the island. Against this generous and humane proposition our Democratic friends are bringing all their forces to bear.

While they are on the floor delivering their speeches two of the gentlemen to whom I have referred—Mr. Latimer, a produce broker, representing large owners and controllers of the sugar and tobacco crop, and Mr. Finley, an ex-consul of Great Britain, and reported to be the largest producer of sugar on the island, though he claims to be only the second largest—are listening to them from the gallery with great satisfaction. Why? Because if the leaders of the Democracy are successful in their contention the sugar Mr. Finley has in store to send to the United States will be relieved of all the duty instead of three-fourths of it; or, in other words, instead of having to pay $1.60 per hundred pounds, as he now does under the Dingley tariff, or 40 cents, as he would have to pay under the pending bill, he will escape paying anything at all. Mr. Latimer represents his customers. I do not blame these gentlemen; it is a matter of business with them. But why should not persons who have accumulated large stocks of sugar and tobacco, produced by miserably paid labor, pay their fair proportion at least of the money it is necessary to contribute to relieve the starving and destitute people of the island in which they live?

It has been intimated that the sugar and tobacco trusts are to be helped by the passage of the bill; yet no one has stated how it would or could do so. I do not see any possible way for the sugar, tobacco, or any other trust to get any advantage out of it. On the other hand, the committee is informed that large stocks of tobacco are held by speculators in Puerto Rico, and the owners have been anxiously waiting for free trade before bringing it into our markets. The Democratic contention is that it should come free of duty; this bill, as I have before said, provides that it shall pay 25 per cent of the rates fixed by the Dingley law, and that every dollar so paid, as in the case of sugar, shall go into the hands of the President to be expended for the relief of the suffering poor of the island.

A general application of our internal-revenue laws in Puerto Rico at the present time seems impossible—first, because all over the island, in little neighborhoods, there are poor men who roll cheap cigars and cigarettes for consumption in these communities. The use of tobacco is a part of their very nature.

In many portions of the island rum is manufactured out of molasses very cheaply, at from 10 to 35 cents per gallon, and it is in common though moderate use. My information is that it seems to be a necessity, and when you take into account the fact that only about one-fifth of the population have ever worn a pair of shoes, and that a very large proportion have for their wardrobe only a shirt, it is not very surprising that they "hanker" for a little rum and tobacco.

Where nearly all the people use these articles, where there are no roads, and where stillhouses, even of the Kentucky or Tennessee moonshine variety, are unnecessary, it is not believed that it would be possible to at present enforce our revenue laws, and that it will be as well to wait a year or so at least before attempting to do so.

If this bill shall be enacted into law, and I think it ought to be, as a temporary relief measure, schoolhouses will begin to dot the island, school-teachers will be employed, roads will be constructed, fair wages may be secured with which to buy proper food, a greater proportion of the population will be enabled to wear shoes and shirts than ever before, and the people of the island will be started on the high road to American citizenship, with all that citizenship implies.

I am not clamorous for a greater variety of population than we have; have sympathized with and voted for conservative laws restricting immigration; but when uneducated and unclothed but tractable people shall by the arbitrament of the sword come with territory acquired by us, does anyone believe, whatever his views may be on the Constitution, that it is not better for us to improve and elevate them than it is to turn them away and say, "I would like to help you, but the Constitution will not permit me to do so," flexible as it has been construed to be, framed though it was for the betterment of mankind?

There are only three ways out of the difficulty that I am aware of. One is to repudiate them; another, by a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States for their relief; the last, and I believe the best, is the legislation proposed in this bill.

As to its constitutionality I am quite content to rely upon the opinion of many of our greatest jurists and lawyers, including the President of the United States.

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN C. BELL,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. BELL said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The legal status of this bill has been exhaustively discussed, and I desire only to make a few simple suggestions as to the apparent legerdemain and deceptive scene shifting being played here by the majority.

I will venture to assert that no such trimming, changing of positions, self-stultifications, contradictory statements, illogical and untenable conclusions, and almost physical coercion of members to vote against their conviction can be found in the past history of this Government.

Our first obligation began when General Miles with his splendid army invaded this little island and issued his proclamation to the inhabitants, promising them that—

Puerto Rico under the American flag will enjoy the same privileges and the same immunities as the citizens of the different States and Territories.

This is followed up by our peace commissioners in Paris making the demand for and receiving the island of Puerto Rico as a war indemnity.

The President, in his annual message, said:

It must be borne in mind that since the cession Puerto Rico has been denied the principal markets she had long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under the Spanish sovereignty. The markets of Spain are closed to her products except upon terms to which the commerce of all nations is subjected. * * * Our plain duty is to abolish all custom tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee introduced in this House a bill in pursuance of the recommendation of the President for free trade with this little territory (about the size, territorially, of my county).

The tobacco growers of Ohio, Connecticut, New York, and some of the other States, also the president of the sugar-beet growers, assailed his measure with great vigor. He as vigorously defended it. Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in a letter to W. H. Curtis, Palmyra, N. Y., January 24, said:

In accepting it [Puerto Rico] we cut off their market with Spain and with Cuba, in both of which countries there is now a high protective duty, which is absolutely prohibitive, so far as Puerto Rico is concerned. Puerto Rico produces 50,000 tons of sugar. * * * We last year imported 1,340,000 tons. You see the importation from Puerto Rico would not be a drop in the bucket. We import from the Hawaiian Islands 240,000 tons annually. Free sugar from Hawaii does not seem to affect the beet-sugar interests. * * * Puerto Rico is ours without a dissenting voice anywhere. * * * A free admission of her products to the United States, which is now accorded to every other State and Territory, and to Alaska, not organized into a Territory, would give her relief. It will not hurt us. * * * I am heartily in favor of extending this relief to Puerto Rico.

In a few days after this gallant defense of free trade with Puerto Rico, the same SERENO E. PAYNE reports a tariff bill for Puerto Rico. Mr. PAYNE, in his report, says:

The representatives of the beet-sugar industry who appeared before the committee stated that the admission of sugar free of duty from Puerto Rico, even should the product be doubled, would work no injury to the beet-sugar interest.

And shows that the tobacco imports will not injure the tobacco growers, but insists on his bill as a revenue producer for Puerto Rico. The Governor-General and the representatives generally of Puerto Rico with scorn and contempt deny their desire for any such measure and insist upon free trade and a local taxation. They give their freedom from any national indebtedness and their past history in buying and freeing their slaves as an evidence of their present ability to take care of themselves. The public has a right to a more tangible reason for this measure than has been given up to this time. Here we have the glaring spectacle of Hawaii on the west, with a population of Chinese, Japanese, South Sea Islanders, and only 8,000 Caucasian inhabitants, producing 240,000 tons of sugar per annum and other products in proportion, brought in without duty by Claus Spreckels and a few other sugar magnates, and this little island right at our doors, with 800,000 Caucasian population and only producing about 60,000 tons of sugar per annum and other things in proportion, and a revenue burden is put upon their commerce. One power is weak, without great political influence, hence is crushed; the other is owned by a few American syndicates, and they bring in five times the stuff, raised by Chinese labor free. This is what is known in political parlance as influence.

The result will be our policy will so depress values in Puerto Rico that the sugar and tobacco syndicates will go in and buy their lands for a trifle, stock them with slave labor, and then put their products on the same duty basis as Hawaii. This bill will fortunately give the people some idea of the ultimate object of the mad crusade of greed. This element does not want these islands under the Constitution because they want the slavery system now in operation in Hawaii, which is but little better than that in the United States before the war.

It has been falsely asserted time and again that the minority approved of the Philippine purchase, and as evidence the vote of the minority is cited on the $20,000,000 appropriation.

Now, what are the facts? The President, through his commissioners, made a treaty with Spain in the regular way, agreeing to pay Spain $20,000,000 for the sovereignty of the Philippines; submitted the same to the Senate, and it was confirmed by the Senate, which made it a law of the land, and the $20,000,000 a legal debt against the Government. When the bill was presented to the Appropriation Committee the whole committee regarded the $20,000,000 as a fixed debt under the confirmed treaty, and the minority of the Appropriation Committee offered the following amendment:

That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, and the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and asserts its determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected in said islands, entitled, in the judgment of the Government of the United States, to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and thereupon to leave the government and control of said islands to the people thereof.

This was attempted to be moved on the floor of the House by Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, at the time of the appropriation, but Mr. CANNON, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, under the rules would not permit a vote on the resolution.

The Democrats generally stated that they voted the appropriation, not because they approved of the treaty, but because the treaty-making power had agreed with Spain to pay the $20,000,000, and the Senate had confirmed the treaty, making the $20,000,000 a fixed debt of the United States due to Spain.

It has been stated here that Mr. Bryan approved of the $20,000,000. Many Democrats and many Populists advocated the paying of the $20,000,000 as the cheapest and most humane way to extinguish all claims of Spain to the islands, and then Mr. Bryan and Democrats and Populists generally insisted, and always have insisted, that we should treat the Philippines just as we pledged ourselves to treat the Cubans. We insisted that we might aid them in establishing a stable government, get a favorable trade arrangement with them, let them pay us back what we had paid for their freedom, to protect them against the encroachments of any hostile power, but always giving them complete local self-government.

There is a manifest attempt to conceal the purpose of the bill. It is not for protection, because the committee shows their products will not affect the price of ours if let in on a free-trade basis. The committee insists that it is purely a revenue measure, but no one conversant with what has occurred here and the protests of the people of Puerto Rico believes that such is the object. Then what is the object? It is to deceive the American voter in the fall campaign. It is to conceal from view the ultimate purpose of the Republican party. It is a conglomerate measure, which does not confine the Republican party to any definite policy, and will give it leeway to claim that no policy has been adopted by Congress, and to leave the whole subject in the dough, as in the past, until the fall campaign is over. Then they will satisfy the greed of the speculator in defiance of public opinion or the rights of the citizens of these islands.

Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation Bill.

There is no constitutional difficulty as to the acquisition of territory, and whether, when acquired, it may be taken into the Union by the Constitution as it now stands, will become a question of expediency.—Letter of Thomas Jefferson to Albert Gallatin.

HON. HENRY S. BOUTELL,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, February 15, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8317) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes—

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] for his distinguished consideration, and the least that I can do in recognition of his courtesy is to assure him that in any use that I shall make of his time I shall not say a word about the pending bill.

Everyone who listened to the debates in this Chamber two years ago must have been impressed, during the last month or six weeks, in following the discussions here, with the great change that has come over the sentiments of the minority in this Chamber.

Two years ago this Hall resounded with denunciations of the financial policy of the Republican party. Utter ruin for the country and abject misery for all the people were predicted as the inevitable results that were to follow upon a continuation of this policy. These walls echoed and reechoed with the defiant cry that free silver would not down, and that 16 to 1 would be the issue, the only issue, and the triumphant issue of 1900.

But I notice that as we approach more and more nearly to the conventions of the Presidential year, we hear less and less of this issue. And why? Why this transformation? The Republican party killed 16 to 1 in 1896. In 1898 we gave it decent burial; and I do not believe there is a Democrat in this House who would like to see it resurrected as an issue in 1900.

It is true that we have heard now and then since the assembling of this Congress a eulogy upon the departed, and now and then a rhetorical tear has been dropped upon its grave, but these obituaries have lacked the spirit that indicates real sorrow, and as I have listened to these mortuary discourses I have been reminded of an epitaph which I copied from a gravestone up in Vermont last summer. The stone was erected by a man to the memory of his wife, with whom he apparently had enjoyed as little happiness and prosperity as the Democrats have done with free silver, and inscribed on it was this inscription, that I have thought of whenever I have heard these lamentations over the downfall of 16 to 1:

> Here lies my wife.
> All my tears can not bring her back;
> Therefore I weep.

[Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, free silver having been laid peacefully in its grave, other live and important issues are before the country. The problems which we are now called upon to face are problems involving the fundamental principles of our national institutions. Our solution of these problems will affect our posterity in all generations. Financial systems rise and fall. The money systems of our day are not the money systems of a century ago. The industrial questions which assume importance at one time may have no significance whatever at another. But the foundations of our Republic rest upon principles which can not be changed without endangering the vigor and permanency of our institutions.

These problems, Mr. Chairman, which are now engrossing the attention of the American people have been forced upon us as a result of the successful prosecution of the war with Spain. I repeat, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the successful prosecution of that war, for if our arms had not been triumphant on land and sea these questions would not confront us to-day. I refer, of course, Mr. Chairman, to the problems respecting the acquisition of territory by the United States. It is my purpose to discuss some of the constitutional principles involved in the acquisition of territory by the United States, and to illustrate the discussion by some references to the history of our territorial expansion.

Before entering upon this discussion, permit me to say a few words concerning the criticisms that have been made by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber of the policy that is now being pursued by the President in dealing with the situation in the Philippines.

I wish to emphasize, in the first place, the statement that our war with Spain was not a war favored by one political party in this country and opposed by another. The whole people demanded war with Spain. And as the people stood loyally by the President in the prosecution of the war, so now they should give him their undivided support while he is dealing with the present situation in the Philippines, which has resulted from a successful prosecution of the war. At the close of the war we were entitled to the peaceable possession of the Philippines. But open organized insurrection broke out against our authorities. It is the duty of the President to suppress that insurrection. And it is the solemn duty of every man in the United States, of whatever political party or creed, to support heartily and loyally the President in the course he is pursuing in the Philippines.

The final disposition of those islands is not involved in his action at the present time in restoring peace and order in the islands. The Philippines were Spanish territory; the inhabitants of the Philippines were Spanish subjects; the Philippine Islands are ours by right of conquest as an incident of the war, and not because we wished to acquire them. But it is our duty to see that organized opposition to our arms is put down, no matter what the final disposition of the islands may be.

I know there are those who say that we ought at once to withdraw our troops and leave the people of those islands to their own devices. But suppose it were our intention to give absolute self-government and independence to the Philippine Islands. Should we leave them now in a state of organized revolution of one party against the other? We are in a measure responsible for their present condition. If we are to establish a new political household among the nations, we must remember that a house divided against itself can not stand. Should it be our purpose to dispose of these islands to some other power it would be cowardly on our part to fail to fulfill our duty by establishing peace and quiet in those islands. Is it our purpose to incorporate these islands into the United States? Then surely our line of duty becomes more clear. We must suppress disorder in the Philippines as we would suppress disorder in Massachusetts, and the criticisms that are now directed against the course that the President is pursuing in the Philippines are as unjust as they would be if aimed against the suppression of organized opposition to the National Government in Massachusetts.

There was a time in the history of our territorial acquisitions when the President was called upon to pursue the same course that President McKinley is pursuing in the Philippines.

During the Mexican war our Navy, by a series of brilliant victories, occupied the Mexican forts in California.

The possession of these forts was regarded as a conquest of the entire territory, and in the treaty with Mexico, California, together with New Mexico and Arizona, was ceded to the United States. The President was governing this territory at the close of the war and endeavoring to restore order as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

In 1848 Congress passed a resolution asking the President what form of government had been established in the newly acquired territories. There were cries of imperialism and militarism in those days. In his message in response to this resolution President Polk, who was as thorough-going a Democrat as ever occupied the Presidential office, used this language:

> The temporary governments authorized were instituted by virtue of the rights of war. The power to declare war against a foreign country and to prosecute it according to the general laws of war, as sanctioned by civilized nations, it will not be questioned, exists under our Constitution. When Congress has declared that war exists with a foreign nation, "the general laws of war apply to our situation," and it becomes the duty of the President, as the constitutional "Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States," to prosecute it.
> In prosecuting a foreign war thus duly declared by Congress we have the right, "by conquest and military occupation," to acquire possession of the territories of the enemy, and, during the war, to "exercise the fullest rights of sovereignty over it." The sovereignty of the enemy is in such case "suspended," and his laws can "no longer be rightfully enforced" over the conquered territory "or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remain and submit to the conqueror. By the surrender the inhabitants pass under a temporary allegiance" to the conqueror, and are "bound by such laws, and such only, as" he may choose to recognize and impose.

In the same message, in referring to the occupation of territory the title to which was in dispute and which our troops had occupied, he says:

Whether the country in dispute rightfully belonged to Mexico or to Texas, it was our right in the first case, and our duty as well as our right in the latter, to conquer and hold it. Whilst this territory was in our possession as conquerors, with a population hostile to the United States, which more than once broke out in open insurrection, it was our unquestionable duty to continue our military occupation of it until the conclusion of the war, and to establish over it a military government, necessary for our own security as well as for the protection of the conquered people.

All the noisy shouting about President McKinley's course in the Philippines should be silenced before this calm, commonsense statement of the duty of the Chief Magistrate made by a Democratic President placed in a position exactly similar to that in which President McKinley is now placed.

And so I say, Mr. Chairman, that, acknowledging the soundness of the principles laid down by President Polk, however we may divide into parties in this country on the question of the final disposition of these islands, there is but one duty now before the American people, one duty incumbent upon all—to maintain the President in the policy which he is now pursuing. That policy is based upon the principle that whoever insults the flag of the United States must be punished, and whoever would treat with the United States must first respect the flag of the United States.

This is not a party principle. This is a sentiment engraven upon the hearts of all loyal Americans. It is a principle that every child understands and every statesman must respect. Every criticism that is directed against the President in his course in endeavoring to secure order and peace and quiet in these islands, every attack directed against his Administration, will be repudiated by the people at the polls, regardless of party.

Do gentlemen on the other side think that they will gain votes for the Democratic party by their repeated attacks on the President? Let me call your attention to results that followed similar attacks for partisan purposes made upon a Democratic President and his Administration and policy over four-score years ago.

Three years after the close of the war of 1812 the Indians living in the Spanish territory of Florida, near the borders of Alabama, Mississippi, and Georgia, made frequent inroads on the people of the United States. Depredations were committed on their property, and men, women, and children were murdered by the Indians. President Monroe sent word to Gen. Andrew Jackson, the hero of New Orleans, who was at Nashville, directing him to repair to Fort Scott and relieve General Gaines and put down the disorder.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what did Andrew Jackson do? Did he send out for pocket editions of the Constitution to give to his generals and other officers? Did he order copies of the Declaration of Independence to give to the red men? Did he wait for a declaration of war by Congress? Did he wait for specific instructions from the President? No. The hero of New Orleans buckled on his sword, and when told to enlist the militia of the neighboring States, knowing that Georgia was the only neighboring State and that her militia was all in the field, sent out word to his veterans in Tennessee and Kentucky, mustered them in, ordered them to rendezvous at Fort Scott, joined them as soon as possible, and then went after the red men. He found that they had escaped over the Spanish line.

What did he do then? Did he send for the commentaries of Puffendorf and Vattel and Grotius? Did he sit down to consider what his constitutional rights were? Did he consider what the Declaration of Independence said about all men being free and equal? Did he consider the rudimentary principle of international law that forbade him to carry on war in a neutral territory? No. Andrew Jackson, "Old Hickory," the hero of New Orleans, simply said, "I was sent down there to put an end to the Indian uprising, and, by the eternal, I mean to do it if I follow the red men to the throne of Spain."

He brushed the President aside with one hand and Congress with the other. He threw the Constitution to the winds, trampled the Declaration of Independence under his feet, burned his treaties on international law behind him, and when the Indians went over into the territory of Spain, "Old Hickory" simply went after them. When he came to the fortified town of St. Marks flying the Spanish flag, he pulled it down. He said to the Spanish governor, "I have no personal feeling against you. Just take your baggage and make yourself comfortable in Pensacola."

The Spanish governor started for Pensacola. Jackson found at St. Marks the Indian prophet Francis and the two noncombatants Ambrister and Arbuthnot—British subjects. What did he do? I have heard the question asked, "If we catch Aguinaldo, what will we do with him?" Well, when we catch Aguinaldo, I hope that he will undergo a change of heart. I hope that he will give all the abilities which he possesses to helping us to give to those whom he claims as his people the benefits of law and order which we are ready to bestow upon them.

But let us see what Andrew Jackson, the idol of the Democracy, did in neutral territory during a time of peace with these noncombatants. He first hanged the prophet Francis, to get rid of him. He then ordered a sort of court-martial to try Ambrister and Arbuthnot. What did the court do? They condemned Arbuthnot to be hanged and Ambrister to be imprisoned and to receive fifty stripes. What did "Old Hickory" do? He thought that Ambrister as well as Arbuthnot had been engaged in instigating the Indian rebellion; so he simply reversed the finding of the court-martial and hanged Arbuthnot and shot Ambrister.

Now, you may well believe, in view of those events, that there was a commotion in the United States. We had given both Spain and Great Britain cause for declaring war against us. You may be sure, too, there was something said about imperialism and militarism. And at the end the people of the United States had something to say about the matter. Some were for impeaching President Monroe. Some were for court-martialing General Jackson. Resolutions were introduced in both Houses of Congress declaring his acts unconstitutional.

These resolutions were debated here in Congress for over six weeks, and those debates fill pages of the history of Congress; and much that was said away back at that time—over eighty years ago—sounds very much like what we hear to-day. But let me recall to you what one good, loyal man from Virginia said here in Congress. I read from the speech of Mr. Strother, on page 849 of the History of Congress:

But, sir, we have had an alarming representation of military despotism.

Do you recognize that?

We are told that Cæsar, Alexander, and Cromwell subverted the liberties of their country. Cæsar commanded an army composed of barbarian mercenaries. He found Rome emasculated by corruption, the government worn out, and the passions and the vices of the people administering the laws. They had no regenerating principle, no fountain of political youth in which the government could have itself and acquire renewed health and vigor—this is the happy invention of the American people. Cæsar died and Brutus lived; his virtues were wasted upon his degenerate countrymen. Alexander was born to despotic power; he was animated with the hatred that tyrants feel for liberty; gifted with military talents, he conquered the Grecian republics, which he found paralyzed by internal factions.

Cromwell was carried into the protectorship upon the bigotry of the nation, not the arms of the soldiery. But admitting that armies have crushed liberty, when did a people overturn tyranny and establish freedom upon its ruins without employing arms and force? No instance is recorded where despotism fell before a philosophical lecture. Talent must be connected with virtue, both in a statesman and general, to contribute to the establishment or preservation of liberty. Factious perfidy and treachery have as frequently deprived the people of their liberty and involved nations in ruin as the mad ambition of military men. A Carthaginian senator, discoloring every measure with green-eyed jealousy, induced the senate to refuse supplies to the patriotic and invincible Hannibal, saved Rome, and destroyed Carthage. America had other traitors than Arnold.

Did the eloquent Virginian have in mind his colleagues who by their attacks on the Administration were encouraging the animosity of Spain? Do these words have any application in our day to those whose utterances in this country are stimulating the insurrection in the Philippines?

Let me recall, too, the earnest words of Mr. Walker, of North Carolina, on these resolutions:

The honorable Speaker, in his able and eloquent address to the House the other day, although he spoke on a military subject, so happily combined his style as to lead us through a delightful scenery—through stately groves, flowery fields, dewy lawns, and verdant meads, throughout the regions of France, Italy, Greece, and Rome—and has given us a specific view of the rise and fall of empires and kingdoms, and of all the usurpations, both in the Old and New World, from the days of Julius Cæsar down to Bonaparte of modern times, and seemed to warn us of the least approach of military power; but, as the sun may sometimes pass under a cloud, for once in his life he may have mistaken his way.

General Jackson crossed the Spanish line and marched his army into Florida, not to subvert, not to destroy, but to preserve and secure the interests and liberties of his country; he did not enter as a military adventurer for glory and conquest; he did not declare himself generalissimo of the Spanish provinces and erect his standard as a trophy of victory as did the conqueror of Italy. No, sir; he took possession of these posts as a pledge for their good behavior, and to search into the causes of the war, and to bring peace and tranquillity, as a consequence, to the enfeebled citizens of Georgia and Alabama, which he did in effect, and to teach the world that abandoned characters of any nation should find no asylum among our Indian tribes, and then submitted his military operations to the legitimate authorities of his country.

The "legitimate authorities of his country" tried to pass resolutions holding his action unconstitutional. But those resolutions were voted down in this House; they were voted down in the Senate. The only man in the Cabinet who approved General Jackson's course was John Quincy Adams. But the people approved it. It gained Monroe his second term in the Presidency. It made John Quincy Adams President. It made Andrew Jackson a Senator, and afterwards it made him President for eight years.

I simply refer to this incident in our history, Mr. Chairman, to show that when the same cry of militarism and imperialism that we hear to-day was raised against a Democratic President for political purposes, it was drowned by the approving voice of the American people.

General Jackson's acts in this campaign were truly unconstitutional and contrary to the laws of civilized war.

But the people of the United States approved his course because he rid them of an enemy that had been for years a menace to their lives and happiness. How much more, Mr. Chairman, in our day should the entire American people approve the wise, prudent, humane course of our President in the Philippine Islands, in restoring peace and order in those possessions before entering upon negotiations with the people respecting the future government or disposition of the islands.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word about imperialism. I must confess that I am tired of hearing the Republican party charged with imperialism. I am tired of being called an imperialist; for if I read the history of our country aright, there is no party that can be called an imperialist party except the Democratic party.

If expansion means imperialism, then the Democratic party has been imperialistic from the foundation of the Government to the present time. Mr. Chairman, if there is one word which characterizes the Democratic party throughout its whole history better than another, one word that expresses the unchanging principles of the party, it is the one word "expansion."

When our Government was formed, we had about 830,000 square miles of territory. It was Thomas Jefferson, the founder of the Democratic party, who gave us 1,200,000 miles of territory in his purchase of the province of Louisiana. It was Monroe, the third Democratic President, with the aid of Andrew Jackson, who gave to us the East and West Floridas and added 60,000 square miles to our domain.

It was under President Polk that we formed a treaty with the free republic of Texas and brought in 380,000 square miles of territory. It was under Polk, too, as an incident to our war with Mexico, that we added 550,000 square miles to our territory. It was under Franklin Pierce that we added 45,000 square miles of our territory in the Gadsden purchase. And it was under Andrew Johnson, whom no one on this side of the Chamber claims as a Republican, that we added 580,000 square miles to our national domain in the purchase of Alaska.

Democrats tell us that they are and always have been in favor of continental expansion, but that they draw the line at insular expansion.

Mr. NOONAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. NOONAN. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he believes that the Federal Government has the right to acquire territory and the right to govern territory unlimited by the Constitution?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; that is not debated among lawyers.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. That is the question I am going to discuss in a few moments. I shall take up that question after finishing these preliminary observations about imperialism.

Jefferson himself cast longing eyes on Cuba, and so did Madison, and so did Monroe; and President Polk in 1848 authorized our minister to Spain to pay $100,000,000 in gold for Cuba, but the offer was curtly refused.

In 1852 the United States refused to enter into a tripartite agreement with France and Great Britain that no one of the three powers would ever attempt to acquire Cuba.

In 1854 Franklin Pierce, casting his longing eyes over the Gem of the Antilles, sent word to our ministers in Great Britain, France, and Spain—James Buchanan, John Y. Mason, and Pierre Soulé—to meet and consider the question of annexing Cuba to the United States. In their celebrated Ostend manifesto, so ably outlined and discussed by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] two years ago, these three distinguished Democrats declared that in their opinion the acquisition of Cuba by the United States would be of great benefit both to Spain and to the United States. They urged in this manifesto the true imperialistic doctrine that if we could not purchase the island we ought to acquire it by force.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will it disturb my friend to ask him a question?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Not a bit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you not know that that Ostend manifesto and the scheme back of it was just simply a part of the African slave propaganda in this country; that that was the sole reason back of it?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Well, if that was the sole reason back of it, it was a great deal worse proposition than as I presented it to the House. I presented it simply as a desire to acquire territory in carrying out the spirit of the Democratic party. You Democrats have been in favor of acquiring all kinds of territory—continental territory, insular territory, inhabited territory, uninhabited territory. You have been in favor of every sort, shape, and kind of territorial acquisition except territorial acquisition under a Republican Administration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss this question of the acquisition of territory by reference to some of the fundamental principles of our institutions affecting the question, illustrating my argument by reference to the history of some of our territorial acquisitions.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, let me say that this problem of territorial acquisition has, as each instance arises, two sides to it, or involves two questions. First, shall we acquire the territory in question: and, second, how shall we hold and govern it?

I know that many gentlemen on the other side of the House claim that the second question is involved in the first. I know that there are many who conscientiously believe that we can only acquire territory by incorporating it, by the very act of acquisition, into the territory of the United States, and giving to the inhabitants of the acquired territory all the rights and privileges of American citizenship as guaranteed in the Constitution.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is just upon this point that I must divide from my friends who maintain that proposition. When we look at the territorial acquisitions of the United States, we may class them generally as voluntary acquisitions and involuntary acquisitions. And if these words are inapt or incorrect, I will endeavor to make my meaning clear.

The acquisition from Spain of a certain part of the Louisiana territory was a voluntary acquisition. The acquisition of Florida by purchase or cession was a voluntary acquisition. So was the annexation of Texas and the Gadsden purchase, Alaska, and the Hawaiian Islands.

I regard as involuntary acquisitions acquisitions of territory which come to us as the incidental result of the successful prosecution of a war which was not a war instituted for the purpose of conquering those territories. Such an acquisition was that of the unexplored territories of California, as a result of the Mexican war. Such is the acquisition of Puerto Rico and the Philippines, as an indirect result or as an incident of the Spanish war.

Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STOKES. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I should be glad to yield if I had more time, but I am afraid now that I shall not have time to complete my argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, referring to our first acquisition of territory, which was the Louisiana purchase, I have stated that a part of that acquisition was a voluntary acquisition. The greater part of the Louisiana purchase was an involuntary acquisition. What I mean is this, looking upon the Louisiana purchase in the light of subsequent events, we rightly regard it as a glorious achievement on account of the States which it added to our Union, but when that acquisition took place, in order to get the small extent of territory that we wanted, we had forced upon us a great deal of territory that at that time we did not want, and that we did not want to take.

Let us bring the facts relating to this purchase clearly before us. Prior to the treaty of Paris of 1763, France claimed title to everything on this continent west of the Mississippi. By a secret treaty in 1762 France ceded this territory west of the Mississippi River to Spain. The result was that at the conclusion of our war of independence in 1783 Spain bounded our territory on the west, and, holding East and West Florida, entirely bounded our territory on the south. On the east our boundary was the Atlantic, and on the north the Lakes, the St. Lawrence, and the British line established by the treaty of 1783. As our southern boundary was the thirty-first parallel from the Mississippi to the Atlantic, the Apalachicola, the Perdido, the Pearl, and the Mississippi rivers south of that parallel ran exclusively through Spanish territory.

Our settlements followed the course of the rivers, and after the establishment of the Federal Government the population pressed rapidly westward along the Ohio and other streams flowing into the Mississippi and southward along the streams flowing into the Gulf of Mexico.

The navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi was of the greatest importance to our people. By the treaty of 1795 with Spain we were given the free navigation of the Mississippi and the free right of deposit for our merchandise at New Orleans. Upon the maintenance of this right of deposit for their exports and imports depended the very life of our Western settlements.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us notice how characters and events in Europe began to shape the destinies of our Republic. This is one of the most interesting chapters in our national history. Napoleon in 1800 was reaching out for a world dominion. Great Britain was paramount upon the sea, but the First Consul seemed invincible upon land, and his dreams took in a vast colonial empire. In 1800, having Spain under his thumb, he got from her a secret treaty of cession of what was called the Louisiana province, including the mouths of the Mississippi and all the Mississippi Valley below the thirty-first parallel.

For some time this cession was unknown to our people. Now watch the process by which the First Consul gained his ends with us, while we unwillingly nearly trebled the extent of our territory. Wherever Napoleon's political strategy fell short the infinite cunning of Talleyrand supplied the remainder. In 1802, before we knew of the secret treaty, the intendant at New Orleans revoked our right of deposit and our free navigation of the waters of the Mississippi. Some idea might be gained of the consternation which this act caused in this country by trying to imagine how we should feel if Great Britain should attempt to close up the St. Clair River.

Our Western people had no other means of bringing in or sending out their goods except by the Mississippi River. What was to be done? The Federalists claimed that the revocation of the right of deposit was such a violation of the treaty of 1795 as to justify a declaration of war against France and Spain and the forcible occupation of New Orleans. Senator Ross, of Pennsylvania, introduced a resolution in the Senate looking to such a settlement of the trouble; but Jefferson was a man of peace, who disliked to increase the national debt, and he cast about for some peaceable solution of the question.

What was it that occurred to him when he saw the popular uprisings in the West and received the petitions that poured into Washington? His idea was to buy back the right of deposit from France and, if necessary to secure this right, to buy what was called the Island of Orleans. He never thought, in trying to secure this right of deposit and the free navigation of the Mississippi, of purchasing 1,200,000 square miles of territory. The magnitude and importance of the problem that confronted Jefferson is shown in his letter to Robert R. Livingston, our minister to France, in April, 1802. Mr. Jefferson wrote:

> There is on the globe one single spot the possessor of which is our natural and habitual enemy. It is New Orleans, through which the produce of three-eighths of our territory must pass to market, and from its fertility it will ere long yield more than half of our whole produce and contain more than half our inhabitants. France, placing herself in that door, assumes to us the attitude of defiance. Spain might have retained it quietly for years. Her pacific dispositions, her feeble state, would induce her to increase our facilities there, so that her possession of the place would be hardly felt by us, and it would not perhaps be very long before some circumstance might arise which might make the cession of it to us the price of something of more worth to her.
> Not so can it ever be in the hands of France. The impetuosity of her temper, the energy and restlessness of her character, placed in a point of eternal friction with us, and our character, which though quiet, and loving peace and the pursuit of wealth, is high minded, despising wealth in competition with insult or injury, enterprising and energetic as any nation on earth—these circumstances render it impossible that France and the United States can continue long friends when they meet in so irritable a position. They as well as we must be blind if they do not see this, and we must be very improvident if we do not begin to make arrangements on that hypothesis. The day that France takes possession of New Orleans fixes the sentence which is to restrain her forever within her low-water mark.
> It seals the union of two nations who in conjunction can maintain exclusive possession of the ocean. From that moment we must marry ourselves to the British fleet and nation. We must turn all our attentions to a maritime force, for which our resources place us on very high grounds, and, having formed and cemented together a power which may render reenforcement of her settlements here impossible to France, make the first cannon which shall be fired in Europe the signal for tearing up any settlement she may have made and for holding the two continents of America in sequestration for the common purposes of the united British and American nations.

The restoration of our right of deposit at New Orleans was of such vital importance to our people that Jefferson was willing to form an alliance with Great Britain against France in order to secure it.

Does it not illustrate the irony of fate that the author of the Declaration of Independence and the founder of the Democratic party should be the first American of importance to suggest an alliance between the United States and England? This country needed no alliance with England then, and no alliance with her has ever been advocated by the Republican party. To-day we want no alliance with England, and no consent from England to the carrying out of our national policy. Neither do we to-day sympathize with Great Britain in her aggressive policy against the Dutch republics in South Africa.

But Thomas Jefferson, the father of Democracy, was to purchase the right of deposit at New Orleans by an alliance with Great Britain against France. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Half a minute.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have three-quarters of an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the Republican side has but thirty minutes.

Mr. CANNON. If I may be recognized I think I will yield to my colleague the thirty minutes.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I thank the gentleman; I do not know that I can interest the House for that time.

Jefferson referred to his scheme for recovering our right of deposit as the price of our alliance with England in a letter to James Monroe, in which he said:

> If we can not by a purchase of the country insure to ourselves a course of perpetual peace and friendship with all nations, then, as war can not be distant, it behooves us immediately to be preparing for that course, without, however, hastening it, and it may be necessary—on your failure on the Continent—to cross the channel.

And in another letter, to Robert R. Livingston, the minister to France, he says:

> Should we fail in this object of the mission, a further one will be superadded for the other side of the channel.

It is my purpose to show that, in securing our right of deposit, Jefferson wished to purchase only a small area at the mouth of the Mississippi, and that the rest of the province of Louisiana was forced upon him.

Now, we not only infer this from the circumstances surrounding the acquisition, but we have Jefferson's own words for it. In a letter to P. S. Dupont De Nemours, a distinguished French resident of this country who was about to return to France, and who was a very close friend of the First Consul, he wrote:

> The country, too, which we wish to purchase, except the portion already granted, and which must be confirmed to the private holders, is a barren sand 600 miles from east to west and from 30 to 40 and 50 miles from north to south, formed by deposition of the sands by the Gulf Stream in its circular course round the Mexican Gulf, and which, being spent after performing a semicircle, has made from its last depositions the sand bank of East Florida.

Here we have Jefferson's description of what he wished to purchase. Early in 1803 Congress had authorized an appropriation of $2,000,000 to be used by the President in securing this right of deposit. Failing to get any satisfaction out of the French representative in this country, Jefferson commissioned James Monroe a special envoy extraordinary, to cooperate with Livingston, our minister at Paris, in securing this right of deposit or in purchasing what was called the island of Orleans.

It appears, in addition to his written instructions, that James Monroe had extraordinary oral instructions, referred to in a letter from the President to the minister resident, Mr. Livingston.

Five characters figure prominently in the scene that follows. Jefferson, the first Democratic President; Livingston, our minister to France; Monroe, the special envoy and minister plenipotentiary; Napoleon, the first consul of France and his chief adviser, Talleyrand. The proposition which Monroe and Livingston made to the first consul was to give $2,000,000 for the right of deposit.

The First Consul held them off, and they suspected, as week after week went by, that the cunning Corsican and the wily Talleyrand were not dealing frankly with them, and our commissioners began to look across the channel. Then came Napoleon's trouble with San Domingo, and war between France and Great Britain seemed unavoidable. With Napoleon to think was to act. He saw that he could not hold his territory in the New World against the navy of Great Britain. He did not want to give the right of deposit to us and have England seize the remainder of the province. Besides, he needed money. Our necessity was his opportunity.

By refusing to give the right of deposit, by refusing to sell the island of Orleans, Napoleon disposed of the entire Territory of Louisiana to us for $15,000,000. That is the way the purchase of the Territory came about, and I submit that so far as Jefferson and his colleagues were concerned everything outside the island of Orleans, which would give them the right of deposit, was in the nature of an involuntary acquisition.

In order to get territory that we wanted we had to take a vast extent of territory that we did not want. It was unsettled and unexplored. No one at the time of its acquisition looked upon it as a desirable acquisition.

The opinions prevalent at the time were all summed up in the words of that distinguished lawyer, jurist, and statesman, Fisher Ames, of Massachusetts, who in his mature years said of the Louisiana purchase:

> Now, by adding an unmeasured waste beyond the Mississippi, we plunge like a comet into infinite space. We may, perhaps, in our mad career, jostle some other comet out of its orbit, but we shall in any event effectually quench the light of our own.

That was the way in which the purchase of the Louisiana Territory was regarded not only by the Federalists, but by Jefferson and his colleagues. Outside of the right of deposit it was an unwelcome purchase.

Now, then, let us see the problem that Jefferson had to face when he received the packet from Paris informing him of this purchase. Jefferson regarded the territory of the United States as the territory specifically bounded by the treaty of 1783 between the colonies and Great Britain. When he read the first clause of the third section of Article IV of the Constitution—"New States shall be admitted by the Congress into this Union"—Jefferson considered that this language referred simply to States carved out of the territory described in the treaty of 1783.

He thought that it would require a constitutional amendment to admit to the Union a State outside the limits of 1783, and he also thought that it might require a constitutional amendment to authorize the United States to acquire and hold territory outside these limits. I shall endeavor to make this clear by Jefferson's own words. I repeat, the right to incorporate new States into the Union under section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution was held by Jefferson to apply simply to States organized out of territory east of the Mississippi River.

In the same way Jefferson regarded the language in the second clause of section 3 of Article IV, which says that—

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

He regarded that language, I say, as applying simply to the territory east of the Mississippi River, or the territory described in the treaty of 1783.

You see, then, gentlemen, what a conundrum Jefferson had facing him. Spurred on by the commercial necessities of our people, his emissary to France had been given plenary power by him, and had purchased twelve hundred thousand square miles of territory. In considering the constitutional questions arising out of this purchase, Jefferson's opinions underwent a series of rapid and characteristic changes. Early in January, 1803, he wrote to Gallatin:

You are right, in my opinion, as to Mr. L.'s proposition. There is no constitutional difficulty as to the acquisition of territory; and whether when acquired it may be taken into the Union by the Constitution as it now stands will become a question of expediency. I think it will be safer not to permit the enlargement of the Union but by amendment of the Constitution.

Here we see that Jefferson clearly distinguished between territory belonging to the United States and territory incorporated into the Union. But to be on the safe side he proposed this amendment to the Constitution, which he submitted to the Secretary of the Navy:

The province of Louisiana is incorporated with the United States and made part thereof. The rights of occupancy in the soil and of self-government are confirmed to the Indian inhabitants, as they now exist. Preemption only of the portions rightfully occupied by them, and a succession to the occupancy of such as they may abandon, with the full rights of possession, as well as of property and sovereignty in whatever is not or shall cease to be so rightfully occupied by them, shall belong to the United States.

The Legislature of the Union shall have authority to exchange the right of occupancy in portions where the United States have full right for lands possessed by the Indians within the United States on the east side of the Mississippi; to exchange lands on the east side of the river for those of the white inhabitants on the west side thereof and above the latitude of 31 degrees; to maintain in any part of the province such military posts as may be requisite for peace or safety; to exercise police over all persons therein not being Indian inhabitants; to work salt springs or mines of coal, metals, and other minerals within the possession of the United States, or in any others with the consent of the possessors; to regulate trade and intercourse between the Indian inhabitants and all other persons; to explore and ascertain the geography of the province, its productions, and other interesting circumstances; to open roads and navigation therein where necessary for beneficial communication, and to establish agencies and factories therein for the cultivation of commerce, peace, and good understanding with the Indians residing there.

The legislature shall have no authority to dispose of the lands of the province otherwise than as hereinbefore permitted until a new amendment of the Constitution shall give that authority, except as to that portion thereof which lies south of the latitude of 31°, which, whenever they deem expedient, they may erect into a Territorial government, either separate or as making part with one on the eastern side of the river, vesting the inhabitants thereof with all the rights possessed by other Territorial citizens of the United States.

Secretary Smith thought that an amendment was necessary to authorize the purchase, but he considered that Jefferson's proposition might prove embarrassing to the Government in dealing with the Territory, and suggested this form of an amendment.

Louisiana being in virtue of the treaty, etc., incorporated with the United States and being thereby a part of the territory thereof, Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the same as fully and effectually as if the same had been at the time of the establishment of the Constitution a part of the territory of the United States; provided, nevertheless, that Congress shall not have power to erect or establish in that portion of Louisiana which is situated north of the latitude of 32 degrees any new State or Territorial government nor to grant to any citizen or citizens or other individual or individuals excepting Indians any right or title whatever to any part of said portion of Louisiana until a new amendment of the Constitution shall give that authority.

In August, 1803, Jefferson sent to the Secretary of State and to the Attorney-General still another proposed amendment:

Louisiana, as ceded by France to the United States, is made a part of the United States. Its white inhabitants shall be citizens, and stand, as to their rights and obligations, on the same footing with other citizens of the United States in analogous situations. Save only that as to the portion thereof lying north of an east and west line drawn through the mouth of Arkansas River no new State shall be established, nor any grants of land made, other than to Indians in exchange for equivalent portions of land occupied by them, until authorized by further subsequent amendment to the Constitution shall be made for these purposes.

Florida, also, whenever it may be rightfully obtained, shall become a part of the United States; its white inhabitants shall thereupon be citizens and shall stand as to their rights and obligations on the same footing with other citizens of the United States in analogous situations.

About the same time he wrote to his friend John C. Breckinridge on the subject:

This treaty must, of course, be laid before both Houses, because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably never be again in their power. But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the Constitution, approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized. The Constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory; still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union.

Here, again, you see Jefferson making this distinction between territory to be incorporated into the Union and territory belonging to the United States:

The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of their country, have done an act beyond the Constitution. The legislature, in casting behind them metaphysical subtleties and risking themselves like faithful servants, must ratify and pay for it, and throw themselves on their country for doing for them unauthorized what we know they would have done for themselves had they been in a situation to do it.

It is the case of a guardian investing the money of his ward in purchasing an important adjacent territory and saying to him when of age, "I did this for your good; I pretend to no right to bind you; you may disavow me, and I must get out of the scrape as I can. I thought it my duty to risk myself for you." But we shall not be disavowed by the nation, and their act of indemnity will confirm and not weaken the Constitution by more strongly marking out its lines.

We have nothing later from Europe than the public papers give. I hope yourself and all the Western members will make a sacred point of being at the first day of the meeting of Congress; for vestra res agitur.

The distinguished founder of Democracy had a felicitous way of dropping into Latin and French now and then.

Jefferson also discussed this constitutional question in a letter to Mr. Wilson Cary Nicholas:

I am aware of the force of the observations you make on the power given by the Constitution to Congress to admit new States into the Union without restraining the subject to the territory then constituting the United States. But when I consider that the limits of the United States are precisely fixed by the treaty of 1783, that the Constitution expressly declares itself to be made for the United States, I can not help believing the intention was to permit Congress to admit into the Union new States which should be formed out of the territory for which, and under whose authority alone, they were then acting. I do not believe it was meant that they might receive England, Ireland, Holland, etc., into it, which would be the case on your construction.

And again, on this same subject, in a letter to John Dickinson, he says:

But there is a difficulty in this acquisition which presents a handle to the malcontents among us, though they have not yet discovered it. Our Confederation is certainly confined to the limits established by the Revolution. The General Government has no power but such as the Constitution has given it, and it has not given the power of holding foreign territory, and still less of incorporating it into the Union.

An amendment of the Constitution seems necessary for this. In the meantime we must ratify and pay our money, as we have treated for a thing beyond the Constitution, and rely on the nation to sanction an act done for its great good without previous authority.

The nation did sanction the act. The people were not troubled by any of the scruples respecting the Constitution which perplexed Mr. Jefferson.

We have constitutional interpretations besides those given by the courts, and in this case Jefferson, doing what he himself considered an open violation of the Constitution, found that it was unnecessary to amend it, that the people placed their own interpretations upon the Constitution and ratified his act. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But Jefferson, the strict constructionist, who had a microscopical power of discovering constitutional obstacles to the political schemes of his rivals, had also a nimble way of surmounting all such obstacles for the purpose of accomplishing his own ends.

After writing this first letter to Breckenridge, Jefferson received news from France that she was likely to withdraw from the treaty unless it was speedily ratified, and he sent this letter to Breckenridge:

I wrote you on the 12th instant on the subject of Louisiana and the constitutional provision which might be necessary for it. A letter received yesterday shows that nothing must be said on that subject which may give a pretext for retracting, but that we should do sub silentio what may be found necessary.

Be so good, therefore, as to treat that part of my letter as confidential. It strengthens the reasons for desiring the presence of every friend of the treaty on the first day of the session. Perhaps you can impress this necessity on the Senators of the Western States by private letter.

Accept my friendly salutations and assurances of my great respect and esteem.

Here, then, we have Jefferson maintaining we could not take any territory outside the original limits of 1783 into the Union or hold it as territory belonging to the United States without a constitutional amendment, and at the same time advising the Members and Senators to ratify this purchase and to treat the Constitution sub silentio. By a sort of lightning change he has become the annihilator of the Constitution.

On the same day he wrote to Thomas Paine:

On the 10th instant I wrote you on the subject of Louisiana and mentioned the question of a supplement to the Constitution on that account. A letter received yesterday renders it prudent to say nothing in that subject, but to do sub silentio what shall be found necessary. That part of my letter, therefore, be so good as to treat as confidential.

Accept my friendly salutations and assurances of my great respect and esteem.

Jefferson was the most prolific letter writer we ever had in public office, and it is from the letters which he wrote in confidence to the members of both Houses of Congress and to his personal friends that we gain a true insight into his real feelings. The plan of treating the Constitution sub silentio in dealing with an important question seems to have had a fascination for him. He writes to the Attorney-General:

I quote this for your consideration, observing that the less that is said about any constitutional difficulty the better. I think it will be desirable for Congress to do what is necessary in silence.

It seems surprising that the Attorney-General was the only one of his correspondents who did not understand Latin. [Laughter.]

Now, no constitutional amendment ever was made, and in my opinion no constitutional amendment was necessary. The people of the United States ratified Jefferson's act in this purchase, and in ratifying this act, I submit, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that the people of the United States have placed their own interpretation upon the power of Congress under the Constitution to add new States to the Union and to acquire new territory.

Is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that we acquired Florida by treating the Constitution sub silentio? Is it possible that we took in Texas, that we took in New Mexico, Arizona, and California, by treating the Constitution sub silentio? Is it possible that there is anyone to-day who claims that the twenty States that have come into the Union outside of the original territory of 1783 have been taken into the Union by treating the Constitution sub silentio?

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that there is no escape from this proposition that as to the right of Congress to admit new States into the Union outside of the original limits of 1783 the people have put their interpretation upon the Constitution, and by placing their interpretation upon the first clause of the third section of Article IV in the Constitution, they have also placed their interpretation upon the second clause of the fourth section of Article IV.

If we have the right to take into the Union States outside of the original limits, then much more have we the right to acquire territory outside of the original limits and hold it without incorporating it into the Union and govern it by such laws as Congress may deem wise. Jefferson's views as to what should be done with the vast territory west of the Mississippi are interesting as showing how fully he believed in the necessity of governing the territory without incorporating it into the Union.

On August 9, 1803, Jefferson wrote to his friend John Dickinson:

With respect to the disposal of the country, we must take the island of New Orleans and west side of the river as high up as Point Coupee, containing nearly the whole inhabitants, say about 50,000, and erect it into a State, or annex it to the Mississippi Territory, and shut up all the rest from settlement for a long time to come, endeavoring to exchange some of the country there unoccupied by Indians for the lands held by the Indians on this side of the Mississippi, who will be glad to cede us their country here for an equivalent there, and we may sell out our lands here and pay the whole debt contracted before it becomes due. The impost which will be paid by the inhabitants ceded will pay half the interest of the price we give, so that we really add only half the price to our debt.

On July 11, 1803, Jefferson wrote to Gen. Horatio Gates:

With respect to the territory acquired, I do not think it will be a separate government, as you imagine. I presume the island of New Orleans and the settled country on the opposite bank will be annexed to the Mississippi Territory. We shall certainly endeavor to introduce the American laws there, and that can not be done but by amalgamating the people with such a body of Americans as may take the lead in legislation and government. Of course, they will be under the governor of Mississippi. The rest of the territory will probably be locked up from American settlement and under the self-government of the native inhabitants.

In his letter to Breckenridge of August 12, 1803, Jefferson said:

The inhabited part of Louisiana, from Point Coupée to the sea, will of course be immediately a Territorial government, and soon a State. But above that, the best use we can make of the country for some time will be to give establishments in it to the Indians on the east side of the Mississippi in exchange for their present country, and open land offices in the last, and thus make this acquisition the means of filling up the eastern side instead of drawing off its population. When we shall be full on this side we may lay off a range of States on the western bank from the head to the mouth, and so, range after range, advancing compactly as we multiply.

On December 2, 1803, Jefferson wrote to De Witt Clinton:

More difference of opinion seems to exist as to the manner of disposing of Louisiana than I had imagined possible, and our leading friends are not yet sufficiently aware of the necessity of accommodation and mutual sacrifice of opinion for conducting a numerous assembly, where the opposition, too, is drilled to act in phalanx on every question. Although it is acknowledged that our new fellow-citizens are as yet as incapable of self-government as children, yet some can not bring themselves to suspend its principles for a single moment. The temporary or Territorial government of that country therefore will encounter great difficulty. The question, too, whether the settlement of upper Louisiana shall be prohibited occasions a great division among our friends. Some are for prohibiting it till another amendment to the Constitution shall permit it; others for prohibiting by authority of the Legislature only; a third set for permitting immediate settlement.

I think that this illustration from the purchase of the Louisiana Territory shows clearly that we may sometimes have to acquire territory that we do not want in order to get the territory that we do want. And can it be maintained that we as a sovereign people, in taking territory that we do not want in order to get territory that we do want, must incorporate the territory that we do not want into the Union and give to the people of that territory all the rights and privileges of citizens under the Constitution?

If that is so, then this must be so, that we as a people are deprived of a right which no other sovereign nation is without. If we can not take and hold territory without incorporating it into the Union, then, in some way, we as a people have yielded away one of our sovereign rights. But let us take another view of this matter.

The first thing that you think of in a sovereign people is the right of self-protection, coupled with the right to wage offensive and defensive war. What is the most natural result of waging a successful war? Certainly it is the acquisition of the territory of the enemy. If the contention of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber be true that we can not acquire and hold territory without incorporating it into the Union and making the inhabitants thereof citizens of the United States, then, Mr. Chairman, when we are at war and want to strike the enemy in the most vulnerable spot we must send out a commission to inquire into the nature of the country, the character of the inhabitants, whether they are fit to be taken into the Union and given all the rights of American citizens, before we can strike the blow. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

In my mind, Mr. Chairman, there is no escape from the proposition. The people, through the Constitution, have placed the right to declare war in Congress. Congress has the right to prosecute this war in every way known to modern and civilized warfare. The most ordinary result of such a war is the conquest of territory. And the holding of the conquered territory may be essential to our safety. But if, as gentlemen on the other side contend, we can not hold territory without incorporating it into the Union, then we might be compelled to do that which would work incalculable injury to our own people.

If we can not hold territory without incorporating it into the Union and making its inhabitants citizens, then we must give it up, when to give it up might strengthen our enemy and imperil our safety, or we must admit a degraded race into full American citizenship and bring into competition with intelligent, free American labor the pauper labor of the Orient. The bare statement of such a principle is sufficient to bring down upon it universal condemnation.

Have I not stated your principle correctly? Every man on the other side of the Chamber who has spoken on this subject has said that Puerto Rico is United States territory, that the Philippines are United States territory, and that the Filipinos and Puerto Ricans are citizens of the United States, and that their political status is fixed by the Constitution. Are you not, for mere temporary political purposes, asserting a principle that you will sometime indignantly repudiate? Are you willing to concede free trade with the Philippine Islands? Are you willing to admit Filipino laborers into competition with American labor?

We took Puerto Rico and the Philippines as we took California—as an incident to a just war. What are we to do with them? The answer is in the second clause of the third section of Article IV of the Constitution: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

And in considering what rules and regulations are necessary we must consider our own people and their rights as well as the claims of the inhabitants of these islands.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman a question right there.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the people of that country, remote from us as they are, were such as could be incorporated, would you then favor making the Philippines American States?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. That is not the question at issue. I am now discussing simply the question of our right to acquire and govern territory, and I would reply to the gentleman's question in the language of Thomas Jefferson, vestra res agitur. [Great laughter.]

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Having replied by an evasion in the language of Thomas Jefferson, will you reply in some way in your own language to the question? If the Philippine Islands were peopled by inhabitants suitable to American citizenship, would you then favor making them American States under the Constitution?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I do not think that I should, for reasons which I have no time now to discuss.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Would you favor taking in a territory which by military necessity we had to appropriate and admit its people to equal rights with us?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. It would depend upon the character of the people and other circumstances. Each acquisition of territory must be dealt with on its own merits. I certainly should not favor admitting to American citizenship a race of cannibals.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. One further question. Would you, if not willing to take them in, go to the extent of believing that, regardless of what their qualifications be, they should be deprived of the protection of the Constitution?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. What gives a foreign people any rights under our Constitution?

Who made the Constitution? Our ancestors, the people of the thirteen independent American colonies. For whom was it made? For themselves and for their posterity. As a nation we have expanded in territory and increased in population beyond the most extravagant dreams of our ancestors. We have received into the Union every territory inhabited by a people able and willing to enjoy the privileges and discharge the duties of American citizenship.

We have welcomed with hospitable arms to our political household men of all climes, of all races, of all religions, who came to us with the honest purpose to share with us the burdens and the blessings of our National Government; but we can not extend the Constitution over a people unwilling to be governed by it, and no people can claim any rights under the Constitution whom we do not admit to a participation in those rights. If people inhabiting territory that we acquired by discovery or as an incident of war can by reason of such acquisition be made citizens of the United States, then we are not a free people.

The first principle of free government, the principle underlying all written constitutions, is that those who found the government shall have absolute freedom of choice in selecting those who shall participate in the government. Take away this freedom of choice and the strength of the republic is lost.

Now, our Democratic friends claim that this freedom of choice as to whom we shall admit into the Union is imperialism, and they are solicitous for the welfare of the inhabitants of our newly acquired possessions.

But in this crisis, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am more solicitous for our own country.

We must do justice to the Puerto Ricans, but in doing justice to them we must see to it that we do no injustice to our fellow-countrymen. We must do right by the 8,000,000 Filipinos, but in doing right by them we must see to it that we do no wrong by 80,000,000 American citizens. [Prolonged applause.]

Case of Brigham H. Roberts, of Utah.

OF
HON. DAVID H. SMITH, OF KENTUCKY.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, January 24, 1900,

On the following resolution:

"Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky said:

Mr. SPEAKER: At the opening of this session, upon the call of the members duly certified to have been elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress for the purpose of administering the oath of office to them, when the name of B. H. Roberts, of Utah, was called, a member from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] arose and objected to his being sworn upon the ground as stated in the preamble to the resolution subsequently adopted:

It is charged that Brigham H. Roberts, a Representative-elect from the State of Utah, is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives.

Thereupon, and at the request of and with the assurance of the Speaker that he would not thereby waive nor lose any of his rights and privileges, Mr. Roberts stood aside temporarily. On the next day, December 5, the House adopted this resolution:

Whereas it is charged that Brigham H. Roberts, a Representative-elect to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah, is ineligible to a seat in the House of Representatives; and

Whereas such charge is made through a member of this House, on his responsibility as such member and on the basis, as he asserts, of public records, affidavits, and papers evidencing such ineligibility:

Resolved, That the question of the prima facie right of Brigham H. Roberts to be sworn in as a Representative from the State of Utah in the Fifty-sixth Congress, as well as of his final right to a seat therein as such Representative, be referred to a special committee of nine members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker; and until such committee shall report upon and the House decide such question and right the said Brigham H. Roberts shall not be sworn in or be permitted to occupy a seat in this House; and said committee shall have power to send for persons and papers and examine witnesses on oath in relation to the subject-matter of this resolution, etc.

By this resolution it was made the plain and unavoidable duty of the committee to inquire into and report upon, first, the prima facie right of Mr. Roberts to be sworn as a member of this House, and second, his final right "to a seat therein." After an exhaustive and impartial hearing the committee ascertained and has reported the facts to be as follows:

FINDING OF FACTS.

We find that Brigham H. Roberts was elected as a Representative to the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah and was at the date of his election above the age of 25 years; that he had been for more than seven years a naturalized citizen of the United States and was an inhabitant of the State of Utah.

We further find that about 1878 he married Louisa Smith, his first and lawful wife, with whom he has ever since lived as such, and who since their marriage has borne him six children.

That about 1885 he married as his plural wife Celia Dibble, with whom he has ever since lived as such, and who since such marriage has borne him six children, of whom the last were twins, born August 11, 1897.

That some years after his said marriage to Celia Dibble he contracted another plural marriage with Margaret C. Shipp, with whom he has ever since lived in the habit and repute of marriage. Your committee is unable to fix the exact date of this marriage. It does not appear that he held her out as his wife before January, 1897, or that she before that date held him out as her husband, or that before that date they were reputed to be husband and wife.

That these facts were generally known in Utah, publicly charged against him during his campaign for election, and were not denied by him.

The first section of the findings affirms the existence of every fact required by the second clause of section 2, Article I, of the Constitution, to render a person eligible to membership in the House of Representatives. The other findings of facts relate to polygamous marriages and unlawful cohabitations by Mr. Roberts. It is unnecessary for me to attempt to manifest by argument that elements of eligibility to the position of Representative in Congress, other than those specified in the section of the Constitution referred to above, can not be imposed. That has been so ably and irrefutably done by the gentlemen from Maine and Missouri, Messrs. LITTLEFIELD and DE ARMOND, that I apprehend that any effort I might make for that purpose would be commonplace indeed, if not feeble, when compared with their masterful presentations of the subject. I am content with the privilege of making the bare announcement that it is my deliberate judgment that no power exists anywhere to take from or add to the requisites to eligibility under the Constitution.

If it be so, then, that Mr. Roberts was not only elected, but according to the committee's report was eligible when elected, being so, he is now entitled to take the oath and enjoy all the rights and privileges of a member of this House until his connection therewith shall be severed in an authorized manner. But the majority have, according to my conception, failed, at least in part, in the resolution presented to respond to the demands of the resolution under which they were acting. The question of the prima facie right of Roberts to be sworn was submitted to them no less than was that of his "final right to a seat" in this body, and it was the plain duty of this committee to present resolutions answering in positive terms and unequivocal language each of these inquiries. By the resolutions it adopts upon this subject this House will deliver its judgment to the country upon this interesting case, and I submit that it ought to be so explicit that misconstruction and misapprehension will be impossible.

Not only ought it to be so, but it ought to present the questions under consideration with such clearness, distinctness, and in such form that every member can by his vote express his views upon each proposition separately and in a way to leave no occasion for misunderstanding his course. This the majority have not done by the resolution brought in by them. That resolution reads:

Resolved, That under the facts and circumstances of this case, Brigham H. Roberts, Representative-elect from the State of Utah, ought not to have or hold a seat in the House of Representatives, and that the seat to which he was elected is hereby declared vacant.

ROBERT W. TAYLER.
CHARLES B. LANDIS.
PAGE MORRIS.
ROMEO H. FREER.
SMITH MCPHERSON.
SAMUEL W. T. LANHAM.
ROBERT W. MIERS.

In it they do not say whether Mr. Roberts did or did not have the prima facie right to be sworn, though, under the facts reported, there are many of us who do not doubt it. That was one of the two questions referred to the committee, and yet by the majority resolution we are precluded from a distinct and direct vote upon it. It is no sufficient apology to say that we may express our convictions touching that point by voting against the majority resolution, because to do so is to take a position that may be construed to mean that we are opposed to the expulsion of Roberts, when, in fact, speaking for myself at least, I am for his expulsion, and I have no doubt that all, or nearly all, of those who are of the opinion that he has a right to take the oath agree with me on this proposition. But it may be contended that those who think him entitled to the oath and favor his expulsion afterwards can express themselves correctly by voting for the minority resolution and, if that fails, then voting for the majority resolution. No; this can not be. The minority resolution reads:

Resolved, That Brigham H. Roberts, having been duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-sixth Congress from the State of Utah, with the qualifications requisite for admission to the House as such, is entitled as a constitutional right to take the oath of office prescribed for members-elect, his acts as a polygamist unlawfully cohabiting with plural wives affording constitutional ground for expulsion, but not for exclusion, from the House.

It declares that the matters and thing proved against Roberts supply sufficient cause for expulsion, not exclusion, and that he is entitled to have the oath administered, while the majority resolution denies absolutely this right to him, and by its form declares that exclusion and not expulsion is the remedy to be applied. The two votes would be not only confusing, but contradictory in every phase. By the one we would be made to say that expulsion was the proper course of punishment; by the other that exclusion was. By the one we would be committed to the proposition that he had the constitutional right to demand the oath; by the other we would deny it. I would cheerfully vote to expel Mr. Roberts upon the facts found by the committee, but it is my sincere conviction and irrevocable conclusion that he was and is eligible to his seat and had, when this Congress assembled and will have till the moment of his expulsion, the constitutional right to have the oath of office administered to him. The committee has so framed its resolution that to support it is not only to deny to this gentleman a right to which I conceive he is entitled under the Constitution, but likewise to exercise the power of exclusion by this body when the facts and the Constitution do not warrant it. I am unwilling to deprive Mr. Roberts wrongfully of that to which he is entitled. I can not consent to do that which I believe to be in violation of the Constitution, which, with uplifted hand, I swore to support and defend; I will not aid in overriding the Constitution in order that we may get rid of Mr. Roberts when he can be easily and quickly disposed of in consonance with the fundamental law.

The Late Daniel Ermentrout.

HON. DAVID A. DE ARMOND, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 3, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. DANIEL ERMENTROUT, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania.

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for fitting tribute to his memory.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy of the same to the family of the deceased.

"Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, do adjourn"—

Mr. DE ARMOND said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I avail myself of the opportunity to say something in memory of my friend DANIEL ERMENTROUT.

The thought is a melancholy one that so often, in the pilgrimage from birth to death, we find friends dropping from our side, to be gone ere we can so much as bid them good-bye and Godspeed; and when suddenly aroused to the consciousness that they are gone, never to return, how poor and idle are the best words that we can utter concerning them. How poor and weak is the speech which we employ over inanimate clay, with the spirit translated to a state of being invisible to mortal eyes and outlined only before the eye of Faith. To the exalted understanding which, it may be, death at once sets free, with the breaking of the shackles of the flesh, our strongest utterances may seem as the prattle of little children; and if the awakening into the real life is to come later, what a faint whisper must our speech be as it assaults so vainly the deaf ear of dreamless silence.

However often one may have witnessed the unerring stroke of Death, however often the sable wing may have darkened for him the sky of being and of hope, still does the unwearied messenger come with awe in his mien and pain in his touch. The mortal upon whom Death's finger is laid may find it soothing as is the divinely tender touch of the mother's hand as it rests upon the infant so lovingly cradled upon her breast, or Death may snuff the candle of life long after consciousness is gone and all earthly sensations of pleasure and of pain have come to an end. But to those who survive, the witnesses at once of Death's remorseless power and their own impotency, Death comes as the dread messenger of pain and sorrow; the rude foe to happiness; the despoiler of families; the maker of widows and orphans; the destroyer of mirth, that sadness may take its place; the agent that turns laughter to weeping, that banishes hope and installs despair, that sprinkles young heads with gray hairs, that bows the strong into semblance of weakness, that drives out affluence that penury may enter, that sets tender feet into paths that are rough, that blots out sun and moon and stars, and hangs around and about the sable clouds of rayless night. But, thanks to the good God above us, to most the sun again appears, and over most again smiles the gentle moon and beam the lovely stars, "the forget-me-nots of the angels."

DANIEL ERMENTROUT passed from earth after manhood's prime, but before the evening of life had come, and while the fires of being yet burned with a steady glow, if no longer with the strong heat of lustier days. His life was an active one, honored and useful. He was a fine type of the sturdy race from which he sprang, and which has given the world so many noble men and women. To-day, in far-away South Africa, men such as he was, possessed of the same race characteristics and with him entitled to them by a common inheritance, are fighting for liberty as he would have fought if his lot had been cast in their devoted land, and liberty had depended upon him for defense against tyranny, its foe of all ages and all climes, as now it rests its hopes in the strength of the arms of its Krugers and Jouberts and their humble Boer followers. DANIEL ERMENTROUT would have proved worthy to fight, and, if need be, to die in the holy cause of freedom, as becomes all who are worthy to live.

Who was more steadfast in friendship than he, or more generous in meeting cheerfully its every sacrifice? As one who knew him well and enjoyed his friendship, I know whereof I speak. When he was one's friend—and his friendship was by no means confined to a few—one need have no fear that temptation or prospective advantage could cool his ardor or alienate him. He was a true and unselfish friend; and who ought not to be proud of deserving so high a tribute?

How often do we fail to estimate true friendship at its high worth! I doubt if we ever overestimate it; I doubt if we could do so. The friendship that is unselfish (and really there is no other kind, though sometimes a pseudo-friendship gains currency, in a state of comparative scarcity of the genuine article) is the beautiful blossom of one of the noblest growths of the human mind and heart; next, indeed, in loveliness to pure love itself. Fair-weather friends, of course, are abundant, altogether too plentiful. But the friends of every season and all the vicissitudes of life, whom no disturbances can frighten, no storms can drive away, no darkness can blind, how priceless they are! True friendship is the towering mountain peak whence love for neighbor as for self, love sublimated and etherealized into fitness for the life beyond this life, takes its flight to the land of eternal day.

Memory of him that was, but in this world is no more, survives the tomb, to fail at last, as all things earthly fail, in the never-ending, ever-fatal conflict with Time. At least we have the consolation of realizing that our memories of DANIEL ERMENTROUT are kindly and pleasant, and long will they abide with us. And yet it will not be long until our names and deeds and characteristics, like his, will be committed to the memories of those who shall know, and, may be, shall esteem us as we esteem him. And so goes the little round of being. We shall occupy a dot of space in a fraction of time, and then we, too, shall have gone the way of the tiny wave upon the great ocean of life. We may hope to live in our children rather than in ourselves and in our country rather than in either or both. The race can move onward and upward though men perish out of it. The Republic should wax stronger while generations of men weaken with age and leave it by the door of death. The deep love of country and of republican government, pure and undefiled, may link generation after generation in a chain of patriotism that Time will be powerless to break in long ages; and thus, proudly contributing our part toward sowing widely and maintaining firmly the principles of free government, when the summons comes we may hope to depart in the soothing consciousness of being able to answer to the last salute, "All's well."

Departed friend, we can do nothing for thee. But while dropping the tear of affection over thy last resting place and feebly syllabling a few words for the monument to thy memory, let us be mindful that by emulating thy virtues and drawing the mantle of charity over thy frailties (and what man born of woman is free from them) we may help ourselves toward kindlier lives and nobler deeds. And thus, as Time goes on, moving ever and halting never, the world ought to grow better and happier.

Faithful unto death to thy friends, they that knew thee best esteem thee most, and with pleasant memories of thee which long will endure, in the light of Hope banishing the gloom of Despair, they bid thee, DANIEL ERMENTROUT, not good-by, but good night.

Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Appropriation Bill.

SPEECHES
HON. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 14, and Friday, February 23, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8347) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes—

Mr. BARTHOLDT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 6 appears the following, which I ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is not a State in the American Union that has a better election law than the State of Missouri. I drew it myself; I helped pass it through the legislature. In that imperial Commonwealth every man, black or white, rich or poor, votes once and has his vote counted once.

Mr. ADAMS. Yet we had a gentleman rise in his seat the other day [Mr. BARTHOLDT] and state that the election law in Missouri was such that it would be impossible to hold an honest election there. Did the gentleman from Missouri draw and pass that law?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no such law. I will state what is the matter with the gentleman from St. Louis.

Mr. ADAMS. He is all right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a moment. The gentleman from Missouri represents a large German constituency.

Mr. ADAMS. That is good.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are in favor of the Boers and against the Philippine propaganda. The gentleman from Missouri has been running with the McKinley Administration until his political fences have got into very bad order, and he thought he would recoup by getting up here and making a spread-eagle speech about the corruption of elections in St. Louis.

Mr. BARTHOLDT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I made a dispassionate statement the other day——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, I did not hear it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It was made in a Republican caucus, and I do not intend to betray the secrets of a caucus. But I stand by every word I said—that the election law in our State is every bit as bad as, if not worse than, the law upon the statute books of the State of Kentucky, which resulted the other day in bloodshed and murder. And I want to ask the gentleman a question in this connection. If he drew the election law of Missouri, he is probably aware of the fact that under that new law there may not be appointed in the city of St. Louis a Republican either as judge of elections or as clerk; consequently the machinery is entirely in the hands of the Democracy——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. So far as my own district is concerned——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a moment. I yielded for a question; not for a speech. I want to make my speech myself.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman referred to my State; will he allow me a word in this connection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We will give you time when I get through. I want to go on with my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield further.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. From this colloquy it appears, Mr. Chairman, that my loquacious friend did not afford me an opportunity to make further answer to his peculiar statements at the time. I propose to do so now, and am glad of his challenge, because the House will probably not be averse to hearing from Republican Missouri on this floor after Democratic Missouri has, by actual count, talked 96 columns of the RECORD since this session opened. You wonder, but it is a fact. It is equal to an eight-column contribution from each of the twelve apostles of Missouri Democracy, and if they keep up their terrible record to the end of this Congress, why, the true apostles, in spite of their work of a lifetime, will not be in it with them. This accounts, perhaps, for what a friend of mine, whom I was sending the RECORD, wrote me the other day. "I am tired," he says, "of these Democratic stump speeches. For God's sake, stop sending the RECORD!"

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman and his colleagues have filled 96 columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with their remarks during this session, and I must now insist upon having my say.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to know whether the gentleman's correspondent is black or white.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My correspondent had been reading the speeches of my colleagues on the financial bill, and it made him not only tired, but desperate, because I know how much he at first appreciated receiving that great Congressional publication. If he is compelled to listen to the same kind of stuff during the next campaign, the Lord only knows what, besides voting the Republican ticket, he will do. I believe his feelings to be typical of the sentiments of the American people.

But while we on this side, Republican Missouri, contended ourselves with casting affirmative votes on that great financial measure, in the belief that our simple "ayes" surpassed in effectiveness the most eloquent orations, what did our Democratic colleagues say in those 96 columns? Condensed in just one word, their speeches breathed denunciation. In sixty-odd columns they denounced the financial bill, and in the balance of their time they denounced the Government and everybody and everything in and out of the country, not even stopping at either ocean, but wading 4,000 miles through the Atlantic in one direction and 6,000 miles through the Pacific in the other.

But among the names of persons upon whose heads they visited their wrath, you will look in vain for that of one Aguinaldo, the enemy of their country, which goes to show that in their eyes a rebellion against the American flag is, after all, not half as unpopular as by right the history of our country should have made it. They go about with their umbrellas up, from force of habit and as a result of the last Democratic Administration, and do not see that the sunshine of Republican prosperity is now cheering the American people. They are fighting all kinds of imaginary wrongs and do not see that labor is employed at good wages, that capital yields fair returns, and that only their honest cooperation in the enactment of the most necessary laws is needed to secure a continuation of these favorable economic conditions. [Applause.]

Only one sentence, Mr. Chairman, has been uttered by a Republican in this Congress which my colleagues from Missouri indorse, and that sentiment, rashly spoken, is not true. I refer to the assertion made in the other House that charity does not begin at home. It is wrong, I say, but it will suit my Democratic colleagues as long as Missouri is Democratic. They criticise, find fault with, and denounce the National Government as long as it is Republican, but don't you retaliate by scrutinizing the conditions in their own State as long as it is Democratic! Oh, no. They say to you, Charity does not begin at home.

Let us raise the curtain a little. The last legislature of my State passed a law introducing Goebelism in St. Louis. And yet my friend from the Ninth district [Mr. CLARK] says:

> There is no State in the American Union that has a better election law than the State of Missouri.

Now, I want to be entirely fair with him. I suspect, in making that bold statement, he referred to the law which applies to rural Missouri. But if my supposition is correct, and if it is such a good law, why, I ask, was it changed? Why was St. Louis singled out and placed under an exceptional statute? I will answer the question. Because St. Louis is a Republican city, and the change in the law was made to wipe out its Republican majority. That is it. When Missouri came up with her old-time Democratic majority last fall the leaders of that party bristled up and hatched a scheme which was afterwards enacted into law, and by which the only Republican oasis in that Democratic desert is to be swept away. The law provides for the appointment of three commissioners of election by the governor, two Democrats and one Republican, who have complete control of all elections.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is that not more than two of one political party?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, sir. The commission is to consist of three.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But you are taking for granted, which in all human probability is true, that Missouri will have a Democratic governor until the end of the world?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And if Missouri should have a Republican governor, which it will have after the next election, I know the Republican majority will put a fair election law upon the statute books, and make the law bipartisan by appointing two Democrats and two Republicans.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You would have two Republican commissioners and one Democrat, if you had the governor, which you never will have. We have had one, and that was enough.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. These commissioners appoint the judges and clerks, designate the polling places, and put on or strike from the voting lists any names of citizens in their discretion. Under the old law the action of the commissioners in all these respects was subject to revision by the circuit court, but this irksome safeguard of honest elections was shrewdly stricken out.

The mayor of St. Louis in a telegram to me states his objections to the new law in these terse words:

> ST. LOUIS, MO., February 10, 1900.
> Hon. RICHARD BARTHOLDT, Washington, D. C.:
> The law is bitterly partisan. It professes to recognize the Republican party by providing for the appointment of one commissioner, but he has no power whatever and can be ignored and overruled in every detail by the other two. The chief objection, however, is that the power of the courts to supervise the action of the election board in selecting judges and clerks, in designating polling places, and in striking names of citizens from the voting lists is withdrawn and the courts are left powerless. This was the great safeguard under the law replaced by the present act.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a fair sample of Democratic rule in Missouri. It leaves the Republican party in my city absolutely powerless. But not satisfied with this infamous piece of business, the same legislature, with the same sneering indifference to the people of St. Louis, saddled upon that city a new police law abnormally increasing the force, which force will consist of none but Democratic workers and heelers, ready to do the bidding of the men whom the Democratic governor has favored with appointments as police commissioners. It is partisanship run wild, and I challenge my friends on the other side to point out a single Republican State in the Union where the power of legislation has been similarly abused for partisan ends. Here we are not confronted by a mere question of policy as to whether the welfare of the people will best be promoted by this course or that course—and the national situation presents no other question—but we have to deal here with a deliberate attempt upon the very life of our institutions and upon the bulwarks of our civil rights and liberties.

This is the reason why I say to my colleagues on the other side: Charity does begin at home. If you come here and criticize and impugn the conduct of the National Administration, you want to have clean hands! If you want to stand sponsor for the rights and liberties of the American people, or of other people thousands of miles away, you will first have to show an unsullied title from home. And if it can be shown, as I think I have, that in your own State you trample the sacred privileges of the people under foot and propose to govern a great American city, such as St. Louis, "without the consent of the governed," then your ninety-six columns of oratory have simply been talked to the winds. [Applause.]

But my friend talked about the Germans—that they are in favor of the Boers and against the Philippine propaganda, and that because I side with the Administration my political fences had gotten into very bad order, etc. I thank my friend for his sympathetic concern. I can imagine him walking through the corridors with tears in his eyes because there might be a doubt about my reelection, but I trust he will be somewhat comforted by the assurance that this does not bother me at all, possibly because I know the disposition of the German voters a little better than he does. I should like to know what has happened to alienate even one of them from the Republican party. Is it the prospective renomination of Bryan? While it may or may not be true that that gentleman has recently written several letters to the distinguished editor of a German Republican paper in St. Louis, asking his support, I do not think the seductive offers which may have been held out to the editor have had any effect whatever. The laws of business and sound politics prohibit such an unholy alliance.

Is it because Carl Schurz has declared that as between 16 to 1 and expansion the former was the smaller evil? Well, judging from my experience in the Ohio election last fall, and from the result of it, that advice, however honest it may have been, did not sway any considerable number of voters from their rule of political conduct. Is it because a man in Milwaukee has declared that by holding the Democratic national convention in that half-German city Bryan will catch the German vote? I can not help but feel pity for the man who thinks he can influence German-American voters the same as a photographer quiets babies—by show and claptrap. Believe me, if ten national conventions were held in Milwaukee, it would not have the slightest influence upon the vote of that population of thinking, cooly deliberating citizens, but such talk shows, and it has even found its way into the newspapers, how much, or rather how little, the true German character is known even to some who pretend to speak for that element.

No, my friends, the Germans know you better than you know them. They know you are a free-silver party. They know you are a free-trade party. They know you are a party of negation, opposing at all times anything and everything advocated by the Republicans, whether right or wrong. They know your component elements, and they do not care, at least in my part of the country, to identify themselves with you. My friend says the Germans are "against the Philippine propaganda." Yes; they are against his "Philippine propaganda." That is the great difference between the Germans and the Irish. The former are always disposed to be with the Government, while it is said of our Irish friends that, from home traditions, they are mostly "agin" it. The Germans are an inherently conservative, not a revolutionary, race, and love of peace and order, obedience to law, and loyalty to superiors and to the Government are their chief characteristics.

Whatever may have been their opinion about the acquisition of outlying territory, whatever may have been their first impulses with regard to the new course enjoined upon the ship of state by the Paris treaty—and their impulses were honest and patriotic—the majority of my German constituents agree with the Administration that a backward step is out of question now. [Applause.] They now acquiesce in the treaty of peace, as President and Senate acquiesced in it, and as you yourselves have acquiesced in it by voting $20,000,000 for the purchase of the Philippines.

And right here let me remind you that this Congressional action was the President's authority for all the measures he was afterwards obliged to adopt for the purpose of enforcing the terms of that treaty. If the newly built ship "Expansion" was to be sunk, here was your chance to scuttle it. You have failed to do it. Out of 154 Democrats in the last House only 33 voted against the appropriation, and the proposition was carried by a vote of 219 against those 33. And now the same men who then voted to uphold the treaty and to uphold the President are raising the cry of imperialism and expect the voters to believe in their sincerity. No President ever received a more emphatic expression of confidence and a plainer mandate from Congress than did President McKinley on this occasion.

Suppose, now, he had refused to obey that mandate? Perish the thought. Not to speak of the humiliating confession involved in this supposition, namely, that this great Government of ours makes a treaty but is too weak or cowardly to enforce it; not to mention the derisive sneers with which the whole civilized world would have justly met such a startling exhibition of impotence by a sappy Republic, our Democratic friends, bound to be on the other side of what we think and do, would then have surely raised the cry of czarism instead of imperialism, and, what is worse, they would have been entirely justified in doing it.

To hold new possessions by treaty instead of constitutional sanction, and honestly meet an emergency which the framers of the Constitution did not dream of and even the present generation had not foreseen, is a trifling offense, indeed, as compared with the dangerous example of a President arbitrarily setting at naught what, under the Constitution, is the highest law of the land—a treaty obligation. And if, on the other hand, the President had counseled the American peace commissioners not to insist upon the cession of the islands, who guarantees that the Democrats, as the original expansion party, would not have raised a hue and cry about such blundering statecraft which fritters away a most brilliant opportunity?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] can yield to the gentleman from Missouri a part of his own time if he desires.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I have only about ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BENTON. Will that come out of the general time?

The CHAIRMAN. It must come out of the general time.

Mr. CANNON. If I can be recognized, I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized, and yields to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It is a well-known fact that Mr. Bryan advised his friends in the Senate to vote for the ratification of the treaty, and finally, with a correct estimate of the temper of the people, whose patriotic impulses had been aroused by Dewey's magnificent victory as never before, came personally to Washington and appealed to his friends not to throw away the fruits of that great victory, but to respect the patriotic sentiments of the people and vote for ratification. There is only one logical conclusion to be drawn from this attitude of Mr. Bryan. It is that had he been President, he, too, would have consented to the purchase of the Philippines. Who will disprove it? If he was opposed to the President's policy, here was his great opportunity to accentuate the difference between the two parties. He preferred that in this respect there should be no difference, just as you had declared in the House, and thus the die was cast in favor of expansion. Ever since that time the question is definitely settled, and no amount of argument, reasoning, or vituperation can now change the course which was then decided upon.

In the light of these recent historical facts it would seem that it comes with peculiarly bad grace from Democrats to pose as anti-expansionists here or elsewhere, for every charge hurled at the Administration on that score will by the force of circumstances prove a boomerang. But they are "out," and in order to get "in" they must have an issue. So they sew the torn shreds of the anti-expansion banner together, beat the tom-tom, gather the clans and choose as their standard bearer the very man who had himself torn that standard to pieces. Logical, isn't it?

I notice, by the way, that our Southern friends are strangely reticent and remarkably silent on this subject. Either as statesmen they do not appreciate the logic of some of their brethren in the North, or as guardians of the material interests of their constituents they realize that the future demands of the Orient for the staple products of the South should not be jeopardized by leading a forlorn hope for party supremacy. It may be, too, that both reasons account for their present attitude. Certain it is that they do not, like my Missouri colleagues, furnish reasons to the world why Aguinaldo is right. They are not attempting to demonstrate that their own country is wrong. They do not give aid and comfort to the enemy by denouncing the Administration for trying to carry out binding treaty obligations, and if I am not greatly mistaken in the temper of the Southern people, a vast majority of them believe with us that the road which leads to peace in the Philippines will be marked, not by the surrender of America, but by the surrender of Aguinaldo. [Applause.]

And when that goal is reached, Mr. Chairman, why, we shall give those people home rule, tempered only by American sovereignty. Is there in this great country of ours a man who would not be willing to grant them that same measure of liberty and self-government which Canada enjoys? Is our national pride and our national honor at such low ebb as to allow the American flag, the emblem of freedom and human rights, to undergo a change on its way through the Pacific Ocean? Does it symbolize liberty here and tyranny elsewhere? No, Mr. Chairman, it can not be true. I was not born on American soil, I am an adopted son of the Republic, but I would let them put me on the rack, with the 6,000,000 of Bryan voters dancing the ghost dance around me, rather than admit or believe it! [Applause.]

No true American will believe it, no matter where his cradle stood or whence his parents or ancestors came. His heart tells him that the Stars and Stripes will fade or change color neither at home nor abroad, neither in the icy fields of the polar region nor under the rays of a tropical sun. And any political prophet who would count on our American citizens of German descent as even skeptical on this score will reckon without his host. It is grossly underrating their oft-tested loyalty to suppose that they would swap parties now and desert, at a critical juncture of our international relations, and in the midst of prosperity at home, the best President we have had since the days of Lincoln. [Applause.]

But let me face the music in all its different tunes. We hear so much about the wealth of the Philippines. Why, I say, if those islands were as barren and as rocky as the top of Pikes Peak, it would not make the slightest difference in the political aspect of the case. From the very moment the peace treaty was ratified by the Senate we had burned our bridges behind us, not as a party, mind you, but as a nation, and the carrying out of that treaty then became the concern of every good American, no matter whether we had bought a white elephant or a bonanza. It is our privilege to hope for fair returns, and none but a misled partisan's wishes will run to the contrary; but the actual results, whatever they may be, can not and should not affect the moral principle involved.

The form of government, it is true, has nothing to do with trade and commerce. Republics and monarchies are on equal footing when they reach out for the world's trade, and there are those who say that when we are among wolves we must howl with them. All this is true, but if our human necessities do not permit us to be angels we can at least take higher ground than the grasping monarchies of Europe, and history furnishes no better illustration than the payment by us of $20,000,000 to Spain. No question, we could have secured the islands for nothing from a vanquished, humiliated, and powerless foe, but this payment of a consideration makes me feel prouder of my country than any other transaction in the history of that war which our Democratic friends boast of having forced upon both Congress and the President.

At the time the peace commissioners sat around the green table at Paris the great newspapers of Europe—of London, Paris, and Berlin—said in their editorials: "Now, let us wait and see whether that mighty Republic beyond the ocean can be fair and magnanimous in the treatment of poor vanquished Spain." While their own governments would, perhaps, have acted less considerately under similar circumstances, their verdict now is and must be that we were fair and magnanimous, and I would not have another verdict at ten times the cost. Who can say now that we have acquired those islands by conquest? We have simply purchased them, just as Germany recently bought the Caroline Islands and as Thomas Jefferson bought the Louisiana Territory nearly a hundred years ago.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I thank the House for its attention and hope to have an opportunity to conclude my remarks at some future time. [Applause.]

Friday, February 23, 1900.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, since I occupied the floor a few days ago one of my colleagues from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has seen fit to champion on this floor the cause of the Goebelites of my State and to actually defend the iniquitous election law by which our last Democratic legislature has tried to punish the great city of St. Louis because that city has had the temerity to go Republican by a large majority. I shall not answer him at this time, because no answer is necessary. My colleague has surprised his own party friends by his bold statements, and I believe few Democrats from St. Louis if clothed with the responsibility of a member of Congress and at all familiar with the actual conditions existing in that city, would have stood up here, as did my colleague, to excuse, justify, and defend what all good citizens, irrespective of party, agree to regard as an unheard-of piece of partisan legislation.

But, as I said, I shall not now take up the time of the House to discuss this question further, especially because a higher arbiter than even this House will soon pass judgment upon it. I refer to the people, the voters of my city and State, who will properly receipt for value received at the polls next November. In the meantime Congress, with all the facts before it, will, I trust, take up the matter and determine whether the Democratic contention that the nation as a whole is not interested in honest elections in the several States is correct or not. At present I prefer to go on with my argument on the policy of the National Government.

Our constitutional lawyers, Mr. Chairman, are busy these days to prove that we can hold outside possessions by treaty and govern them by the authority of Congress, not regardless of the Constitution, but, rather, without stretching it in order to cover such territory. I am inclined to agree with them. But, with all due respect to their learning, as legislators they seem to overlook the simplest thing in the world, namely, the laws of nature. These laws are apt to assert themselves in spite of human statutes and constitutions. It was in accordance with them that this great continent was settled. Call it the right of might or the survival of the fittest, certain it is that an irresistible force outside and beyond the artificial machinery of human laws has at all times influenced and shaped the destines of mankind.

The extermination of the Indians was legally and morally wrong, judged even from the level of civilization attained a century ago; but we, a superior race, needed the space they occupied, and so they had to go. The good people of the East, and especially the New England States, after they themselves felt secure in the possession of what they had taken from them, raised their voices in vehement protest against the treatment of the aborigines, and they were undoubtedly right, but the Indian had to go all the same, and to-day we feel unscrupulously comfortable upon the land which by right had belonged to him. He defended his hunting grounds as stubbornly, and fought for his liberty and independence as bravely as any Tagal ever did or ever will, yet he had to give way to make room for us, simply because he was resisting a force which was resistless, a force stronger than our army and its firearms, namely, the invisible momentum of progress and civilization.

The Spanish war has brought the Filipinos in contact with that same force. Their resistance is natural. The grating of the Oriental and Occidental flint stones must produce sparks, but the final outcome of this struggle between two civilizations, a lower and a higher one, can not be for a moment doubtful. Those people who, for sentimental reasons or a sense of what they honestly think is just and right, take up with the lower form merely aid in prolonging the agony of this uneven struggle. They remind us of the Indians who, relying upon their strength, attempted to stop the locomotive by holding up a rope across the track.

"Necessity knows no law," is an old truism. The migration movements of the world have been impelled less by physical than by moral necessity. There was still room in Europe for many millions of people when, in the seventeenth century, the great exodus in the direction of this continent began. There is room in the United States now for hundreds of millions more, and yet expansion has become the shibboleth. In this case the issue is due neither to physical nor to moral necessity, but to the incidents and fortunes of war; but how do you account for its growing hold upon the people's minds in spite of the undeniable uncertainties of the experiment?

You surely can not explain it by legal formulæ or political platforms, but yet as lawmakers and politicians you must reckon with it, and if existing laws and constitutions do not cover it, they must give way, because it exists, and, being stronger than either, it will not down. It is the law of nature, the human longing for the change and for the new, the never latent and irresistible force of progress whose mysterious source is nature itself. The westward course of the "star of empire" is one of its most noted manifestations. Look at history.

Since the birth of human race the restless spirit of migration and the desire to expand beyond the narrow confines of the home have moved it. Man started from the Himalaya, in middle Asia, in a westerly direction, and after thousands of years is still wandering. Persia, Arabia, Palestine, Egypt, Phœnicia, Greece, and Rome in rotation became his home; then northern and western Europe, until, in search of a waterway to India, he discovered America. Nearly a thousand years had then elapsed since England had been settled by the Angles, the Saxons, the Jutes, and other Teutonic tribes, but after the safety valve was once found it began sending forth streams of warm human blood across the Atlantic Ocean and is doing so to the present day. It required but four centuries to settle and civilize this vast continent, extending from ocean to ocean and from Polar region to the Tropics.

The primeval forests disappeared like flakes in the sun, mountains were tunneled, rivers bridged, and within the vast domain west of the Mississippi, which at the beginning of this century was a wilderness and a "terra incognita," more than twenty millions of people have since found happy homes. To-day more than five transcontinental railroad lines connect the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and soon the center of population will have reached and crossed the Mississippi. Nor will the star of empire in its incessant course stop on the Western Hemisphere. As the teeming millions of Europe found an exit across the one ocean to America, so will the masses of America, gradually thickening, find an exit across the other ocean to Asia.

The sun of Western civilization and modern enterprise is rapidly melting the ice surrounding the barbarian countries of the Orient. The Chinese wall has already crumbled to dust; England and Germany have broken into the Celestial Empire and the United States has taken the Philippines, and soon man will again find himself in the country of the Paradise, whence he had started thousands of years ago. Having once "swung around the circle," he will take a new start; his second migration will again take many centuries, but his mission of carrying the blessings of culture and civilization into every vacant spot can be stopped, his purpose of finding room and eking out an existence for himself and the unborn millions to come can be frustrated neither by mountains nor oceans, nor even by the learned arguments of constitutional lawyers.

The best we can do, then, Mr. Chairman, is to try and reconcile our laws with elementary conditions. Our aim must be to protect and save our fundamental law and institutions in the face of a superior force, which could easily destroy them. And this we can not do by uselessly interfering with the natural course of human events, but by adjusting our affairs to suit it. The Spanish war, it is true, has artificially hastened a decision in this matter; but every thinking man will admit that with Hawaii in our possession, and in view of the early construction of an isthmian canal and the keen rivalry of all commercial nations in the race for the Asiatic trade, the question of expansion would have soon knocked at our door anyway.

But a hundred years hence the same problems which are now pressing for solution would confront us, and, therefore, it is better that we face them right here and now. The material welfare of the American people depends, like that of every other nation, upon commerce and trade, and in this international struggle, as much as the philosopher and philanthropist may deprecate it, political systems and forms of government are questions of no consideration. The Russian absolutist has precisely the same chance as the American democrat, the French republican the same as the German monarchist, and he alone has the advantage who, by the right of sovereignty, can control great markets to the exclusion of the other. It is, indeed, a question of customs laws, the same as is presented in the pending bill. Give us the right to shape the customs laws of a country and we can snap our fingers at every competitor.

Look at what has happened in this respect. We can hardly realize what great strides we have made in a ridiculously small space of time. We have not only retained, under a wise system of protection, the largest home market of any one country in the world, but we also have it in our power to regulate at will the customs systems of Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and Cuba. And more than that, by a diplomatic master stroke we have secured the consent of the commercial nations of the world to an open-door policy in China. The question may well be asked here whether that consent would have been so readily given if we had not, by the fortunes of war, become the close neighbors of the Chinese Empire. By this diplomatic triumph the present Administration has arrested the dismemberment of that vast empire, because a guaranty of equal trade advantages to all nations renders the right of sovereignty or ownership not only superfluous, but robs it of all charm.

If there ever was a European conspiracy or merely a hidden desire, having for its object the parceling out of the domain of China among the powers, it has been frustrated. The danger of America ever being shut out from the Chinese markets has been forever removed, and the American people have secured to themselves those great advantages which the Administration refused to secure by a participation in land-grabbing performances which would have been beneath our national dignity.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether this great success of American diplomacy is sufficiently appreciated by our people, but I, for my part, hold to the opinion that its value can hardly be overestimated, and if the agreement is carried out as contemplated, our verdict should be that the brilliant victories of the American Army and Navy have been crowned with the glory of American statesmanship. We readily accepted the heritage of the war with Spain, but we indignantly refused to rob China. The one means expansion, as well as the other, but to the one kind we quietly consented; the other we revoltingly rejected as contrary to our traditions. Let me shout the difference into the ears of our opponents: We accept expansion as a responsibility born of war, but we are opposed to it as a tenet of government.

But here, they say, is a great stumbling block. The Declaration of Independence says governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. True; and I say the crown of American citizenship would be robbed of its luster if it ceased to rest on this foundation. It makes each citizen a sovereign and each public official a public servant. It is the corner stone of republican government. Have we always been true to this great principle? If it means that territory can not be acquired or held without the consent—that is, a majority vote—of its inhabitants, then half of the United States was acquired in open violation of the injunction. Jefferson bought the Louisiana Territory; Monroe, Florida; Johnson and Seward, Alaska, and in no case was the consent of the inhabitants asked. They were simply taken in under the folds of the great flag, if not at first under the wings of the Constitution, and nobody was foolish enough to ask for their pedigree ever after.

Is it possible that these illustrious Presidents should have contemptuously defied the most vital principle upon which our Government is erected? And has it not occurred to our Southern friends that after the war they were governed without their consent? They had to remain in the Union against their wish, and the Government did hardly at any time since derive its just powers from their consent. The whole history of the country is a chain of violations of that principle, especially when we count in this category the many partisan election laws, by means of which the "consent" was and is to be fraudulently manufactured.

Two wrongs do not make a right. This is true, too. But will you tell me how you would ascertain the consent of the Filipinos? There are, perhaps, 10,000,000 of them, spread over a thousand islands. The Tagals—those who are now making all the trouble—are estimated to number about one million and a half. The other 8,000,000 are said to be either friendly, neutral, or indifferent. Majority rule means that the 49 have to submit to the 51. Who will authoritatively contend that a vote of these people, if such a thing was possible, would not result in favor of American rule? The fact is that the many different tribes inhabiting the islands speak different languages, represent different races, and are not at all on friendly terms with each other. We learn many other things from the report of the Philippine Commission to satisfy any sane man that to apply the fundamental rules of an enlightened government to them now would be about like reading Shakespeare to a newborn babe.

This will, of course, not prevent us from setting up a system of local self-government for them, adapted to the degree of intelligence and to the customs of each tribe, which will have the consent of the governed within the real meaning of the term. It may require wise statesmanship, and some may shrink from the task. But as long as we are willing to accord to them the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, with a guaranty of peace and order and protection against all the world thrown in, the solution of the problem will be much less difficult than our pessimist friends would want us to believe.

To withdraw from the islands now would be a crime against the Filipinos and a disgrace to us in the eyes of every nation in the world. [Applause.]

And now I want to tell my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] something about the Boers. He says my German constituents sympathize with them. So do I. It is the sovereign right of every American citizen to sympathize with whomsoever and whatsoever he pleases, and, in my eyes, the man who is not deeply touched by the heroic struggle of that brave people, closely resembling, as it does, the American war for independence, is a poor American indeed. But, pray, what connection has this African war with the internal affairs of our country? I know what you are driving at.

For political effect you want to make it appear that there is a sort of secret understanding between the Administration and England which prevents the American Government from taking such action as the preponderance of sentiment in this country would dictate. It is a base insinuation dexterously propagated to arouse the resentment of the German and Irish voters. I am glad we now have it officially, black on white, from the Secretary of State in his answer to the Macrum resolution, that no such understanding or alliance exists in fact, except, let me add, in the imagination of Democrats, who have a plain purpose in adhering to the imputation. Well, that lie has had long legs, but we have caught up with and nailed it at last. Now, suppose the denial had not come forth as promptly as it did. Could you not with the same justification accuse the German Emperor of English sympathies because of his strict neutrality, especially when we know that his people, almost to a man, side with the Boers?

The reason why Emperor William is keeping hands off is undoubtedly because he feels the great responsibility of international obligations, just as our Administration does, and as any American Administration would, whether Republican or Democratic. Sensible people will easily see the difference between private sympathy and public policy, and no true patriot will needlessly embarrass his own government in its dealings with foreign nations. Its own patriotism must be taken for granted, and, indeed, that degree of confidence any American Administration is entitled to exact from even a political opponent as to be spared the reproach of having failed to properly guard and protect the best interests of the country in its relations with the outside world.

But why, it is asked, did not the President offer mediation under The Hague convention? I myself would have rejoiced in seeing it done, and perhaps the President was much inclined that way. But there were no doubt good and sufficient reasons. One is that the Transvaal Republic had not been recognized at The Hague as an independent power, with authority to sign that convention; and waiving this, because of her present rights as a belligerent, another reason is that we have never been officially asked to mediate. In view of the savage declaration on the part of Great Britain that such an offer would be looked upon as an unfriendly act, the President had every reason to hesitate, especially in view of the remarkable apathy of European powers, who have a thousand times more concern in the feuds of the Old World than the United States.

Our friends on that side of the House must indeed be in desperate straits if they have to rely upon a war in Africa for a campaign issue. They will find before they get much older that sympathy with a civilized people fighting for liberty is not patentable, and that certainly the Democrats have no monopoly upon it. But they will also find, I believe, that the American people are not now and never will be in a humor to have their political policies, the exclusive concern of their own country, determined by the quarrels of European nations.

Therefore, I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, our friends will have to fall back upon the Sultan of Sulu as their only issue left, and this being so, I suggest that they call upon some good opera bouffe man to write their campaign book and fill it with comical songs and funny music.

Yesterday was Washington's birthday. If the Father of his Country could come back now, what would be his sensations? That side of the House would make you believe he would hide his face in sorrow and shame. We say he would rejoice with us because, in spite of our marvelous growth, our liberties and our unity have been preserved, because an enlightened and united people is enjoying the blessings of prosperity, and the American Republic has achieved, under the leadership of a wise and patriotic President, the name and fame of a world's power. And upon this issue we are willing to stand or fall in the next campaign. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. CHARLES F. COCHRAN,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 6, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 7941) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: No question equaling in importance that raised by the President's plan for the government of Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands has been discussed in this presence during our generation. I embrace this opportunity to present my views concerning it, fully persuaded that the scheme of imperialism proposed by the Republican party will not be sanctioned by the people, yet so thoroughly imbued with the belief that the integrity of our free institutions are endangered that if few were in agreement with my views, still I could not renounce them or remain silent. As an American I entertain the settled conviction that the republic is preferable to the monarchy. I believe that the maxims of liberty coined by Patrick Henry, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and Abraham Lincoln apply to all peoples and to all countries. I do not believe that any government ever did or ever can derive the just and lawful right to rule over millions of people by invading their country and reducing them to submission by force of arms. No matter what the pretext, no matter how lofty the avowed purposes of the great power that thus would override the eternal principles of justice voiced in the Declaration of Independence, the fact remains that governments do derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.

Entertaining these views, I am unalterably opposed to the forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands. But the fact that they are to be added to the territory of the United States by violence is not my only reason for opposing their acquisition. Even if their inhabitants were unanimously favorable to the scheme, still I would be opposed to it. The President insists that because Manila Bay chanced to be the scene of a naval engagement in which our squadron achieved a victory, and the island of Luzon the theater of a war in the course of which our army, acting in alliance with an army of natives, captured the city of Manila, it therefore became our bounden duty to take forcible possession of the entire archipelago. For a whole year his excellency has been engaged in the performance of what he declares is "a duty imposed by Providence," "a duty to humanity," "a duty to the civilized world," and most absurd of all, while carrying on a war of extermination in Luzon and compromising with slavery and polygamy in Sulu, he has repeatedly expressed the determination to elevate, save, and regenerate the Filipinos!

And what have been the net results of this hideous travesty? The expenditure of nearly two hundred millions of treasure; the death of several thousands of our soldiers and ten times the number of natives; the desolation of the island of Luzon and neighboring islands; a treaty with the Sultan of Sulu recognizing slavery and polygamy in the southern islands, and continuing the reign of the Sultan, who, as civil ruler over his dominions, receives from our Government a comfortable salary, as do, also, the keepers of his harem and slave pens! And this is what the President of the United States regards as a solemn, heaven-imposed duty!

Mr. Chairman, it is not surprising that the author of this policy is coming to Congress with a request that he be given authority to appoint subordinates and, through them, rule over the Philippines as an absolute monarch, giving to the people of the islands only such rights and privileges as his majesty may deem best for them, with the understanding that if they revolt our soldiery stand ready to compel obedience.

Sir, this demand, which is nothing more nor less than a proposal to revolutionize the Government, is the inevitable sequence of a medley of blunders and crimes, committed in the prosecution of an enterprise planned by persons ignorant of conditions existing in the Philippine Islands or of the insuperable obstacles which preclude its consummation, except on lines forbidden by the Constitution and subversive of the principles of liberty which are the foundations of our institutions.

I do not believe that when first the President conceived the idea of annexing these islands, with their 12,000,000 Asiatic inhabitants, to the territory of the United States he contemplated the fatal departure which now, of necessity, he is compelled to recommend. He expected easy sailing in the Philippines. Evidently he had not investigated their history or informed himself as to conditions existing in the islands for centuries prior to the war. He knows now, and should have known a long while ago, that the Philippines can never be Americanized. He knows that the difference between their methods and ours is the difference between the Asiatic and the American. He knows, and I think we all ought to know by this time, that if we are to retain dominion in the Philippines, we must maintain there permanently an army of not less than 50,000 men and compel obedience to our authority by a constant show of force. These are the circumstances under which the President announces that in providing a government for the Philippines Congress is not bound by the restraints and limitations of the Constitution.

He can not retrace his steps. He dare not renounce a policy upon which he has already staked everything. He must go forward even though it be necessary to revolutionize the Government. He has burned the bridges behind him. He does not ask Congress to undertake the enactment of laws for the government of the Philippines. Of course such a thing is so impractical as to be fairly impossible. A local government must be provided. Congress must prescribe its form and define its powers. The President demands authority to fill the important places in this local government by appointment and insists that when organized it may proceed without let or hindrance, regardless of the Constitution. The islands are to be held and governed as vassal states, and in reference to them the President is to be invested with the powers of an emperor. Of course details will be attended to by the President's subordinates, but this is the case under all forms of government. The fact is that the scheme proposed, if carried out, will make the President of the United States the emperor of the Philippine Islands.

Of course the projectors of this monstrous enterprise know that the Supreme Court of the United States, the text-books upon constitutional law, and the utterances and writings of the great statesmen of all political parties have denounced it as unconstitutional, but this does not deter them from boldly entering upon the work of revolutionizing the Government. In the opinion of the President the Declaration of Independence is antiquated; the opinions of Adams, Everett, and Webster worthless. The decisions of the Supreme Court stand in the way, but it is said these decisions were rendered when nobody was thinking of a proposition to confer the powers of an emperor upon the President of the Republic. They were rendered at a time when Americans unanimously concurred in the opinion that no man on the footstool should be invested with unlimited power over millions of his fellow-men.

Nobody at that early date, when the people entertained old-fashioned ideas about the sacredness of the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights, could have foreseen the necessity of so qualifying the restraints imposed by the Constitution as to permit this country to become "a great world power"—an empire—which, being interpreted into plain English, means a land grabber and robber of weaker countries. The President evidently assumes that had these contingencies been foreseen, the founders of the Republic and the Supreme Court would have proceeded accordingly. Had they anticipated that some future President might deem it a heaven-imposed duty to annex part of Asia, first conquering and subjugating the inhabitants, they would have made special provision for this contingency. Had they known that in reference to 12,000,000 people thus to be added to the population of the United States, the President would demand imperial powers, the Constitution would have been so framed by its authors and so construed by the courts as not to permit the inference that it was intended to embody the fundamental doctrines of the Declaration of Independence.

In this, as in every other matter, the Republican majority in this Chamber is content to echo the opinion of the Executive. In a few days we will have before us a bill providing for the imposition of a tariff upon imports from Puerto Rico. Upon what theory are we to impose this tax? Is not Puerto Rico a part of the United States? Are not the people of Puerto Rico inhabitants of territory belonging to the United States? Could we impose a tariff upon the products of Arizona or New Mexico? If not, we can not impose a tariff upon the products of Puerto Rico.

Mr. Chairman, I think that if the gentlemen will investigate the matter, they will find that the Supreme Court has decided, in well-considered cases, every important question that has been raised as to the legal status of our recent acquisitions, and that the policy and plans of the Administration in reference to the government of the Philippines and Puerto Rico can not be carried out without palpable violation of the Constitution.

I do not say that the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army, may not, under present conditions and until Congress shall act upon the matter, impose upon these islands an arbitrary government. Their present status, that of conquered territory, held by the military forces of the United States, is analogous to the status of Florida for a considerable period succeeding its purchase. Florida, after it was ceded, pending Congressional action providing for its government, was occupied by the military forces of the United States, and the Supreme Court validated an order made by the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, continuing Spanish customs duties and regulations. This was mere affirmation of well-recognized principles of law. A subsequent decision, sustaining as lawful the collection of duties on goods imported into the United States from Tampico, Mexico, when our military forces were in possession of that city, was based upon the same reasoning. The duties collected were not those imposed by virtue of any statute, but were prescribed under the authority of the President as Commander in Chief of the Armies.

The Supreme Court (Fleming vs. Page, 9 Howard, 603) lays down the principle governing under such circumstances as follows:

> The principle thus adopted by the executive department has been sanctioned by this court and the circuit courts whenever the question has come before them. * * * It is sufficient to say that there is no discrepancy between them, and all of them, so far as they apply, maintain that under our revenue laws every port is regarded as a foreign one unless the custom-house from which the vessel clears is within a collection district established by act of Congress and the officers exercise their functions under the authority and control of the laws of the United States.

The same decision holds that conquest or occupation of foreign territory by our military forces does not have the effect of adding the country thus occupied to the territory of the United States. The Executive, acting in the capacity of Commander in Chief, possesses no authority except that conferred by the Constitution, which clothes him with control of the military forces. As such he possesses no authority to add foreign countries to the territory of the United States. Military occupation of foreign territory necessarily involves its government during such occupation, and this necessarily invests the Commander in Chief with authority to perform all the duties and exercise all the functions necessary to the maintenance of civil government in the territory so occupied. The case cited rests upon this principle.

It may be said that the ratification of the treaty and the appropriation of $20,000,000 had the effect of adding the Philippines and Puerto Rico to the territory of the United States, but in this respect their case is precisely similar to that of Florida, Louisiana Territory, and New Mexico and California. In reference to each of these acquisitions the Supreme Court has distinctly adhered to the views set forth in the opinion I have cited. New Mexico was held as conquered territory for several years after the Mexican war, before Congress took any action in the premises, and during that period the Executive prescribed the laws and appointed the civil officers of the Territory.

It should be borne in mind, however, that he did this as Commander in Chief, and upon the theory that for certain purposes New Mexico could not be deemed part of the territory of the United States until Congress acted. This was only following the precedents established in the case of Louisiana and Florida. In view of these decisions of the highest court, the present legal status of the Philippine Islands is not doubtful. They are not in the full significance of the term part of the territory of the United States; but, Mr. Chairman, Congressional action looking to the exercise of civil authority in these islands will undoubtedly consummate their annexation to the territory of the United States. Thereafter, in law, the inhabitants will stand upon an equality with other citizens and residents of the country. Thereafter a government of laws must supersede the military dictatorship now existing. Congress or a local legislature authorized by Congressional enactment, subject to all the restraints of the Constitution, must make these laws.

I shall not undertake a lengthy discussion of this proposition, for, fortunately, it is unnecessary. If repeated adjudication can settle a question of constitutional construction, certainly this one has been settled. The court has rendered decisions covering every point in controversy and as to every one of them distinctly sustains my position. The President, supported, presumably, by the Republican majority in this House, which is become a mere agency for registering the views of the White House, contends that these islands, when definitely annexed, will not be part of the United States, and that therefore in providing for their government Congress is in no sense restrained by the limitations of the Constitution.

I suppose it will be admitted that if this view of the question is erroneous the President's scheme for an imperial government must be wholly abandoned. Unfortunately for the imperialists, the Supreme Court has decided that not only the States comprising the Union but all territory belonging to the people is a part of the United States. In the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton 317) the meaning of the words "the United States" was thus defined:

> The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular part of the American empire? It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories.

Mr. Chairman, this definition of the meaning of the term "United States" seems to me so plainly and manifestly correct that the thought of adopting a different definition is preposterous. If it is a correct definition of the term, the theory that Congress possesses power to enact unconstitutional laws for the government of the Philippines falls to the ground bodily. If it is a correct definition, then the proposal to invest the President with powers precisely analogous to those exercised by Victoria, Empress of India, so that henceforth the functions of our Executive in the government of the Philippines would be those of an absolute monarch, must be abandoned. As early as February 13 last year, in a speech delivered in this Chamber on this subject, I said:

> Mr. Chairman, I appeal to history for vindication of the statement that if this country is to become a great colonial power we make the departure with the distinct understanding that such a course will compel a change in our form of government. When Great Britain succeeded in definitively establishing her authority over India, the British sovereign was hailed as "Queen of England and Empress of India." If we are to establish a government in the Philippines modeled upon the English plan, let some gentleman on the other side of the Chamber bring forward a measure declaring our Chief Executive "President of the United States and Emperor of the Philippines."
> Mr. Chairman, shocking as is this proposition when expressed in exact terms, the truth is that if we are to establish in the Philippines a military government or any form of government which could not be established on this continent without violation of the Constitution; if we are to place in the President's hands the appointment of officials charged with the formulation of laws for the government of distant conquered possessions, manifestly it is true that under such a system the President of the United States would be invested with powers more arbitrary and authority more far-reaching than is exercised by the ruler of any power on earth, the Czar of all the Russias not excepted. * * * Therefore, if the Philippines are to be subjugated, annexed, and governed by methods unknown to the Constitution and not legally applicable to other territories subject to the control of the Federal Government, as to the provinces that are to be subjected to this accursed system let the American President be declared Emperor.

Sir, I reaffirm these words; for, whether invested with the title or not, if the President is to be empowered to establish in the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico such governments as have been proposed, his prerogatives in respect to those islands will be those of an emperor.

Already it is announced that the people of Puerto Rico are to be subjected to taxation not levied upon the people of the remainder of the United States, and by taxation they are to be restricted in their right to trade in our markets. And the United States are to fix conditions upon which we may trade in their markets. Could tyranny go further? They are to have no voice in making the laws imposing these burdens, no right to control their own affairs. They are to be taxed without representation in the government.

It is true the President does not favor this proceeding, but his opposition is based not upon the theory that Congress possesses no such power, but upon the belief that the pitiable poverty of the people of Puerto Rico commends them to their new masters as worthy of special kindness. Strange, is it not, that a committee of the American Congress should have under consideration a law which proposes to visit upon a million people the very injustice—taxation without representation—which led the patriots of Massachusetts to throw that famous cargo of tea into Boston Harbor over a hundred years ago?

Mr. Chairman, I now invite attention to other decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon this question. And let me premise presentation of these authorities with the observation that before the President's plan can be carried into effect it will be necessary for the Supreme Court to render a decision overturning a number of adjudicated cases—some of which have been acquiesced in and quoted as precedents for a century—in which the court has laid down rules for the construction of the Constitution, defined the powers of the various branches of the Government, pointed out the limitations upon power imposed by the organic law, and even decided the identical questions involved in the pending controversy.

I take it that as to the constitutional power of this Government to acquire territory by treaty or by conquest there is no longer room for controversy. Jefferson, Adams, Madison, Webster, and Calhoun, as well as scores of others, contended that no such power was conferred by the Constitution; but the fact that they held this view is only important now as going to show the tenacity with which the great lawyers and statesmen of the past clung to the theory that the Federal Government possesses only the enumerated powers conferred by the Constitution. But this does not authorize Congress to arrogate to itself powers not conferred by the Constitution. For what purpose may new territory be acquired? And when territory has been acquired, may its inhabitants be reduced to vassalage? Upon these questions the decisions of the Supreme Court and the views of the recognized authorities upon constitutional law are in accord. Chief Justice Taney, in the Dred Scott case, squarely decides the question, as follows:

As there is no express regulation in the Constitution defining the powers which the General Government may exercise over the person and property of a citizen in a Territory thus acquired, the court must necessarily look to the provisions and principles of the Constitution and its distribution of powers for the rules and principles by which its decision must be governed. Taking this rule to guide us, it may be safely assumed that citizens of the United States who migrate to a Territory belonging to the people of the United States can not be ruled as mere colonists dependent upon the will of the General Government.

The principle upon which our governments rest, and upon which alone they continue to exist, is the Union of States, sovereign within their own limits, etc., and bound together as one people by a general government, possessing certain enumerated powers, etc., and exercising supreme authority within the scope of the powers granted to it throughout the dominion of the United States. A power therefore in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories over which they might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form.

It is not out of place to mention at this point the fact that the spokesmen of the Administration, at least those who are sufficiently honest to refrain from pettifogging, admit that the decisions of the court and the views of the great writers have condemned the whole scheme of imperialism as unconstitutional, but evidently they expect the Supreme Court to recant all its former decisions; and, as for the text-books—well, I suppose the President and his advisers will write new ones to fit the new situation. Over a year ago a labored argument was delivered by a Republican Senator fully setting forth the doctrine of these imperialistic constitutional lawyers. He devoted much of his time to criticising Supreme Court decisions, evidently hoping to pave the way for the effort that is to be made to secure their reversal. Concerning the Dred Scott case, he said:

Mr. President, it is an unfortunate source to which to go for authority. The case has never been referred to in the Supreme Court as authority. It certainly never has in recent years. It has become a hissing and a byword.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether to attribute this statement to gross ignorance or total indifference to the truth. Certainly it is attributable to one or the other, as was conclusively shown by Mr. Isaac Lobe Straus in a paper which appeared in the Conservative Review shortly after the speech was delivered. Mr. Straus pointed out the Senator's reckless perversion of the truth, as follows:

It is true that the amendments to the Constitution following the civil war obviated the effect of the Dred Scott decision as far as it related to the subject of slavery, and so far the decision has been nullified. But in other respects, as the Supreme Court declared in the Slaughterhouse cases, it stands unreversed, and, contrary to the above statement of the speech, it has been repeatedly referred to and accepted as authority by that august tribunal, both recently and during the whole period that has elapsed since its announcement. We could give many illustrations, but selecting a few of more recent years, we refer to the cases of National Bank vs. County of Yankton, Elk vs. Wilkins, Civil Rights Cases, Murphy vs. Ramsay, Boyd vs. Thayer, and Shively vs. Bowlby. We repeat, that in no case has the decision been rejected or denied.

Mr. Straus then presents other decisions of the Supreme Court defining the powers of Congress in reference to the Territories which were merely followed and affirmed in the Dred Scott case. Furthermore, he points out the fact that the portion of the decision in the Dred Scott case applicable to the question now under discussion was concurred in by all the members of the court. He sets over "against the postulates and conclusions of the address * * * the contrary proposition that, although the express and auxiliary powers conferred by the Constitution upon the General Government are all sovereign powers, they are all nevertheless limited and controlled by the scope and objects of the Constitution, to be gathered from the provisions, the structure, the principles, and spirit of that instrument. Such, it will be recalled, was the doctrine maintained by Hamilton, Marshall, Webster, and the other authorities which we have had occasion to refer to, and as far as our researches have advised us, this doctrine has never before been questioned or denied.

"The opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case, to the effect that the Federal Government has no power to maintain colonies, governing their inhabitants with discretionary authority, proceeded upon the theory of constitutional law which we have just asserted, and his decision in the particular mentioned is fully sustained by the history and principles of the Constitution and by the decisions of the Supreme Court. As has already been indicated, the Chief Justice in that case, reasoning from the provisions, scope, and structure of the Constitution, reached the conclusion mentioned, determining from all those sources that the purpose for which the Constitution authorized the General Government to acquire and rule territory was its ultimate admission as a State into the Union."

It is worth while to bear in mind that in the Dred Scott case, as to the part of the decision above quoted, the court rendered an unanimous opinion. Both Mr. Justice McLean and Mr. Justice Curtis concurred with the Chief Justice, the former declaring:

In organizing the government of a Territory Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object. No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit; so that, whether the object may be the protection of the persons and property of purchasers of the public lands or of communities who have been annexed to the Union by conquest or purchase, they are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal powers.

And Mr. Justice Curtis said of the power of Congress over the Territories:

I can not doubt that this is a power to govern the inhabitants of the Territory, by such laws as Congress deems needful, until they obtain admission as States.

Early in our national history the Supreme Court, in a number of cases, had announced the same doctrine in unequivocal terms, first in the list being a decision rendered by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, in which it was contended that the citizens of the District of Columbia, not being represented in Congress, could not be subjected to direct taxation by the Federal Government. It was claimed that such an imposition would clearly be a case of "taxation without representation."

Concerning this case and the decision by Chief Justice Marshall, and other cases which subsequently have followed this early adjudication of precisely the question now raised by the extraordinary proposals of the imperialists, I direct attention to the fact that the question was here unmistakably presented as to whether the Constitution contemplated or permitted a colonial system. Chief Justice Marshall, having held that direct taxation could be applied to the District and to the Territories as well, found the reply to the above question in the fact that statehood was the end necessarily intended and marked out by the Constitution for the Territories of the United States. He declared that—

The difference between requiring a continent with an immense population to submit to be taxed by a government having no common interest with it, separated from it by a vast ocean, and associated with it by no common feelings, and permitting the representatives of the American people, under the restrictions of our Constitution, to tax a part of the society, which is in a state of infancy advancing to manhood, looking forward to complete equality as soon as that state of manhood shall be attained, as is the case with the Territories, is too obvious not to present itself to the minds of all.

This constitutional limitation of ultimate statehood for the Territories of the United States is asserted with equal force in other decisions of the Supreme Court.

During the interim between the decision in Loughborough vs. Blake, and that in Scott vs. Sanford, that tribunal had distinctly announced the same doctrine in the important and instructive case of Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, and that case was in that particular fully affirmed in 1893 in the case of Shively vs. Bowlby, in which the court asserted:

The Territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed of cession from the original States or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify it, of being admitted into the Union as States, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects.

In the same case the court, summing up its conclusions, adds (page 57):

Upon the acquisition of a Territory by the United States, whether by cession from one of the States or by treaty with a foreign country, or by discovery and settlement, the same title and dominion passed to the United States for the benefit of the whole people and in trust for the several States to be ultimately created out of the Territory.

In Murphy vs. Ramsay, to the same effect, it was said:

The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States in the Union.

The same doctrine is distinctly laid down by Mr. Justice Field in Weber vs. Harbor Commissioners, and it is notable that all these later decisions contain express references to the Dred Scott decision for the propositions they announce.

The views of the late Mr. Justice Cooley fully coincide with those above stated. In his Constitutional Law he says:

It could never have been understood that any territory which by purchase, cession, or conquest should at any time come under the control of the United States should permanently be held in a Territorial condition, and the new States which have been formed of territory acquired by treaty must be supposed to have been received into the Union in strict compliance with the Constitution.

He cites the Dred Scott case, and continues:

And when territory is acquired the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions.

The same learned authority, distinguishing, as did Chief Justice Marshall, between the Territories of the United States and the American colonies under Great Britain, points out that—

There are differences which are important and, indeed, vital. The first of these is that the Territorial condition is understood under the Constitution to be merely temporary and preparatory, and the people of the Territories, while it continues, are assured of the right to create and establish State institutions for themselves as soon as the population shall be sufficient and the local conditions suitable; while the British colonial system contained no provision or assurances of any but a dependent government indefinitely.

In deciding the case of Springville vs. Thomas, Chief Justice Fuller declared:

It has been decided by the court that the [Utah] Territorial act of March, 1892, permitting this [i. e., judgments to be entered on verdicts returned by less than the whole number of jurors], was invalid because in contravention of the seventh amendment of the Constitution and the act of Congress.

In the same opinion he referred to the case of American Publishing Company vs. Fisher, in which the court, per Mr. Justice Brewer, held:

Either the seventh amendment to the Constitution or these acts of Congress, or all together, secured to every litigant in a common-law action in the courts of the Territory of Utah the right to a trial by jury, and nullified any act of its legislature which attempted to take from him anything which is of the substance of that right.

In the case of Thompson vs. Utah the court declared:

That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

It is equally beyond question that the provisions of the National Constitution relating to trials by jury for crimes and to criminal prosecutions apply to the Territories of the United States.

In the early days of the Republic the first judges of the Supreme Court had announced substantially the same principle as that above quoted from Chief Justice Marshall. In the case of United States vs. More it was declared:

The position assumed by the court that Congress in the exercise of its legislative function for the Territories is bound by the restrictive clauses of the Bill of Rights can not be successfully attacked. Indeed, it can make no difference whether that body proceeds under the express grant of Article IV or under its power implied in the capacity to acquire and hold additional soil. In either case it is equally hedged round and trammeled by the safeguards of individual rights that are contained in the first eight amendments.

The doctrine has also been enunciated in recent decisions of the Supreme Court oftentimes with express reference to the Dred Scott case.

In Murphy vs. Ramsay, the Supreme Court declared:

The people of the United States as sovereign owners of the national Territories have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution, as are necessarily implied in its terms, or in the purposes and objects of the power itself. * * * The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them as to other citizens by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national.

The text-books in use in the colleges and universities, and accepted by the bar and the bench as authorities upon constitutional questions, denounce as impossible under our Constitution the very scheme proposed by the President, using language so apropos that one might almost believe it was written to be used in rebuking a proposal the most revolutionary and dangerous that has ever emanated from high official circles in the whole history of the Government.

In Pomeroy's Constitutional Law the doctrine laid down by the courts is enunciated without qualification, as follows:

But is Congress absolute over these districts or Territories? Is it, like the British Parliament, bound by no limitations save those which are self-imposed? This can not be; nor does the language of the Constitution require a construction so much opposed to all our ideas of civil polity. The safeguards of individual rights—those clauses which preserve the lives, liberty, and property of the citizen from the encroachments of arbitrary power—must apply as well to that legislation of Congress which is concerned exclusively with the District of Columbia or with the Territories as to that which is concerned with the States. The reasoning which leads to this conclusion is irresistible. A bill of rights is certainly no less important for the District of Columbia and for the Territories than for that portion of the nation which is organized into States.

If it were thought necessary that Congress should be hedged round with restrictions while it is legislating for the inhabitants of States, who may be partially protected by their local governments, how much more necessary that the same body should be restrained, while legislating for the inhabitants of those districts and Territories over which it has an exclusive control. The mandatory clauses of the first eight amendments are clothed in the most general language; they make no exceptions; they apply to Congress in the exercise of all its functions; in general terms they cover its legislation for the District of Columbia and for the Territories as well as for the States. These clauses must therefore be compulsive upon Congress when it makes laws for the District or for the Territories, unless the general language in which they are framed is modified by the particular language of the provisions which especially relate to the District and to the Territories. There is evidently nothing contradictory between these provisions and the general restrictions of the bill of rights.

In the same work the author declares that the first eight amendments "are binding with equal force upon the legislative, the executive, and the judiciary," and that—

Furthermore, as the clauses in question are mandatory and peremptory in their nature, and directed at once to each branch of the Government, they require no statute of Congress, decision of judge, or act of President to execute them and give them binding efficacy. They execute themselves without the aid of an inferior law. Any proceeding of the Government in derogation of their command would be void; any proceeding declaratory would be useless.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Law, lays down the same doctrine.

Besides being thus embodied in the jurisprudence of the country, the doctrine in question is fully supported by our political philosophy, and it is not necessary to quote the opinions of the great leaders of the Democratic party, every one of whom contended for the strict construction of the Constitution and observance of the limitation of the powers of government by it imposed in order to show that the policy advocated by the President and his friends rests upon a theory of constitutional construction, which has never been sanctioned by the great jurists, writers, and thinkers of the country. Federalists, Whigs, Democrats, and Republicans have, in the past, concurred in denouncing it.

Edward Everett finely points out "the inherent incongruity of colonial government with the principles of constitutional liberty." He declares that the colonial form of government "in its very nature is inconsistent with the requirements of constitutional freedom, either to the colony or the mother country," and that it "obstructs the growth of liberty in the colonies and favors the growth of arbitrary power in the mother country."

Prof. James Schouler, the jurist and historian, presents the same views, stating that it is hostile to our system of union and government to hold territory as a province, its citizens having inferior rights, and says that "in every case of annexation thus far, except that of Alaska, with its trivial population, the annexation under the original provisions of the Constitution has been of territory adjacent to the United States." "It ought not to be readily granted," he concludes, "that the present Constitution permits distant and populous countries to be thus added."

Daniel Webster on this point expressed the same opinion. Said he:

In the part which I have acted in public life it has been my purpose to maintain the people of the United States what the Constitution designed to make them—one people, one in interest, one in character, and one in political feeling. If we depart from that we break it all up. Arbitrary governments may have territories and distant possessions because arbitrary governments may rule them by different laws and different systems. Russia may rule in the Ukraine and the provinces of the Caucasus and Kamtschatka by different codes, ordinances, or ukases. We can do no such thing. They must be of us, part of us, or else strangers.

Mr. Chairman, a year ago, when this subject was under consideration, I had occasion to refer to the form of government now proposed for Puerto Rico and the Philippines. Then, as now, I was of the opinion that the President meditated an enterprise which, if carried into effect, would work a complete revolution in the form of our Government, and I took occasion to discuss briefly the constitutional questions involved. At that time I said:

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this appalling departure. I am opposed to the forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands; and I believe that when all the facts are known the American people will repudiate a policy the adoption of which imports a deliberate abandonment of principles which are the foundation of our free institutions.

I do not, however, share the belief that the forcible annexation of the Philippine Islands would be unconstitutional. The question in hand is one of public policy and not of constitutional law. The limitations imposed upon the Federal Government by the Constitution bear upon its relations to the citizen and to the States. * * * In this country every kingly prerogative resides in the people, and may be exercised through the medium of the people's representatives and agents. * * *

The framers of the Constitution recognized the necessity of safeguarding the country against unnecessary wars, and this was accomplished by empowering Congress, and not the Executive, to determine when the sword shall be drawn and when returned to its sheath, and not by an attempt to define the measures that may be taken in carrying on war with a foreign enemy. * * *

If it be conceded that while war is in progress the armies of the United States may invade, conquer, and hold possession of the enemy's territory, it necessarily follows that possession thereof may be retained or relinquished accordingly as the one policy or the other seems best calculated to insure the safety and protect the interests of this country, and if this be admitted, the contention that the Constitution prohibits the annexation of conquered territory necessarily falls to the ground.

It can not be urged that because territory invaded by our armies is occupied by a numerous population, under the Constitution we must obtain the consent of the people before imposing the authority of this Government upon the enemy's country. While the war is in progress we deal with the occupants of the territory invaded as enemies, and as such they can not claim the protection of our Constitution. In contemplation of law they remain enemies until by a treaty of peace the war is brought to a termination, and as such they can claim no voice in fixing the stipulations of a treaty. That duty devolves upon their government. But, sir, if by the treaty the country in which they are domiciled becomes an integral part of this Republic, thenceforth, equally with every creature domiciled under the protection of the American flag, they have the incontestible right to share with Americans to the manor born the safeguards of liberty, justice, and equality before the law guaranteed to all alike by the American Constitution.

So that, in my judgment, the constitutional questions which have figured to some extent in this discussion arise after and not before the annexation of conquered territory. I contend that, when Congress undertakes the enactment of laws for the territory acquired in the war with Spain, statutes for their government must be such as could be enacted for the government of Arizona or New Mexico; and that the citizens of territory which has been or may be annexed to the United States as a result of the war with Spain are entitled to enjoy the legal safeguards which nobody imagines could be denied to the citizens of our other Territories.

The acquisition of territory by conquest does not confer upon the Executive extra constitutional powers. The powers of the Executive as well as the rights of the citizen are defined by the Constitution. Throughout all the domain now comprising, or which shall hereafter comprise, the American Republic, the measure of the rights of the citizen must be uniform. As to territory acquired by conquest, it is for the Congress of the United States to say what kind of a government shall be established, but not even the Congress has power to depart a hair's breadth from the Constitution in the exercise of this authority. The proposal to establish a military government permanently in any part of the domain of the United States is monstrous.

It is at variance with the letter and spirit of the Constitution and with the fundamental maxims of liberty long ago crystallized into the Bill of Rights. It is violative of the principles upon which free institutions are founded. If predicated upon the assumption that the people over which we are to extend this arbitrary system are incapable of self-government, and can never become capable of self-government, instead of being an argument in favor of the extension of our system to a country thus cursed, it is an unanswerable admonition to abstain from so doing; for in the hallowed formula of Democracy and Republicanism neither Congress nor the President has authority to establish in the Philippines a military satrapy.

Mr. Chairman, I believed then and I believe now that under the Constitution, as construed by the Supreme Court and the great men whose utterances and writings embellish the political literature of the country, the mad policy proposed by the President is contrary to the organic law, wicked, and revolutionary, and was of the opinion that this was so palpable that the proposal now brought forward, and which then had been tentatively suggested, could not possibly meet the deliberate approval of the Executive. But, Mr. Chairman, the President has gone on and on, adding one folly to another, until he can find no plausible excuse for retraction or retreat. He has committed his party to a policy wholly indefensible, and, in order to save it and himself from the wrath of the people, has unhesitatingly proposed a change in the structure and form of the Government.

If the President desires to get a glimpse of the weakness of the foundation upon which his scheme of imperialism rests it is only necessary for him to note the disingenuous methods and contemptible expedients to which the statesmen who have attempted his defense have been driven. Garbled passages from the text-books, fragmentary and misleading paragraphs from Supreme Court decisions and from the speeches and writings of leading statesmen, quotations and briefs used by great lawyers in cases in which they appeared as employed counsel to advocate the cause of their clients, have been made to do service as legal authorities supporting the President's views. Thorough investigation convinces me that in no case has the Supreme Court made a decision sustaining his contentions.

On the contrary, the judiciary, the great writers on constitutional law, and the public utterances and writings of leading statesmen of all parties have condemned it as contrary to the Constitution and destructive of the basic principles of liberty which form the foundation of our free institutions.

The decisions of the Supreme Court I have cited stand as the settled law of the case. They have never been reversed or even called in question. The first was rendered by Chief Justice Marshall, the last by Chief Justice Fuller, so that they form an unbroken chain reaching from the infancy of the Republic down to this hour. They are in harmony with the robust public sentiment of our people, which throughout our history has condemned military conquests as criminal aggressions, the enforced vassalage of states as hideous injustice, and the deprivation of large populations of a voice in the governments under which they live as a degree of despotism justifying revolution. They are the law of the land, and are therefore binding upon the President and upon the members of his Cabinet. Upon their due observance the perpetuity of the Republic depends, and woe be unto the party leaders who shall attempt to set them aside.

Indian Appropriation Bill.

HON. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 2, and Saturday, February 3, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and the Clerk having read—

"SUPPORT OF SCHOOLS.

"For support of Indian day and industrial schools, and for other educational purposes not hereinafter provided for, including pay of an architect, a draftsman, and a laborer, to be employed in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $1,200,000, of which amount the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, use $5,000 for the education of Indians in Alaska"—

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Alaska," in line 14, page 45, insert the following:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, but shall only make such contracts at places where the Government has not provided school facilities for all the children of school age residing thereat, and to an extent not exceeding the number of children in attendance at such contract schools at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. I will reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas reserves the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, for the first time in more than twenty years it is intended that no provision shall be made for Indian pupils in contract schools. To those who are familiar with the question of educating and civilizing the Indians of this country this is a matter of deep regret. Almost from the beginning of this Republic, sir, encouragement and aid have been given by the Government to associations engaged in the work of Indian education. It is now proposed to completely revolutionize the ancient policy of the Government, and to obliterate, if possible, the most important factor in Indian civilization.

From the earliest days of its existence, this Government has been alive to the influences that have been most beneficial in Indian affairs. Impartial and broad-minded men, occupying the highest places of trust in the Government, never hesitated to encourage and assist in every legitimate way individuals and associations laboring to bring the red men of this land to a realization of the benefits of Christian civilization. In the year 1819 a direct appropriation of $10,000 was made for this very purpose. On the 3d of September, in that year, the War Department, then charged with the care of the Indians, issued a circular in which is said:

Such associations or individuals who are already actually engaged in educating the Indians, and who may desire the cooperation of the Government, will report to the Department of War. In proportion to the means of the Government, cooperation will be extended to such institutions as may be approved, as well to erecting their necessary buildings as in their current expenses.

This formal invitation of the Department is the key to the policy pursued for three-quarters of a century. The first Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. Thomas Ewing, said in his first report:

The establishment of manual labor schools in charge of missionary societies of various religious denominations is working a great moral and social revolution among several of the tribes, and if the Department had the means of extending the benefits of these institutions to those more destitute it would no doubt be productive of like happy results.

From year to year until 1894, and even then and now, successive Secretaries of the Interior and Commissioners of Indian Affairs speak in terms of highest praise of Indian religious schools.

The inauguration in 1870 of General Grant's "peace policy" marks the beginning of large appropriations for Indian schools conducted by religious societies. In time, however, it was urged that out of this system an undesirable union of church and state had been effected. Although practically appointed by the societies in control of the schools, the teachers and other employees were paid by and carried upon the rolls of the Government. To obviate this objection the "contract" school system was substituted for other systems then in vogue. This system, now proposed to be entirely abolished, was the practice adopted by the Department of the Interior, of making agreements with religious organizations whereby for a fixed per capita sum such societies were to feed, clothe, lodge, and educate Indian pupils.

This policy was indorsed and the system extended by every Commissioner of Indian Affairs until the time of Commissioner Morgan. In his report for 1885 Commissioner Atkins said:

But the Government can and does, fairly and without invidious discrimination, encourage any religious sect whose philanthropy and liberality prompt them to assist in the great work of redeeming these benighted children of nature from the darkness of their superstition and ignorance.

Indian School Superintendent Oberly (afterwards Commissioner of Indian Affairs) in the same year extended a sweeping invitation to the various churches to engage in Indian-school work. His report for 1885 contains the following:

The Government should be liberal in making contracts with religious denominations to teach Indian children in schools established by those denominations. It should throw open the door and say to all denominations, "There should be no monopoly in good works. Enter, all of you, and do whatever your hands may find of good work to do; and in your efforts the Government will give to you encouragement out of its liberal purse." In other words, the Government, without partiality, should encourage all the churches to work in this broad field of philanthropic endeavor.

It was natural, sir, that contract schools should be enlarged, and that their promoters be encouraged by such suggestions. Surely the responsible heads of the departments in control of the Indians—men familiar with the history of Indian education and civilization, close students of the life, the habits, and of the needs of the unfortunate aborigines of this land—never embodied such encouragements in their official reports without fully comprehending that the natural and necessary result would be the extension of the contract-school system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I occupied no time in the general debate——

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended until it is time for the committee to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of his colleague be extended until it becomes necessary for the committee to rise. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Thus it happened, Mr. Chairman, that from year to year, with the enlargement of existing schools and the addition of new schools, the amount set aside for them rapidly increased. In five years it doubled.

Suddenly many engaged in this work became possessed of a peculiar and an astounding idea. This system, so admirably adapted for effective service in Indian work and so harmonious with the theory of this Government, unexpectedly was found by some people to be the lurking place of serious dangers and menaces to the free institutions of the country. Many who had labored for years in this field hastily withdrew. Even the high places in the Government were affected with this ridiculous fear. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs was cajoled into recommending that Government aid be completely withdrawn from these schools. A new policy was advocated. The system that had resulted in such good, effected wonderful changes in the Indians, was to be completely cast aside and an era of experiment begun in Indian education and civilization.

At this time, Mr. Chairman, I am not concerned with the cause for this change of policy. Perhaps at some future time it will be proper to shed some light upon that phase of the question. For the present it suffices to know that in 1895 a novel policy was initiated by those in official circles in control of Indian educational affairs. That policy was twofold in nature. It was intended gradually to eliminate contract schools by the almost imperceptible substitution of Government schools. This is very clearly shown by the Hon. Hoke Smith, Secretary of the Interior, in his report of November, 1894. In that report he said:

The contract schools are now the subject of general discussion. I agree fully with those who oppose the use of public money for the support of sectarian schools. But this question should be considered practically. The schools have grown up; money has been invested in their construction at a time when they were recognized as wise instrumentalities for the accomplishment of good. I do not think it proper to allow the intense feeling of opposition to sectarian schools, which is showing itself all over the land, to induce the Department to disregard existing conditions. We need the schools now, or else we need a large appropriation to build schools to take their place.

It would scarcely be just to abolish them entirely—to abandon instantly a policy so long established. My own suggestion is that they should be decreased at the rate of not less than 20 per cent a year. Thus, in a few years more, they would cease to exist, and during that time the Bureau (of Indian Affairs) would gradually be prepared to do without them, while they might gather strength to continue without Government aid.

Further investigation of the question convinced the Secretary of the enormity of the task of substituting Government facilities for all Indian pupils, and as a result, in a communication to Congress on December 13, 1894, he said:

It is possible that the plan of annual reduction can not be carried out to the full extent proposed, namely, 20 per cent each year.

Since that time, Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has striven strenuously to provide the required facilities. It has not been able to do so. It is not even now able to provide accommodations for all the children of school age, excluding from consideration those provided for in the contract schools. Yet it is proposed to discontinue these schools and to increase by 2,000 the number of children that the Government is now utterly unable to accommodate.

The adoption of the proposed amendment is absolutely necessary, if the Department is to care for the nation's helpless wards. This amendment merely gives to the Secretary of the Interior authority to continue agreement with present contract schools wherever the Government has not provided adequate facilities. It is not a startling proposition; it can hardly be considered a dangerous or wild experiment.

Two objections are urged against the amendment. In the first place, it is claimed that the Government has sufficient facilities of its own to provide for all Indian children of school age, and therefore the authority contemplated in the amendment is unnecessary; in the second place, it is urged that, in effect, an appropriation is made for the benefit of certain churches and religious associations, and is therefore "sectarian" and improper. Neither objection is sufficient; neither can justly be maintained. I propose, sir, to analyze both objections, confident that impartial, broad-minded and just men will agree with me that the amendment is absolutely required by the present Indian educational conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, under the leave given, and it now becomes necessary, under the rule, that the committee rise.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. I ask unanimous consent that when the committee resumes, I may be recognized to continue the discussion of this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. There will be no question but what the gentleman can have all the time he wishes to-morrow morning. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the committee must now rise.

Saturday, February 3, 1900.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] be permitted to proceed without interruption for twenty minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD of New York. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, in a feeble way, I attempted to review the history of the Government's attitude to churches and to religious organizations engaged in Indian education. To the best of my meager ability I endeavored to show to this committee that from the earliest days of its existence the Government had encouraged and assisted religious associations laboring to bring Christian education and civilization to the unfortunate red men of our country. I tried, sir, to sustain the statements made by me by copious extracts from the official reports of various Government officers, and I will assume, for the convenience of the occasion, that up to the year 1894 the Government had encouraged in every way possible religious associations engaged in Indian educational work; that in 1894 it was decided to eliminate such schools from the possibility of Government aid by the gradual substitution of Government schools. I now propose to attempt to show that the Government has not sufficient facilities without resorting to the present contract schools, and that a continuance of these schools is not offensive because "sectarian."

GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS GROSSLY INADEQUATE FOR PRESENT NEEDS.

There are in existence to-day, sir, 26 contract schools. In these schools there are some 2,000 Indian children. Five hundred and thirty-four of these children are there under Government contracts; the remaining fifteen hundred are maintained through the charity of people interested in their welfare. If the Secretary of the Interior be not authorized to continue existing contracts, what is to become of these children?

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his report for 1899 submits certain tables which show the capacity of the Government schools and the enrollment of pupils therein. On page 10 of that report is a table, numbered 1, purporting to show the "location, average attendance, capacity, etc., of nonreservation training schools during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899."

This table discloses that the nonreservation training schools can accommodate 6,295 pupils, and that the number of pupils enrolled therein is 6,830. On pages 11 and 12 of the same report is a table (No. 2) purporting to show the "location, date of opening, capacity, enrollment, and average attendance of Government reservation boarding schools." The summaries of this table give the following information: Capacity, 8,865; enrollment, 8,881. On pages 13 and 14, Table No. 3, showing the "location, capacity, enrollment, and average attendance of Government day schools, June 30, 1899," shows that the capacity of those schools is 4,966, and the enrollment therein 4,951.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the total capacity of Government schools of all kinds at the end of the fiscal year 1899 was 20,120, while the enrollment of pupils in those schools was 20,712. These figures conclusively prove that at that time the Government could not accommodate 586 pupils enrolled in its various schools. Where, then, are the 2,000 pupils in the contract schools to be placed, if the pending amendment be not adopted? Nowhere in the Commissioner's report is there a suggestion that the Government has sufficient facilities to accommodate these 2,000 pupils who in a few months will be knocking for admission to the Government schools. No material, if any, additional facilities have been provided since June, 1899, and no such extensive increase as will surely be required by the Government, if the pending amendment be not adopted, has been contemplated in framing this bill.

FREE SCHOOLS WILL NOT SUPPLY NEEDED FACILITIES.

Many gentlemen, however, find a ready if not sufficient answer to this proposition. Place them in the free schools in the various States, they say. This argument is as specious as it is alluring. It is not a novel suggestion. For nine years that experiment has been tried. Hearken to the opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on that proposition. At page 15 of his report for 1899, he says:

An inspection of the above table (which shows number of district public schools, contract number of pupils, enrollment, and average attendance therein) demonstrates that after nine years' trial the results attained by these schools do not seem commensurate with the expenditure. It was believed that an allowance of $10 per capita per quarter for such average attendance as could be obtained would have induced greater effort to secure these pupils. The great difficulty experienced by agents on reservations in maintaining a good attendance seems emphasized at these schools.

Another feature of these contracts (with district public schools) arises from the disinclination of the full-bloods to withstand the not always silent race prejudice often prevailing in the neighborhood of these district schools, and the result has been that in the majority of instances the benefits are conferred upon children of mixed blood, who are or should be entitled to participate in the State funds for education. Theoretically, the placing of Indian youth in public schools, where they come in contact with white children, is a most admirable expedient for breaking down prejudices on both sides and civilizing the Indian, but the above table shows that it is not an unqualified success. The full-blood, who needs such contact most, is rarely secured.

In the face of this language it can not successfully be urged that the free schools of the several States will furnish the additional two thousand and odd sittings that will be required should this amendment fail of adoption. And if this be conceded, as I assume it must be by all fair-minded men, the necessity for this amendment is beyond question or controversy.

SECTARIAN NATURE OF SCHOOLS NOT SUFFICIENT OBJECTION.

Some will say, however, that, conceding the necessity, which certainly is apparent, for this amendment, an appropriation will be made for "sectarian" purposes, and such objection is fatal. This objection, I believe, sir, is as easy to wipe away as that previously urged. Gen. Francis A. Walker, former Superintendent of Census, and Commissioner of Indian Affairs from 1871 to 1873, pithily states the true principle. He said:

If the use of these (trust) funds to support Indian children at the so-called contract schools will yield the Indians a better educational result than can otherwise be obtained, the Government is false to its duties as trustee if it fails to take that course. No political consideration, independent of the best good of the Indians themselves, can properly be allowed to enter into the treatment of this subject. No matter what objection might exist to the support of sectarian schools by funds derived from taxation, these can not apply to the present case. Even were the funds applied to the education of Indians obtained wholly by taxation, I should not be disposed to think that the objections which exist to the use of public moneys for the support of sectarian schools in communities like ours hold here.

The test I would apply would be this: Does the Government send Indian children to be educated at these schools for the benefit of the denominations maintaining them or for the good of the Indian children? If the latter be the case, it seems to me that no objection in the nature of a principle applies. The only remaining question then would be, Is the education thus given the children better than that which they would obtain in agency schools, subject, as they are, to political control and frequent change of teachers?

To appropriate money for establishing and maintaining sectarian schools, for the sake of having sectarian schools, would, according to my way of thinking, be altogether wrong. To make use of good schools already existing and partly maintained by private contributions, even though under sectarian control, involves no departure from sound principles if the sole object in doing so is the good of the Indians themselves.

The value of these schools is not at issue. It has never been questioned. In the report of the board of Indian commissioners for 1898 this commendation is found at page 7:

The contract and mission schools are continued by the various church missionary societies, though with a slight reduction of attendance, since the most of them no longer receive Government aid. We trust that this work may go on and increase, for, as we have often said, our deep and abiding conviction is that what the Indian needs above all things is moral and Christian training.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his report for 1899, made no comment on contract schools. Unable to speak in derogation, he refuses the tribute of just praise. Upon the question of mission schools, however, which differ from contract schools only in that no pupils are in the former under Government contract, he says:

The labors which they do in an educational way are of inestimable value for civilizing these people, and while the heavy burden must, as it should, rest upon the shoulders of the Government, yet these little institutions of learning, with their faithful Christian workers, are important adjuncts.

The very latest official reports and utterances commend these schools. Their necessity and their value are apparent.

Again, however, the question of "sectarianism" is raised. What is meant by this word "sectarianism?" I will adopt that definition or explanation given by the Most Rev. P. J. Ryan, archbishop of Philadelphia, in a statement before the Senate Committee on Appropriations in February, 1898. I commend this definition of the learned and distinguished prelate to gentlemen writhing at the thought of "sectarian" appropriations. He said:

This word sectarianism, gentlemen, is the most thoroughly misunderstood and at present, perhaps, the most mischievous word in the English language. Properly speaking, sectarianism is the religion of sects—that is, of bodies cut away, as the term implies, from the original church. Unsectarian religion is the religion of that original church. But this is not the meaning popularly attached to it. Webster defines as sectarian "one of a party in religion which has separated itself from an established church, or which holds tenets different from those of the prevailing denomination."

Now, as we have no established church, for union of church and state in our circumstances is out of the question, and there is dispute as to which is the "prevailing denomination," a "sectarian" is not easy to find. For a man to preach unsectarianism it is supposed that he must avoid all doctrines in which he may disagree with any one of his audience. Now, as every doctrine of Christians has been denied by some one, unsectarian preaching is simply impossible, when the audience is representative of all shades of religious opinion. What is called unsectarian teaching is attempted in some of our public institutions by what are known as "moral instructors," but it is sometimes the most sectarian of all teaching, as it represents simply the peculiar religious views not of a body but of the individual who teaches. It has the merit of great variety, as it changes with each moral teacher, and not unfrequently with the same individual at different periods of life.

The logic of that statement should appeal to all reasoning men. It is fair, it is true, it is a just and impartial explanation of the meaning of a much misused and misabused word. Yet, in the light of such reasoning, a most peculiar situation confronts the opponents of contract schools and supporters of Government schools. If the logic of the distinguished prelate's statement be conceded, and I assume, Mr. Chairman, that it is, then the Government schools are the most offensive of all existing schools, because the most sectarian.

The Government schools are supposed to be stripped clean of everything that smacks of sectarianism. The report of Miss Estelle Reel, the Superintendent of Indian Schools, for 1899, however, refutes this supposition. At the outset of her report she says:

* * * Therefore it seems most fitting that I should set forth in my report such matters as have come under my personal observation while in the field.

As a result of her "personal observation," she reports the conditions existing at the many schools visited. Some of her observations follow. She found at the Haskell Institute, Kansas, that "a most happy Christian influence pervades the school;" Chilocco Indian School, Oklahoma, "religious exercises are conducted regularly;" Nambe and Tesuque Pueblo day schools, "religious training is carefully given;" Albuquerque Indian School, New Mexico, "the religious welfare of the children is carefully looked after;" Phœnix Indian School, Arizona, "Christian influences surround the students;" Perris School, California, "Sunday-school exercises are held regularly;" Carson Indian School, Nevada, "religious exercises are held regularly;" Klamath Agency, Oreg., "at each school (there are three) there is a force of faithful, Christian teachers;" Chemawa Indian School, Oregon, "religious exercises are regularly held;" Siletz Boarding School, Oregon, "the religious training of the children is carefully looked after."

These, sir, are all Government schools. Can there be religious training without sectarian teaching? Why, these schools are the most objectionable because the most sectarian of all existing schools among the Indians. Speaking of this phase of the school question, the Commissioner, in his report for 1899, says, at page 29:

Although sectarian teaching is forbidden in the schools, they are not Godless institutions. The broad principles of the Bible, of religion, and morality are taught, and, so far as it is possible, only strong religious characters are placed in charge of the children. The petty distinctions of creeds are ignored, but all employees are required to lay such a foundation in the hearts and minds of their pupils that the great religious bodies of our country may hereafter build upon it a vigorous and enduring Christian character.

In other words, the Commissioner believes in a "creedless" religious training by lay teachers.

Mr. Chairman, if this be not "sectarianism," then the greatest minds that this country has produced have not been able to comprehend that expression. Webster's argument in the celebrated Girard will case was published at the request of a "committee of eight persons of the several Christian denominations," because it "demonstrates the vital importance of Christianity to the success of our free institutions and its necessity as the basis of all useful moral education." Although the argument of the advocate, published under such circumstances, it may properly be ranked with his most notable statesmanlike utterances. In the course of that argument—and I commend this particularly to those who pin their faith to the above opinion of the Commissioner—he said:

It has been said that there may be lay preachers among them. Lay preachers! This is ridiculous enough in a country of Christianity and religion.

* * * * * * *

Now, are not laymen equally sectarian in their views with clergymen? And would it not be just as easy to prevent sectarian doctrines from being preached by a clergyman as from being taught by a layman? It is idle, therefore, to speak of lay peaching.

Here Webster was interrupted by a statement that it was not lay preaching, but lay teaching, that had been discussed. He continued:

Well, I would just as soon take it that way as the other—teaching as preaching. Is not the teaching of laymen as sectarian as the preaching of clergymen? What is the difference between unlettered laymen and lettered clergymen in this respect? Everyone knows that laymen are as violent controversialists as clergymen, and the less informed the more violent. So this, while it is a little more ridiculous, is equally obnoxious. According to my experience, a layman is just as likely to launch out into sectarian views and to advance clashing doctrines and violent, bigoted prejudices as a professional preacher, and even more so. Every objection to professional religious instruction applies with still greater force to lay teaching. As in other cases, so in this, the greatest degree of candor is usually found accompanying the greatest degree of knowledge. Nothing is more apt to be positive and dogmatical than ignorance.

Mr. Chairman, I am willing to let the determination of the question of sectarianism rest upon what I have said. If the contract schools are obnoxious because sectarian, Government schools are certainly much more objectionable.

I do not wish to be misunderstood, sir, as criticising the Department for attempting to Christianize, as well as educate, the Indians under its control. God forbid that I should ever stand obstructing such work. I am one of those who believe most firmly that religious training is an essential of proper intellectual development. No matter what the creed professed, the man who conscientiously lives up to his religious beliefs, in my opinion, is a better man, a more desirable citizen, and a more useful member of society than he who has no religious belief whatever. Religious instruction is essential to the proper development of the intellect. Without it men are menaces rather than advantages to society. Mere intellectual development is not a preventive of vice. Herbert Spencer, in his Study of Sociology, makes this clear. He pertinently asks:

Are not fraudulent bankrupts educated people, and getters-up of bubble companies, and makers of adulterated goods, and users of false trade-marks, and retailers who have their light weights, and owners of unseaworthy ships, and those who cheat insurance companies, and those who carry on turf chicaneries, and the great majority of gamblers? Or, to take a more extreme form of turpitude, is there not among those who have committed murders by poison within our memories a considerable number of the educated, a number bearing as large a ratio to the educated classes as does the total number to the total population?

This belief of the moralizing effects of intellectual culture, flatly contradicted by the facts, is absurd a priori. "What imaginable connection is there between learning that certain clusters of marks on paper stand for certain words and the getting of a higher sense of duty? What possible effect can acquirement of faculty in making written signs or sounds have in strengthening the desire to do right? How does knowledge of the multiplication table or quickness in adding and dividing so increase the sympathies as to restrain the tendency to trespass against fellow-creatures? In what way can the attainment of accuracy in spelling and parsing, etc., make the sentiment of justice more powerful than it was? Or why, from stores of geographical knowledge, perseveringly gained, is there likely to come increased regard for truth?"

It must be remembered, sir, that Indian children must acquire their religious knowledge and training in the schools. How, then, is the knowledge of Christian truths to be inculcated without offense to this absurd theory of nonsectarian teaching? It has never been proposed to eliminate Christianity from Indian education. Why attempt with them, of all others, the experiment of "philosophical morality." If there is to be true morality, it must be founded upon religion.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity—

Said Washington in his Farewell Address—religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connection with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

These schools are absolutely necessary if the Indians are to be given a Christian education and the blessing of our civilization. In the language of an aged and veteran Indian missionary, the Right Rev. H. B. Whipple, bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church:

Under our system I do not believe that it is possible for the Government, with our system of patronage and its dependence on political agents, to take the entire educational system of Indian schools into its hands without failure. There is no educated civilized constituency in the Indian country to watch and guard the schools.

ECONOMY OF CONTRACT SYSTEM.

Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURKE] pointed out that the per capita cost a year of educating children under this bill is the sum of $288. The Indian Office places its average per capita for educating pupils at $140. Under the contracts made by the Government for pupils at contract schools the sum of $108 is paid for each pupil. In return for this sum of $108 the contract schools agree—

To provide for said school a sufficient number of employees to conduct it to the satisfaction of the party of the first part, presenting such evidences of the qualifications of each instructor as may be required, all employees to converse with pupils under their charge in English and to be able to speak and write in the English language fluently and correctly; to instruct the male pupils of said school in gardening and farming and care of stock, or such other industries as are suitable to the reservation to which they are to be returned; to instruct certain of the male pupils in mechanical trades; to instruct the female pupils in cookery, laundering, needlework, dairy work, and general housewifery; to teach all the pupils in the ordinary branches of an English education; to teach the effects of alcoholic drinks and narcotics upon the human system, as required by act approved May 20, 1886; to observe with appropriate public exercises all national holidays; to instruct pupils as to the duties and privileges of American citizenship, explaining to them the fundamental principles of the Government, and to train them to sing such patriotic songs and recite such patriotic selections from time to time as shall tend to inspire them with love of the country and the flag.

To supply the pupils of said school with suitable and sufficient clothing, subsistence, lodging accommodations, medical attendance, school books, stationery, school appliances, and all other articles necessary to their personal comfort; and also to supply the school with mechanical tools, seeds, and all other articles necessary in a properly conducted industrial school.

To have schoolroom exercises on five and industrial exercises on six days in each week, legal holidays excepted.

Moreover, sir, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has the right under all such contracts—

To make inspections of the said school, and to require the party of the second part at any time to immediately dismiss from the service of the school all school employees who may be considered by the party of the first part not qualified for the respective positions occupied by them in the school.

To prescribe the course of study, to direct the grading and classification of the pupils of the school, and to designate the text-books to be used therein.

These schools are more economical than the Government schools; they are satisfactory in every respect; they are subject to the closest scrutiny and inspection of the Government. Every penny of the 30 cents a day received for each pupil is expended for the benefit of the Indians; none is spent for the peculiar benefit of the association conducting the school. It is possible, sir, to maintain these schools upon such small expenditures because those engaged in this work have devoted their lives, their energies, and their talents to it. No earthly reward is expected other than the consciousness that something has been done for the betterment of mankind in the service of the Lord.

Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to make this committee realize the importance of this question. The pending amendment provides for facilities needed by the Indian Office. It is not for me to determine its fate. I am alive to the high motives that guide members of this House in the performance of their duties. I appeal to their sense of fairness and justice to provide in this bill for these 2,000 Indian children and not leave them dependent upon charity nor permit them to return to their former barbarous, uncivilized lives, menaces to society, and an everlasting reproach to our beloved country. [Applause.]

Death of Hon. Lorenzo Danford

HON. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, January 20, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for paying tributes to the memory of Hon. LORENZO DANFORD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Ohio.

"Resolved, That, as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the family of the deceased.

"Ordered, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate"—

Mr. GROSVENOR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I come here with no prepared eulogy to participate in the ceremonies of this hour. My first acquaintance with Captain DANFORD was during the period of the civil war. I knew him as a bright, handsome, thoroughly capable soldier of the Volunteer Army. I have no particular remembrance of anything special in his career that came under my own personal observation, excepting a general recollection of this character. Following the battle of Stone River, in which he participated, the regiment to which he belonged, the Fifteenth Ohio Infantry, became the subject of an investigation, which was made by a court of inquiry appointed by General Rosecrans, and which consisted of Col. Stanley Matthews, then colonel of the Fifty-first Ohio, and another officer whose name I have forgotten, and myself. It was not because of any character or conduct of the regiment itself, but there was an issue made in a controversy between the colonel of that regiment and the major. The turning point of that inquiry was whether or not Colonel Wallace was in command of the brigade on the second day of that great battle, and if so, who was in command of the regiment itself; and if it was the major, whose name

I know but do not care to mention, the question arose whether he took command of the regiment as he ought to have done, and properly discharged his duty.

We spent several days visiting the various points of the battlefield, and some very laughable facts came to our knowledge. We found that there was absolutely grave doubt and uncertainty whether Colonel Gibson actually commanded the brigade at any time during that day or whether he did not; and when he came to testify himself he described how he had been cut off from his command with two pieces of artillery, a section of a battery, and he had skirmished around over the principal parts of the battlefield, and finally got safely into camp at night with his two guns and the few men he had with him.

Here is where Captain DANFORD came in with that precise, clear-headed mind that he always had. As captain, or the officer in command of his company, he testified. He testified of the movements of his part of the command on that day, and there was no general officer from Rosecrans down who had a more complete and graphic description at his tongue's end of every movement made by him than DANFORD had. He bore the characteristics of a soldier that he had afterwards as a lawyer and afterwards as a statesman.

He was elected to the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, and Forty-fifth Congresses. He served about the time that it takes a man of ordinary capacity to become valuable and efficient, and then he was retired for some reason that I do not understand. That he was making rapid progress toward leadership in the House is the common report of men who knew him in that day, and he served with a class of men equal, at least, to any one period of time that we have had since the war. Then he became conspicuous as a lawyer, not perhaps conspicuous in the scientific knowledge of the law books, but noted as one of the greatest trial lawyers in that section of the State of Ohio, and he lived in a locality that produced not only the great men which my colleague [Mr. KERR] has referred to, but such men as Shannon and Kennon and Cowen and other great men of that day. Then he came to Congress. He had participated in every political campaign in the State of Ohio. There was a time when I believed that he was as effective a stump speaker as there was on the stump in Ohio, and he came very often into the mining sections of my district, before I came to Congress, and spoke with wonderful efficiency. He was not what we usually call an eloquent man; he did not lay any claim to that; but he had the power of statement, of political proposition, and the power of application of current facts which made his speech upon the stump one of the most vote-getting of all the speakers I knew when he was at his best.

He received a serious injury, almost met his death, by a railroad accident, and came out of that and lingered at the very door of the other world for quite a time. I have thought, and I think I am right about it, that he never quite recovered the full spring and activity of the capacity that he enjoyed before. But he came back to Congress, and we all of us who were here in the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth know how well he discharged his duty. He had become exceedingly anxious with regard to certain matters of legislation, and sometimes he almost lost his temper when baffled and headed off by the various plans of the opposition here. He was one of those persistent, steadfast men who never yield when they believe they are right. I do not believe that there was one man on this floor nor in public life in this country who in his official capacity acted with a closer reference to conscientious belief and conscientious duty than did LORENZO DANFORD. He never had any buncombe about him. You never heard him on the stump, nor in this House, nor by the introduction of bills, nor by any other process, ever bringing forward a mere buncombe resolution, bill, or suggestion. What he brought here he favored. What he advocated here he believed it was his duty to support. That which he opposed he opposed not because of its effect upon him, but because of his obligation to duty.

He began to go downward; death was staring him in the face; and in that hour, as in the case of a great many others, he turned with fond recollection to his old home in Ohio. In the month of November or December preceding his death he had gone to his home and stood at the deathbed of his father, an old man, a farmer of Belmont County, over 90 years of age. When he came back he himself was ill, and he told me and others that his present trouble had come of staying in the cold and cheerless farmhouse of his father, away from the usual comforts that he had enjoyed, and he felt that a very serious condition had come upon him. He wanted to get back again, as his trouble pressed upon him. He thought of Ohio, and talked of Ohio, and finally he told a colleague very dearly loved and myself, one day, that he was going home. He said, "I am going to Ohio. I will get more good out of that air of southeastern Ohio than I can get out of all of the medicine of all the doctors in this city."

He spoke of its altitude, 600 feet above the Ohio River, and said: "The purest air on earth is the air of Belmont County." And he was not far wrong in his assertion of the loveliness, beauty, and healthfulness of the home in which he had lived. Those of us who attended his funeral and went to St. Clairsville for the first time were impressed with the beauty of the surroundings, and we did not wonder that in the hour of his dissolution, as it were, he almost cried like a child for the air and the surroundings of his Ohio home.

He had the confidence and respect and love of his people. They came from every county in his district. They came in great numbers. They came on that beautiful June day to do honor to the memory of the man who had been so long their champion and leader. And I can pay no better tribute to his memory than to say that around that bier, around that open grave, there were tears of affection from men not related to him, but who had known him so long and well that it seemed that a friend and brother had been taken away.

Shall America Become a Tyrant Nation?

HON. THOMAS CUSACK,
OF ILLINOIS.
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, February 26, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUSACK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The lawyers of this House have spent many days in arguing the technical questions involved in this bill, and gentlemen on this side have presented their legal objections to it. But it needs no lawyer to explain why the bill should not pass. I am utterly opposed to it, because I believe in keeping our promises. The man who breaks his word can not hope to have the respect of his neighbors. The nation which breaks its pledges to a weaker people will receive the condemnation of history.

When we entered upon the Spanish war we called upon the world to witness that we took up arms for a high and humane purpose—to relieve the people of the island of Cuba from the murderous oppression and cruelty of Spain. As an incident of that war we occupied Puerto Rico, and the inhabitants of that island offered us no resistance. They welcomed our troops as bringing to them the blessings which, we always boasted, go with our flag. The general commanding the Army made to those people the fairest promises ever penned by a hand that carried a sword. What did he say? Listen:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Ponce, Puerto Rico, July 28, 1898.

To the inhabitants of Puerto Rico:

In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity, its military forces have come to occupy the island of Puerto Rico. They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose. * * * They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold, * * * to bring you protection, not only to yourselves, but to your property, to promote your prosperity, and bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government. * * * This is not a war of devastation, but one to give to all within the control of its military and naval forces the advantages and blessings of enlightened civilization.

NELSON A. MILES,
Major-General Commanding United States Army.

And following this, President McKinley used almost the same words when he said to Congress:

The highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interest of this people as our own; and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

How beautiful a picture was here presented, one that would have made glad the hearts of all the lovers of liberty and justice from the time of those who on these shores first resisted unjust and unequal taxation by the English king.

But the same hard, selfish influences which seem to control everything that the Republicans have done lately have whispered to the Ways and Means Committee that these promises must not be carried out, and in spite of the plain terms of our Constitution, we propose to begin a policy of unequal taxation in our Territories, a policy as different from the spirit of our institutions as darkness is from light.

This is the beginning. What will be the end? Ah, Mr. Chairman, when nations desert the plain path of duty, when the strong oppress the weak for selfish ends, they begin to work their own ruin. In following the example of the greatest tyrant of all the earth, in imitating England's course toward weaker countries, we harm ourselves more than we do those whom we oppress. Are we to treat Puerto Rico as England has treated Ireland? Are we to darken the humble homes of that beautiful little island? One of the witnesses from Puerto Rico, whose testimony is before us, says:

Since the United States has had the occupation, I am sorry to say, we have gone backward; two years ago we were certainly a great deal more prosperous than we are to-day. There is a great deal more poverty than there was two years ago.

Mr. Chairman, our Government is in bad company and following a bad example. During the past two years we have heard a great deal about an understanding between the United States and England, and in Puerto Rico we see our Government doing something very similar to that which England tried to do to the American colonies a century and a quarter ago. Not only that, but our Government, which made such fair pretenses when it went to war with poor old Spain, because that country was unjust to Cuba, seems strangely blind to the cold-blooded murder which England is now committing in South Africa.

It is said that England performed some service for us during the Spanish war. I ask any man to point out what that service was, when it was performed, where it was performed, and by whom? Our State Department is now presided over by a man fresh from the flattery and social attentions of English drawing-rooms. Is it not a strange and humiliating coincidence that almost as soon as England began her attack upon the Boers, the American consul to the Boer Republic, who protested against English meddling with his official mail, should be removed and our late ambassador to England should send his own son instead?

Mr. Macrum, who has been so summarily and mysteriously displaced, to be succeeded by the son of our Secretary of State, is too old-fashioned in his ideas of freedom and independence to suit the spirit of these times, it seems. He says:

I had the humiliation, as the representative of the American Government, of sitting in my office in Pretoria and looking upon envelopes bearing the official seal of the American Government opened and officially sealed with a sticker, notifying me that the contents had been read by the censor at Durban. * * * When I accepted my post as consul I knew nothing of any secret alliance between America and Great Britain.

Mr. Chairman, what a spectacle is here presented! It has been our boast that whatever other nations did we at least were the friends of freedom everywhere. But now we are blind to the crimson streams of South Africa and deaf to the roar of English cannon. In the war now raging there we see a plain, free republic, such as ours once was, struggling against the greatest robber of all the ages, who simply says: "Your gold and diamonds or your lives; and I think, as you are in the way, I'll take your lives anyway!"

In all the history of the world there is no sight more pitiful than that of the heroic Boers, fighting like the humble heroes they are against overwhelming numbers. Who can read the story of those people and not be moved to admiration and to indignation?

When English oppression in Cape Colony became unbearable to the liberty-loving Boers many years ago, they asked the English Government, "What do you claim to be the northernmost boundary of English territory in South Africa?" The English Government replied, "Our northernmost boundary is the Vaal River." "Very well," responded the Boers, "we will leave our homes and the graves of our fathers and go beyond the Vaal, and all we wish there is to be let alone."

They went, and, as if to warn them of future danger, every night on their long journey they had to post sentinels to protect their flocks and herds from the attacks of the cowardly and treacherous lions which are England's emblem, and which well illustrate her methods, always skulking on the outskirts, ready to pounce upon the helpless.

Beyond the Vaal, in a country too poor to tempt even England's greed, these sturdy people established their new home and set up a republic as simple as ours used to be. If gold and diamonds had not been discovered there, they might yet be at peace on their quiet farms and have no use for their rifles except in the noble art of the chase. But now they are being held up, the victims of the great highwayman of the world; and while every man who loves justice must admire the Boers for their plucky defense of home and country, our Government stands idly by, not offering to make a protest, not even trying, in a friendly way, to stop the unequal conflict.

If we were justified in armed intervention against Spain, fighting from motives of national pride to maintain her ancient rule in countries which for centuries had been hers, how much more do national honor and good conscience impel us to use all peaceable means to stop a warfare, merciless and hateful, waged from motives of national greed on the one side against a brave, free people in a sister republic on the other!

Are not our proposed injustice toward Puerto Rico and our indifference to England's wanton attack on the South African Republic the visible signs of the beginning of a policy on our part which will inevitably land us among the tyrant powers of the earth? And will not all liberty-loving men in this country rise up and repudiate an Administration which places us in such disgraceful company?

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH

OF

HON. FRANK M. EDDY,

OF MINNESOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, February 24, 1900.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8345) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. EDDY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The truth of the old and trite sayings that history repeats itself and that there is nothing new under the sun has never been more clearly manifest than in the circumstances surrounding the declaration of the war with Spain, its conduct, the conditions and responsibilities growing out of that war and which came as an unavoidable and inevitable inheritance, and the settling of the great questions that grew up by reason of this inheritance and these conditions.

The American people have engaged in five great wars—that of the Revolution, that of 1812, the Mexican war, the civil war, and the war with Spain. And I want to call attention, first, to the fact that all these wars were entered into with practical unanimity on the part of the American people—this is not absolutely true, but it is practically so—that as the wars progressed the conduct of the same was criticised vigorously and, I might almost say, virulently by a minority, and, second, as a result of all these wars, new conditions arose and new great responsibilities were created that were undreamed of at their beginning, and when a majority of the people's representatives settled those great questions the minority always insisted that if the will of the majority was carried out direful results would follow, and I might add that there were always a few members of the majority who realized that the easiest way in the world to get a reputation was to kick, and so went over to the minority and joined with them in crying havoc.

Mr. Chairman, our first war with Britain was engaged in for a principle, and the most ardent advocate of that war never asserted or dreamed that it was for the purpose of establishing a separate sovereignty. As wise a man as Benjamin Franklin shortly after the battle of Lexington made this statement:

I have traveled all over the thirteen colonies, and I have not found a man insane enough to advocate a complete separation from the mother country.

It is safe for me to say now that had the leaders in the beginning of that struggle asserted that their purpose was to set up a separate government five-sixths of the men who so bravely fought on so many bloody fields would have laid down their arms and gone home in disgust.

But, Mr. Chairman, "Man proposes and God disposes," and in the fullness of time, in His own way, He made known to the minds of men His purpose to set up in the New World a new nation or new principles of freedom, and after the great struggle had ended in independence, the great men of the colonies, the great statesmen, great soldiers, great scholars, and great lawyers assembled under the direction of their respective Commonwealths and after many weeks of stormy discussion promulgated this Constitution and offered it to their several States for adoption. Then it was that the minority got in their work. They declared if the Constitution was adopted it was the beginning of the end of their newly acquired, blood-bought liberties. They dragged forth the specter of imperialism, then ten times more real and hideous than now, and tried to do business with it.

The decline and fall of the Roman Empire, the lost prestige of Holland, the decay of Portugal, and the departed glory of Spain were held up as examples, frightful examples, of what would happen to the young Republic if the people surrendered their rights by adopting this Constitution; but these tactics were as ineffective in the closing years of the eighteenth century as the same tactics will be in the closing years of the nineteenth, and the Constitution was adopted. The American people could not be frightened then and can not be frightened now by delirious creations of diseased imaginations.

I wish I had the time to go into the details of the settlement of the great problems growing out of subsequent wars. It is enough for me to say that at the close of each new and great questions arose as the result of conflict. The majority in control had to settle these questions; they did settle them notwithstanding the minority have always declared that such settlements would be anarchistic, barbaric, imperialistic, inhuman, unconstitutional, and a lot of other things. [Laughter].

Mr. Chairman, we have had a hundred years of doleful minority predictions of misfortune to the individual and disaster to the nation, and it seems to me they grow gloomy and darkly foreboding with each new crop of predictors; yet I submit that in spite of these prophets of evil this Republic has staggered along fairly well for a hundred years, and this very day, this very hour, every individual resident of the United States, or of the Territory belonging thereto, enjoys a greater freedom of speech and action than the resident of any other nation under the bending heavens, and his privileges of freedom and blessings of opportunity are greater this minute than at any time in the previous history of this nation, and "still there's more to follow." [Applause.]

Bearing in mind the absolute and utter failure of past predictions of woe, is it not strange, passing strange, that our friends on the other side persist in dragging out into the sunlight the same old scarecrows, of setting them up in the plain view of men, of manipulating the wires so that they wave their skeleton arms up and down and wag their gruesome heads from side to side? But I apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that when the manipulators of these ancient effigies discover, as discover they must, that they are frightening no one, deceiving no one, not even themselves, they will once more take down their fantastic creations, carefully box them up, and safely stow them away in the attic of the Democratic Chamber of Horrors for the use of future generations of Democracy. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, never in the history of this nation was a war entered into with more unanimity of purpose on the part of the people than the one from which the country has just triumphantly emerged.

Well do I remember that imposing, inspiring half hour of history that was enacted on the floor of this House a short time since, to participate in which was worth ten years of ordinary lifetime, when Republicans, Silver Republicans, Democrats, and Populists forgot they were partisans and remembered only that they were Americans, and in a spontaneous burst of patriotic enthusiasm voted the President $50,000,000 with which to carry on the war. There was no politics in the war; it was a people's conflict. Men who had worn the gray fought side by side with men who had worn the blue, and sons of the Southland vied with Northern boys in deeds of desperate daring, and even Africa's children caught the martial spirit, and a moving black wall, showing rifts of gleaming ivory, was one of the things that struck terror in the hearts of Spain's legions on San Juan Hill; and when they returned victorious—those boys of ours—we crowned them with wreaths in which the leaves of the Southern palm were intermingled with the leaves of the Northern pine as a symbol that the hateful thing "sectionalism" was placed forever behind, and in the fore oneness and unification should rule and reign. [Applause.]

The war with Spain, though brief in duration, was pregnant with great results. When we take into consideration the lives lost, the money expended, and the results achieved, nothing like it appears in the history of the world since wars began. The results were as stupendous as they were undreamed of at the beginning. Thousands of square miles of territory were added to our dominion and millions of new people came under our jurisdiction. Puerto Rico and the Philippines are ours. I believe they will forever remain ours. Legislation in their interest is imperatively demanded. The party charged with the responsibility of this legislation through its representatives on the proper committee has presented legislation. As to be expected, it is stoutly contested by Democratic opposition, and, as I gather from the debate, they based their opposition on two grounds:

First. That it is unwise, ill-considered, and inexpedient legislation.

Second. That it is absolutely unconstitutional.

Very little has been said on the first proposition on either side, and the merits and demerits of the measure have been but slightly discussed, and I must pass the subject without comment, except to say that the bill would suit me better if in addition to the provisions carried it extended the internal-revenue laws to the island. Great questions and weighty problems, requiring the highest order of statesmanship to solve and solve rightly, were left to us as a legacy of the war. It is a matter of profound regret that we could not approach their solution with the same oneness of spirit that we entered upon the war that entailed them upon us; but partisanship, smothered by patriotism during hostilities, blazed forth anew and politicians began to play for position and maneuver for advantage. I can not dwell upon the question of acquisition of territory, governing without the consent of the governed, and many other interesting questions, as my time is limited and I want to talk a little about the bill in question.

Presumptuous as it may seem in me, I desire to briefly discuss the constitutional question, and discuss it from the standpoint of a layman instead of a lawyer.

If I understand it, the line of difference is sharply drawn. Our Democratic friends claim in their contention that whenever territory comes under the dominion of the United States it at once becomes an integral part of the Union, and by the very act of acquisition the Constitution is extended over such territory like a blanket, covering the inhabitants thereof; all the rights of every character are conferred by its provisions except only those peculiar political rights that are inherent with statehood; while, on the other hand, our contention, at least my contention, is that certain provisions of the Constitution apply only to the States, and mere acquisition of territory does not carry with it all the constitutional provisions.

Without being at all original, I can truly say the Constitution is a most wonderful document. Without taking into account its political significance, considering the time it was produced, the scholarly and legal attainments of the men who produced it, it is the most marvelous literary production the world has ever perused, save only the Sermon on the Mount. Written by eminent scholars in an age when stilted phrase and polysyllabic wording was supposed to be a sign of erudition, its language is incomparably simple, clear, and concise.

Approximately thirteen-twentieths of it is in words of one syllable, four-twentieths in words of two, two-twentieths in words of three, and only one-twentieth in words of four or more. The Sermon on the Mount, as I said before, is its only parallel for directness of statement.

Composed largely by lawyers at a time when Latin may almost be said to have been the language of the law, it contains only two Latin terms, "ex post facto" and "habeas corpus," for which no English synonyms exist, and which are of such common use that everyone understands their meaning. There is scarcely a word in the entire document that an ordinary man can not comprehend and define the moment he hears it, without the aid of a dictionary. Volumes of commentary have been written upon it, but it is, and always will remain, its own best commentator. Judges learned in the law have construed the meaning of its provisions, yet each separate paragraph explains itself better than any man ever has or ever can explain it.

I have always contended and contend now that the best way to find out what it means is to read it, regardless of judicial decision and unhampered by any comment. Taking into consideration only the time of its production and the circumstance under which it was written, we know it was intended as a basis or framework for the government of a union of States, for it plainly says so in the preamble, where the first sentence of which is: "We, the people of the United States." But it would be preposterous to suppose that the men who promulgated it did not contemplate the territory under them under the dominion of the United States or to come under such dominion in the future that had not acquired the dignity of statehood, and this is made clearly manifest in paragraph 2 of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution, which reads:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, etc.

Could language be plainer than this? Congress has the power not only to "make all needful rules and regulations" but "to dispose of" territory.

Paragraph 1 of Article VII states:

> The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.

Plainly implying some action was necessary on the part of the people themselves before all the provisions applied.

Passing without further comment to the provisions of sections 8 and 9 of Article I, defining the powers of the Congress, the most casual reader will at once determine that section 8 is affirmative and section 9 is restrictive. That whatever the Congress can not do, it can do the things mentioned in section 8; and whatever it can do, it can not do the things in section 9.

The reader will also observe that the provisions in these two sections, as well as all sections, naturally group themselves into two well defined divisions, which we may term political provisions and revenue provisions—a political provision may be defined as one that affects man's liberty; a revenue provision as one that affects man's pocket—and every single word of the revenue provisions are made directly applicable to the States by express words or direct implication, but the political provisions contain no such restriction.

The first paragraph confers the power to impose and collect taxes, duties, etc., but this power is modified by the declaration that all duties shall be uniform "throughout the United States," clearly indicating as a negative proposition they need not be uniform in the Territory.

If I am in the book business and send out two agents, and to one I say "You may sell these books throughout the District of Columbia," and to the other, "You may sell these books," the most obtuse would understand that one was limited to the District of Columbia and that the other was without restriction. If this distinction was not intended to be made the framers of the Constitution, who were past masters of the art of expression and never wasted a word, would have said, "But all duties, excises, and imposts must be uniform."

Section 8 contains what I term six revenue provisions, each of which are applied to the States. The other provisions are not so limited. Section 9 contains nine revenue provisions, each one of which applies to the States, while this application is absent in the other provisions.

It was the old doctrine of the pro-slavery advocates first proclaimed by John C. Calhoun that all the provisions of the Constitution applied to all the territory under the dominion of the Government of the United States—and he stated it took him thirty-five years to educate the South up to his idea—and hence slaveholders had a right to carry their slaves into any territory belonging to the United States; for as the Constitution recognized slavery, any law passed by the Congress prohibiting it in the Territories, or limiting it in any way was "unconstitutional." The great abolitionists, the Garrisons, the Greeleys, and Lincolns, while sorrowfully admitting that the Constitution authorized slavery in the "States" where the laws recognized the abomination, stoutly contested the theory that this provision attached to territory by mere acquisition.

The Calhoun theory of the Constitution was burned out of existence in battle flame, and in fact every recognition of human bondage was shot out of the Constitution by freedom's bullets [applause], and to my mind it is a monstrous proposition that the mighty minds who conceived the Constitution so shackled us with fetters of steel that we are absolutely compelled to force our well-housed, well-paid, well-fed beet and cane sugar workers into equal competition with those of Puerto Rico and the Philippines, clothed only with a palm-leaf hat and their modesty [laughter], who live in windowless, doorless, palm-thatched huts, bare of furniture, where all members of the family, red, white, and black—for all these colors are often found in one household—occupy the one room in common, and make it absolutely imperative that our thousands of cigar makers should place their labor on equal terms with natives who work a week for an amount they would be ashamed to drop into a contribution box on a Sunday morning, because the fortunes of war or the providence of God placed these islands under the dominion of this Government. [Applause.]

All the constitutional lawyers in this House, with all their precedents, could not make me believe the Constitution is opposed to common sense. If we must, under the Constitution, place the American workmen in equal competition with the 12,000,000 Puerto Ricans and Filipinos, then we had better pick a quarrel with some nation, permit them to lick us, and cede them these islands as indemnity; for if the Democratic construction of the Constitution is correct, we can not dispose of them any more than we could dispose of Ohio, and absolutely the only way we can get rid of them is to permit some nation to take them by force.

But this is not true, in my judgment. I believe Congress has the right to impose "the necessary rules and restrictions," to quote the Constitution, as it may deem just and proper to protect the interests of the people of the United States, as well as for the interests of the inhabitants of these Territories. And with a liberality that is always characteristic of the American Republic, a measure has been devised that does protect our citizens and raises revenue for the benefit of the inhabitants of our new possessions.

For it must be borne in mind that every dollar of this revenue is devoted to the uses and benefit of the people of the island of Puerto Rico. This revenue comes out of the pockets of those best able to bear it. Not a dollar of this money comes out of the pockets of the wage-worker. Not a person who works with his hands is or ever will be one cent poorer for its enactment, either in the United States or Puerto Rico.

I have seen something of the opposition; something of the letters and telegrams that have poured in on the members. Every one of them comes from an interest that would profit by "free trade" or some one directly representing those interests; and I am fain to believe if a profit to them resulted from this bill, they would not be so swift to discover its unconstitutionality and oppressiveness.

By reason of expansion, which has become the policy of the Republican party, markets have been opened to many manufacturers, markets that have been hitherto closed against them, and it seems to me it is but fair and just that those who are directly benefited should contribute a small per cent of their new profits for the benefit of the inhabitants of our new possessions than that all our people should be taxed for this purpose.

But my time is rapidly passing, and I will only say, in conclusion, I shall accord this measure my hearty support, because men in whom I have the utmost confidence have given their solemn assurance that it is the best measure they in their wisdom could devise, after careful, long-continued, and arduous study, to furnish funds to lift the people of Puerto Rico out of their ignorant, degraded, and desperately poverty-stricken condition in which centuries of Spanish oppression and the awful convulsions of nature have placed them. I shall support it because to my mind it offers a complete solution for future legislative problems in the Philippines, soon to rise. I shall support it because I believe that the Constitution clearly confers on the Congress the power to impose whatever revenue legislation it may deem wise and expedient on the Territories.

Mr. Chairman, I unhesitatingly proclaim to this House, the country, and my constituency that I am an expansionist. I believe that the moment a nation ceases to expand it begins to contract like a pine tree; the instant growth ceases decay begins. I believe in expansion in religion, expansion in education, expansion in liberty, expansion in trade, and expansion in territory.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. EDDY. I have a carefully prepared, beautiful, extemporaneous peroration, and I ask two minutes more time. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDDY. I believe, although man's short-sighted vision discerned not the motive, a higher than mere human power involved us in this war to furnish this very opportunity of expansion, that education, religion, and American liberty should follow the flag into these tropic islands, blessed with the most lavish gifts of nature, that their people might be led out of the dark night of ignorance, oppression, and barbarism in which centuries of Spanish misgovernment had engulfed them. I believe divine Providence raised these great questions to be settled at a time that the Republican party, the only party that has ever settled a national question right—during the last thirty years—was in full control of the nation to settle them.

I believe it is our duty, as Republicans, to waive our individual preferences and settle them according to the best collective judgment of the Republican party—settle them in the teeth of open threats and gloomy prognostications of rampant Democracy—settle them quickly and appeal to the great forum of the people for our vindication, and I predict that in the future, and not in the distant future either, these islands will bloom and blossom with undreamed-of prosperity. Clustered on the eastern shores of the Pacific Ocean are many millions more people than in any other part of the habitable globe, they are waiting and longing for the cotton of the South, the flour of Minnesota, and the corned beef and pork of the great food-producing area of our nation.

The Pacific Ocean is our ocean, the inheritance of the children of the West and South, and in my mind's eye I can see its placid surface dotted with countless great steamers and innumerable sailing vessels flying the starry spangled flag, vessels that have cargoed in the Pacific harbors or which have passed through the great interoceanic water highway, soon, I believe, to be constructed by American capital and under sole American control. And these mighty transports will utilize these new possessions as way stations on their journey to the far east, and then will all people realize that the men who fought in Cuba and chased Aguinaldo under the blistering sun of the Philippines builded better, far better than they knew, and their hearts will wonder how some of the statesmen of to-day could have been so shortsighted as to oppose the policy of the Republican party. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

The Puerto Rico Tariff.

OF

HON. CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 23, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. LITTLEFIELD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: I believe that the pending bill is un-Republican, un-American, unwarranted, unprecedented, and unconstitutional. Inasmuch as I am in the painful position of differing with a large majority of my political brethren, and as I believe this measure is one of vast importance, of far-reaching consequence, involving results that perhaps none of us can now anticipate, I feel that I should, perhaps, render the reasons for my position. I concede, and I gladly concede, the right of leadership to the distinguished men who, by their long experience and great abilities, have the responsibility and the honor of leading the Republicans in this House. The leaders of the Republican party will find me, upon all measures that involve Republican policy, following loyally in their footsteps. When an issue, however, arises that involves, in my judgment, grave questions of right and wrong, great questions of principle, I feel, and I have no doubt they feel, that every individual member of the Republican party must be allowed to think, speak, and act for himself.

Upon such questions I believe it to be the duty of every Republican, and every Democrat, to do the right, as God gives him to see the right. [Applause.] Profoundly impressed with this view of the case, I shall submit to the House some of the reasons why I believe the pending measure should not receive the approval of the Republican party.

THE CONDITION OF PUERTO RICO.

Before I enter at any length upon the discussion of the questions involved in this bill—and I shall discuss the bill somewhat in detail—I invite the attention of the House to the condition of the people, for whom, we are about to legislate. And I desire, without repeating it now, to incorporate in my remarks in the RECORD the magnificent, and cameo-like description, of this beautiful island given by the distinguished gentleman from New York when he made his speech on Monday last. I incorporate that in my speech because I can not improve upon it:

The island of Puerto Rico, with which the bill deals, is one of the richest islands of the West Indies, a small island, about 80 miles in length and 40 miles in width, in the form of a parallelogram, running east and west, with a mountain range running along the center, some 3,000 feet high at the summit, and cultivated from the summit clear down to the seashore, with level lands along the line of the sea at the foot of the hills averaging in width from nothing to 5 miles, on which sugar is raised, the higher lands adjoining fitted for the cultivation of tobacco and pasturage, and the higher lands of the mountains on which coffee is cultivated. It is said to be the most densely populated of any land in the whole world.

But I ask attention to a few other suggestions and considerations in relation to this island, in order that we may intelligently appreciate its condition, and situation, and that of the people living thereon.

It is inhabited by about 1,000,000 people. Seventy thousand of them are dark-skinned people; 100,000 of them are of mixed blood; 830,000 of those living upon that island are white, Caucasian people, made up of Spanish, French, Italian, Portuguese, English, American, Scotch, and Irish. Its area is about 3,650 square miles, giving, say, 273 persons to the square mile.

The intelligence of these people is not measured (as was suggested, I have no doubt, with honest intent as to accuracy) by the assumption that only 10 per cent are able to read or write. The result of the last census, taken under the authority of the United States by Colonel Dingman, who returned to this country within three weeks, shows that about 25 per cent can read and write. The island has a property valuation of one hundred and sixty to one hundred and eighty million dollars. Before our flag was raised upon its soil it was under Spanish domination. It had an autonomous local government, with universal suffrage.

The people of Puerto Rico had the same pro rata representation in the Spanish Cortes as the citizens of the Empire, in Spain itself. They had sixteen members in the lower house, and four members in the upper house. Every citizen of Peurto Rico had the same legal rights as a citizen of Spain. With reference to tariff conditions, for several years preceding the advent of Miles upon their soil, they had a 10 per cent preferential tariff between themselves and Spain. By virtue of a budget which had been adopted and accepted, and by a statute which had been enacted by the Spanish Cortes, this tariff of 10 per cent was to expire on the 1st of July, 1898, so that on, and after that date, there would have been perfect free trade between Puerto Rico, and the parent State, Spain.

The suggestions which have been made by the gentleman who immediately preceded me—the gentleman from Connecticut—in relation to the revenues collected in Puerto Rico are, I submit, somewhat misleading. I shall not undertake here, because I have not the time according to the plan which I have marked out for my address, to discuss such matters in detail. I only call attention to the operation of the tariff between Puerto Rico and Spain. The license fees that were collected, the taxes that were collected upon incomes, the internal-revenue taxes, should not properly be reckoned as any part of the taxation by way of a tariff imposed on products going from Puerto Rico to Spain, or upon the products of Spain, going into Puerto Rico.

Such a statement is an unfair presentation of the fiscal condition of this island. The gentleman from Connecticut ingeniously, and confusingly combined them all in his description of fiscal conditions on the island, when nothing but the tariff has any proper place in the consideration of the pending measure. For years, has this island been populated by this white, Caucasian population. It never has had a dollar of public indebtedness. Time, and time again, the island from its own taxation has loaned to Spain money with which to carry on its various wars; and it has loaned to Santo Domingo and Cuba money for their public purposes. When the American flag was raised over this island, it had a surplus of a million and a half dollars in its treasury.

The people who inhabit this island are a self-respecting, valorous, and heroic people.

Four times, during the eighteenth century, unaided and alone, the citizens of Puerto Rico repelled the attacks of the English navy, once under the command of Drake, and once under the command of Abercrombie, and preserved Puerto Rican soil for Puerto Rico, against the most powerful of foreign invaders, although it was then a dependency of Spain.

In 1873 there existed upon the island of Puerto Rico 39,000 slaves. In 1860 there existed in the Republic 3,000,000 slaves. The Republic freed its slaves at a cost that staggers humanity. It did not free the slaves "until all the wealth piled by the bondsman's two hundred and fifty years of unrequited toil" had been sunk and "until every drop of blood drawn by the lash had been paid by another drawn with the sword."

Puerto Rico, in 1873, manumitted its slaves without tumult, without disturbance, without convulsion, without bloodshed, without murder, without outrage, and without revolution. With the consent of the Spanish Cortes, upon motion of a representative of Puerto Rico, in one moment 39,000 persons who before that time had been held in human bondage, became freemen. One day found them slaves; the next day they continued in their employment for the same masters, but working for hire—their own masters. On one day they bent down, bondmen. The next day they stood erect, freemen. This great change was wrought as quietly, and silently, as the dawn precedes the rising of the sun. The little island of Puerto Rico paid for those slaves, by its own revenue, from its own prosperity. Seven million eight hundred thousand dollars in 1873, with a loan that required only fourteen years to pay, and, adding the interest and principal, aggregating the magnificent sum of $12,000,000—paid by whom? By the people that live to-day in Puerto Rico. For what? To emancipate 39,000 human bondmen. This nation of "illiterates," this people to whom we now propose to act the part of a "good Samaritan!" That was a deed worthy of the highest triumph of Christian civilization anywhere. [Applause.] The mechanics of Puerto Rico, consisting of masons, blacksmiths, leather workers, and silversmiths, are superior in their various branches to similar mechanics in nearly every part of the civilized world. The carpenters and cabinetmakers do not rank so high.

This is the condition of the island; this is the character of the people for whom the American Congress is about to legislate. They are an intelligent people, not barbarians, not slaves, but a free people, and I submit, as I shall submit later to the Republican party—for I do not stand here to address gentlemen upon the other side of this House—I submit, as I shall submit later to the Republican party, that they are a people who, by their history, by their character, by their intelligence, their endeavor, and inheritance, are entitled to fair treatment at the hands of the Republic, and to the maintenance of its plighted faith.

Thus stood the Pearl of the Antilles, "The Ever Faithful Isle," when, a rich and willing prize, it fell into our hands. I devote a moment to the question of raising revenue in Puerto Rico for their own purposes, and then I pass from this branch of the question, to a discussion of the provisions of this bill.

It is estimated that $3,000,000 annually is necessary for the wants of this island, one million to be devoted to public administration, one million to be devoted to schools, and one million to be devoted to public works. This is a large estimate, a liberal and a generous estimate. The amount that was used for schools in Puerto Rico last year, and the preceding years, was only $345,000; and no wise and economical administration can properly expend in Puerto Rico in the next two or three years three times the sum that is now being used, because it is a practical impossibility, under what they have there as a common-school system, to make such an expenditure economically.

It was conceded by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] in his speech yesterday, that a million and a half of dollars will be raised from the internal-revenue tax upon rum. It is also conceded that under ordinary methods of local taxation they will raise about $500,000 besides, taking the island in its present prostrated condition, in all two million of the $3,000,000 necessary to be raised.

Just a word as to their condition and situation. This estimate which I have given you of $500,000 is based upon the present condition of Puerto Rico. And what is that? As was very handsomely and accurately described by the able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, it is one of utter and awful devastation and ruin, with the absolute prostration of every industry in the island of Puerto Rico. And it is further described by the report of Brigadier-General Davis, to which I shall call your attention, presenting a more awful picture than that suggested by the chairman of the Committee:

The coffee lands suffered worst. These trees are planted on the hill and mountain slopes, and in many places the declivities are very abrupt. The gale tore up the trees, loosened the soil, and the deluge of water converted the earth into a semifluid.

Then followed landslides, and thousands of acres of coffee plantations slid down into the valleys; trees, soil, rocks, and every vestige of culture are piled up in the bottom of the valleys. In such cases there is no restoration possible, for where there were smiling groves are now only bald rocks which were uncovered by the avalanches.

Where the soil was not disturbed the most of the coffee trees were either uprooted, broken off, or stripped of foliage and the immature berries. The larger trees of other varieties, which are habitually grown for shade to the coffee, were blown down, and their protection to the coffee trees is also gone; so where the trees are not wholly denuded the protection of the berries from the sun's heat is absent, and the green fruit is blighted and spoiled.

It will take five years to reestablish these coffee vegas, and there will be necessarily years of want and industrial paralysis.

The sugar industry has suffered much less than the others. Some cane has been uprooted and some has been buried, and many mills have been damaged or destroyed. The margin of profit at present prices to the sugar grower is small, but there is a margin of probably a half cent per pound to the manufacturer who has modern machinery; but the old "Jamaica train" mills, which are badly damaged, will probably never be reconstructed, and the growing cane for next year can not be ground on such estates unless their owners can negotiate large loans. Many will be unable to do this, so the prediction seems justified that much growing cane will next year be left to rot in the fields.

The municipal governments are many of them prostrate; the police can not be paid, the prisoners can not be fed, and the schools must be closed if not wholly supported from the insular treasury.

From every town and village I am appealed to for financial help, donations; loans are asked, implored even, and the alternative of chaos is predicted as the result of refusal. Proprietors beg for financial help and the homeless for rehabilitation of their dwellings. * * *

I can think of but two measures of relief. Neither alone will fully realize that result, and with a combination of the two the recovery will not be immediate. Unless something is done by the invocation of powers beyond my control, I fear that the conditions prevailing will go from what is now extremely bad to a still worse condition, even to the assumption in certain localities of military government, pure and simple, with hordes of people dependent for their existence on the bounty of the Government of the United States and its people.

I have abstained from any expression of opinion upon this matter until I could have time to investigate the real state of affairs in which the island was left by the calamity, the like of which the people of the United States fortunately have and can have no conception.

It is with hesitancy that I propose measures of relief that have been hitherto unknown, but our country has by assumption of sovereignty over foreign lands and people incurred responsibilities which can not be evaded. By the treaty of Paris nearly 1,000,000 inhabitants of Puerto Rico have been brought under the laws of the Union. They are unused to American laws and customs, and have had in the past no power of initiation. They were taught and forced to rely upon the Government in any and every important undertaking or proposition. They have been thoroughly taught to obey, but know little of self-reliance. Is it surprising that the obliteration of one-third of the wealth of the island, other than the soil itself, has been followed with industrial paralysis? So I have to hear the appeals—most piteous appeals—for help from almost every hamlet. They see no way to turn but to the way they have always turned—i. e., to the Government, and as its representative here I must hear and dispose of those appeals.

Many millions of money, as loans, have been asked by municipalities and individuals. I can only give food for the hungry. Should the supply fail, there would be a famine such as in the past has swept over and depopulated large districts in India and China.

The estimate is, that even in that condition, with agriculture paralyzed, the amount which I have stated can be raised. And I should say here, perhaps, for the information of gentlemen that while this island is fertile, and its soil only needs to be tickled with a hoe to laugh with a harvest that its fields when once allowed to pass out from under cultivation, go back in less than a year's time into a state of natural wildness, so that they have to be reclaimed again, before any profit can be made from them in agriculture. A large portion of the island is in that condition to-day. Yet, in that condition, it is conceded that by the ordinary methods of taxation this amount can be raised. The ordinary method of taxation there is simply this: It is in the nature of an income tax—a percentage on the income of the planter of sugar, tobacco, or coffee, or the man who is engaged in business, professional or otherwise—a reasonably fair method of taxation.

It is estimated by men capable of judging upon this question that when this island once gets back to its pristine condition (which will, perhaps, require two years' time), with the improved conditions of agriculture and methods of manufacture, that it is expected will be carried into this island by American industry, energy, enterprise, and intelligence, that the tax, upon the same basis, would aggregate from five to ten million dollars. This island, this Pearl of the Antilles, is no pauper or mendicant, standing begging at the doors of the American Congress for alms, or for the work of a "good Samaritan." All that the island of Puerto Rico asks, is to have the American Congress give it a stable government, an opportunity to take care of itself, and then take off its hands and let it take care of itself, a thing which it can well do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I now call your attention to the recommendations of General Davis as to what is proper to be done toward Puerto Rico, and I beg the attention of the House to the fact that this report which I hold in my hand was written on the 5th day of September, 1899. After describing these lamentable conditions, he suggests the proper remedy. Brigadier-General Davis has been the representative of the United States Government in Puerto Rico for the last two years. He is a man of great intelligence, capacity and ability. He has made a report to the United States Government, giving us the benefit of his information, and states what he thinks the remedy should be.

I will read it. I do not understand—and if I am mistaken I will thank any gentleman to correct me as I proceed—I do not understand that Brigadier-General Davis at any time, in any place, has ever undertaken to make a statement that contradicts this recommendation of his. I read from page 7:

> The measures of relief I have had suggested to me, and which I deem of sufficient importance to submit to the Government at Washington, are "The removal of all duties on trade between the United States and this island."

That is his first recommendation. His second is:

> The authorization by the Washington Government for the issue by the insular authorities of interest-bearing notes in small denominations to the amount of $10,000,000, the notes representing money to be loaned solely on landed security to the extent of 30 or 40 per cent of the value of the same, and no note to be issued save when a first mortgage on the land is behind it.

Right here, for a moment, let me call your attention to a practical condition that has existed in Puerto Rico for the last fifteen or twenty years, and under which Puerto Rico has not only paid its own bills, but had a surplus of a million and a half dollars in its treasury, besides manumitting its slaves at a public charge of $12,000,000. That condition is this: The method seems to have been, for traders and money lenders to assist in its agriculture in this way: A man who had a store in a given locality, near where there were plantations, would loan to a planter, say, the sum of $5,000. He would charge him anywhere from 12 to 25 per cent interest. When the loan was made, the money remained in the hands of the trader, or lender, and the planter drew it as fast as he wanted it, but he paid interest on the whole of it. When his crop was taken from the ground, he carried it to the trader, the trader sold it, received a commission upon it, in addition to the charge of 12 to 25 per cent interest, and then the trader sold to the planter his goods, and made a profit on them besides.

Under these conditions, with that management, this island has been able to take care of itself. It is proposed by the people of Puerto Rico, to eliminate the money lender at the rate of 12 to 25 per cent, and loan to the agriculturist at the rate of 5 to 6 per cent, and what then, under such circumstances, would be the prosperity of this thrifty people? They are entitled to the appellation of magnificent people, by virtue of their history, by virtue of their inheritance from the various Caucasian races which they represent, and from the standpoint of aspiration for liberty and freedom.

With this change in condition that it is hoped may ensue, what will be its possibilities? General Davis says:

> But it matters very little what method be adopted for raising the money, so it be raised and soon available. Unless financial help be given to Puerto Rico very soon, the present temporary difficulties will, I fear, become permanent, involving the loss of a business worth six or seven million dollars, which surely is worth an effort to preserve.

Gentlemen express a good deal of horror at the idea that Puerto Rico should want to negotiate a loan. They do not want this dependency to enter upon its new life with a debt upon its back. The people of Puerto Rico are mainly interested in that proposition, unless the United States Government is asked in some way to guarantee this loan. They have not been asked to do so. It never has been suggested. On the contrary what does Brigadier-General Davis say—

> I do not recommend the guaranty by the United States of a loan for this island. It does not require it. For nearly 4,000 square miles of rich soil, inhabited by a million of people—> who have had an exterior trade averaging over $18,000,000 do not need a guaranty. I am assured by financiers that investors would immediately subscribe for this loan at a low interest the moment it was sanctioned by the United States.

And the kind of people which I have described—

That is all these people ask—an opportunity to do business in their own way, and practically to anticipate the collection of taxes by a temporary loan. There is hardly a municipality under what we have been in the habit of referring to as the American flag, and in this great Republic, that does not anticipate by temporary loan the collection of its taxes. In one or two years' time, under these circumstances, with its inexhaustible agricultural resources, this island of Puerto Rico will be able to take care of itself and extinguish the loan. A people who will pay by their own taxation $12,000,000 to free 39,000 slaves may be trusted by the American Republic to hire two, three, or four million dollars, if necessary, to pay their running expenses for a year or two of time.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman if he thinks we are confronted with the alternative of allowing the island to go heavily in debt by the issue of bonds or pass this bill?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. On the proposition of going heavily in debt, does the gentleman think that two or three million dollars on an island worth $160,000,000 to $180,000,000 would be "heavily in debt?"

Mr. LACEY. I should call that a heavy debt. My own State forbids a debt except as to a limited amount, and it is absolutely out of debt.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. My State forbids debt in excess of 5 per cent of valuation, and 5 per cent of this valuation would be $8,000,000 to $9,000,000.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will.

Mr. TAWNEY. Are you aware that when General Davis was before the Committee on Insular Affairs he stated that the loan ought to equal at least $10,000,000?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I have it right here in his report. I have the facts and figures, and I have given them. Three million dollars is all that they need by the wildest estimate. They have a revenue, as estimated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] yesterday of $1,500,000 on rum—and personally I have no objection to a tax on rum, because I have no use for rum [laughter and applause]—and $500,000 that can be raised by the present rate of taxation, and that is $2,000,000, so that it only needs another million. What are they going to do with this $10,000,000? What necessity is there for it? Again, if the facts and figures are correct, $2,000,000 is to be raised on your own figures, and it only leaves one million to be raised.

Now he wants ten millions. Three or four millions would be ample, in my judgment. I am willing, for one, to leave the amount of the loan in the hands of the people who propose hereafter to pay it, and whose history demonstrates that it can be left in their hands without danger as to their ability to pay it; because, I assert, it does not lie in the mouth of anyone standing upon this floor, or anywhere else, to say that this fruitful island, this Pearl of the Antilles, that has paid $12,000,000 under the circumstances to which I have called your attention, can not pay $10,000,000 when it is operated with free labor, and with equal opportunity for their products in our market, the domestic market, the home market.

These are all the suggestions I care to make in relation to the character of the island of Puerto Rico.

THE OCCASION FOR THE BILL.

This bill comes here against the recommendation of Brigadier-General Davis, against the protest of the delegates from Puerto Rico, against the recommendation of Elihu Root, the distinguished and able Republican Secretary of War, and against the recommendation of William McKinley, the President of the United States [loud applause on the Democratic side], and against the original recommendation of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

I submit that there has not yet been rendered, by any man on the Committee on Ways and Means, or any other man, a sufficient reason why the Committee on Ways and Means has changed its front upon this proposition. I think I know. I shall not suggest it, but no sufficient reason has been suggested. What has been suggested? That the tobacco and sugar of Puerto Rico does not interfere with any American industry now, and therefore we do not need it for the present protection of American industry. The chairman of the committee said that he discovered that the original bill would raise no revenue. It would seem that he might have learned when he drew the bill that it would produce no revenue, as it did not provide for any revenue and was not intended to produce revenue. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The bill is grossly inadequate for the purpose claimed, even from the standpoint of revenue. What Puerto Rico needs is help, and help now. "Unless financial help be given Puerto Rico very soon the present temporary difficulties will, I fear, become permanent, involving the loss of a business worth six or seven millions, which surely is worth an effort to preserve." This was stated December 15, 1899. It is now February 23, 1900. The tariff features of this bill do not provide a dollar for immediate use. The estimated $2,000,000 to be raised under this bill will be spread over a whole year, and meanwhile the six or seven millions of business will have been lost.

The gentleman from Connecticut says it does not interfere with domestic tobacco. It might be interesting to know why they have changed front upon this great question, that is about to put the Republican party in the position to which I have called your attention, before the people of this country, upon the threshold of a great national campaign, which will determine whether the Government of this country is to rest, either in the hands of the Republican party, or of gentlemen upon the other side of the House. I yield to no man in the Republican party, upon this floor, or to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, much as I reverence and respect him, and as high an admiration as I have for his great ability—I yield to no man in my devotion to the Republican party, and my desire for its success in the coming campaign. This it is that leads me to suggest that it is better to have the fullest consideration here, of this question, rather than to inject it inconsiderately into the coming campaign, as later upon the stump it may be difficult to satisfactorily explain our position, to the enlightened, fair-minded intelligence of the American people.

We had better listen, and think now, than to listen later. A word here as to the assertion of the President of the United States as to "the plain duty" of the Republican party and of the American Congress. It is as much the duty of the Democrats as the Republicans, because later, when I reach that stage in this discussion, I shall base it upon the broad proposition that, to my mind, appeals to every patriot, and every man who believes in the good faith of the Republic, its honor, and its integrity. Every Democrat who sits on this floor is interested in that proposition as well as my Republican friends, with whom I just now can not act upon this bill.

As to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio that there had been a change in conditions I would like any gentleman here, to suggest what change there has been. He suggested—and I want to call your attention to this particularly—he suggested that there had been a change in conditions. The report of General Davis was made September 5, 1899. In the middle of the preceding August that awful tornado, that terrific cyclone, swept over this fateful island and carried these coffee plantations from the mountain sides, an indistinguishable mass of ruin, into the valleys below. That awful ruin had visited the Pearl of the Antilles, before this report was made by General Davis to the President of the United States. No calamity has visited the island since. No calamity is now impending over it, except what may be involved in this measure now pending. [Applause.]

There has been no change in conditions, there has been nothing that can be suggested. When William McKinley—and, by the way, I shall spend no time in this discussion in referring to Andrew Jackson, or Thomas Jefferson, or Tom Benton, or any of that great galaxy of men—for me it is sufficient if William McKinley, the honored President of this Republic, the distinguished representative of the Republican party, who is enthroned in the hearts and affections of all our people, will follow in the footsteps of Washington and Lincoln. [Applause.] A great many things have been done by the other distinguished gentlemen, that I would not like to have any Republican President undertake to do, or even think of.

What does President McKinley say? He said when he sent his message to the House—and I have received no communication from the President of the United States since—mark that—he communicated to me through the Constitutional channel; I say since then, neither directly nor indirectly, have I received any communication from the President of the United States that would tend to indicate that when he said—not that it was his opinion, not that he thought, not that he would advise or suggest, but that it was "the plain duty"—stop and listen to that a minute—"the plain duty" of the Republican Congress to give free trade between Puerto Rico and the United States, he did not mean it. That is an assertion of fact. It was either true or false.

If conditions have changed, let some gentleman suggest it while I am speaking. If there has been any change of conditions that could be mentioned by any gentleman, since the President of the United States said it was our "plain duty," let him assert it now. That statement was either true or false when he made it, and if it was true or false when he made it, it is true or false now. I believe it was absolutely true.

I say to my friends that I am not ready, upon the question of policy even, to cast a vote in this House against what the President of the United States has truthfully said was my "plain duty." I stand upon that proposition. I stand by the President of the United States, and a little later I will call your attention to some significant reasons why.

EXPORT DUTY ON ARTICLES EXPORTED FROM A STATE.

What is this bill? I take it in detail. The second provision in it, imposes what they call an import duty on the manufactures and products of the United States "coming into Puerto Rico." The bill imposes a duty on all goods "coming from Puerto Rico" into the United States and on goods "coming into Puerto Rico" from the United States. "Coming" both ways. I suppose the language of the bill is so couched, in a futile effort to get rid of a provision of the Constitution which provides that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State." (Constitution, Article I, section 9, paragraph 5.) I submitted to two members of the Ways and Means Committee the question, as to whether they could give me any legal distinction between these propositions: First, a vessel is loaded with lumber, say in Portland, and starts for Puerto Rico. Under this bill we will assume the tariff to be $1,000.

Under this bill they collect the duty when she arrives, and who collects it? The United States Government. Into whose pocket does it go? Into the United States Government's. Second, what legal distinction is there between collecting the duty when she clears from Portland for Puerto Rico, before she leaves the State, or collecting it afterwards in Puerto Rico? The same hand collects it either in Portland, or in San Juan. It goes into the same pocket in either case, into the same Treasury, and is to be disbursed, under the provisions of this bill, without any appropriation from the public Treasury, which the Constitution provides. But I do not suppose the Constitution is anything between friends. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I suggested that question to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and asked him if the tax was collected in the city of Portland on the products of the United States going into Puerto Rico, whether it would not be a tax on "articles exported from any State," and he could not tell me. I asked him what the legal distinction was, when the same duty, on the same cargo, was collected by the same hand, for the same Treasury, in Puerto Rico. He could not tell me what the distinction was, or whether there was any. I heard his speech after I had put the question to him; he occupied an hour and a half about other things, and he did not tell me then. I put the same question to another member of the Ways and Means Committee, who gave me no answer. He has not yet made a speech. I suppose when he gets around to it, he may answer it. But I have not had the pleasure of hearing that question answered, much as I have desired to have it answered in order to bring me to the support of this branch of the measure, by reason of its harmony with the Constitution. I sought from two members of the Ways and Means Committee an answer to this question, more than four days ago—yes, last week. It is not answered yet.

What did they do? I imagine they suggested the question to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee—a man of eminence, ability, and character, a man whose suggestion ought to have weight with this House, and does. How did he answer it? I did not hear his speech, but I have read a part of it in the RECORD. He states that he spent a whole day looking up the lexicographers and dictionaries, for the purpose of finding a definition of "export." I have an idea that the gentleman rather looked for a definition that would help his case; because, being on that committee, I know that if he had whirled round in his revolving chair in that committee room, and reached his hand out to the revolving bookcase, he could have put it upon Bouvier's Law Dictionary, where he would have found in one minute's time a very good definition. After his exhaustive research he discovered that "export" meant the exporting of goods "to a foreign country;" but Bouvier would have shown him this:

Export: The act of sending goods and merchandise from one country to another.

Now, in the name of all the gods at once, is it possible that by virtue of a treaty, or by virtue of conquest, we have eliminated Puerto Rico from the map of the earth and it is no longer even a "country?" [Laughter.]

Let me read another definition. I think the gentleman ought not to have spent so much time on this question. "Much study is a weariness of the flesh." [Laughter.] The gentleman referred to the Standard Dictionary, which is not yet old enough in its present form to have been cited by the courts as an authority.

I understand the gentleman from New York to admit that if "export" as used in the Constitution does not mean going into a "foreign country," then the act is unconstitutional as providing for an export duty. I am not going to weary myself very much on this point as it is not the important feature. I am simply suggesting this as one of the inconsistencies of the bill.

I read the definition as given in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law:

To export an article of commerce is to carry such article out of a country or place.

When an article passes from the United States to Puerto Rico does it, or does it not, go out of "a country or place?" It seems to me it does; and it seems to me that when it goes out of the country, then, according to this legal authority—I do not refer to the literary authority quoted by the gentleman, but according to this legal authority—it becomes an export, and does not necessarily involve the idea of going to a "foreign country."

Let us turn to the Century Dictionary, which has been quoted quite frequently by the courts. Its definition is:

Export: That which is exported; a commodity carried from one place or country to another, for sale; generally in the plural.

That unfortunate island is, it seems, for some purposes foreign, and for other purposes domestic, corresponding with the condition of certain gentlemen in this House some years ago who undertook to be present and absent at one and the same time, according as one or another purpose was to be accomplished. In order to sustain the validity of the tariff upon goods coming into the United States from Puerto Rico, Puerto Rico is held to be a foreign country. In order to sustain the validity of the tariff upon goods exported from the United States to Puerto Rico, under this discovery of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Puerto Rico is a domestic country. I think I understand the argument, but I do not feel impressed or oppressed with its weight.

The gentleman from New York, who made his speech under some degree of excitement, said that he would like to look in the face of any lawyer who would undertake to dissent from some of the propositions which he laid down. I do not see the gentleman in his seat, but if he wants to see me he can look into my face, for I have never turned my back on any man. [Applause.] That is one of the things I do not do.

One of his propositions, as I understand, is that because the Constitution says that under some circumstances a State can lay an export duty, with the consent of Congress, and because Congress has the powers of the General Government and the States (which they have discovered in connection with some of these cases which they undertake to discuss), therefore—what?

Under the Constitution, Congress can suspend the operation of that clause of the Constitution which provides that no export duty shall be imposed on articles sent out of a State; that is, the State could act with the consent of the Congress; but as it has been held in general terms, in discussing a clause of the Constitution that has no connection whatever with this, that Congress has the powers of the State as to a possession, it can give its consent, and then act for the State, and when it acts for the State it is supposed to give its own consent, and hence you have the absolute repeal, by the mere operation of logic, of an express prohibition of the Constitution. I think this proposition may be fairly designated as metaphysical, and while it is as well founded undoubtedly as many of the propositions upon which the Committee rely, little is hazarded when it is asserted that if the court ever sustain this clause of the bill it will not be upon this attenuated ground.

I have another objection to this branch of the bill. I submit that it is un-Republican. When—and I asked this question of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and if I misrepresent or misquote him I will thank him to correct me at once—I asked the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when in the history of the Republican party, that party ever voted to impose a tariff upon American capital and American labor? Ever before? He did not answer. He did not answer in his speech. Will any man on this floor answer? Where is the warrant in the history, or the platforms, of the Republican party, the party of protection to what? To American labor and American capital, against foreign labor and foreign capital. Where is the warrant in the platforms of the Republican party, or in the history of the Republican party, or in the assertion of any man who undertook to belong to the Republican party, for imposing a tariff upon American labor and American capital?

The necessaries of life—flour, rice, codfish, pork, bacon, corn meal, fresh beef, and mutton—to-day go into Puerto Rico free. Bags for sugar, shooks, rough lumber, agricultural implements, machinery, trees, shrubs, seeds, and school furniture are all free under an Executive order. They have been going in free since October 21, 1899. This bill makes them all subject to 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff.

The people of Puerto Rico, partly as the result of our disturbance of their affairs, are starving. They have scarcely anything with which to buy food, if the food was there. In the exercise of our enlightened philanthropy, and from a desire to play the part of the "good Samaritan," our first act is to increase the cost to them of the necessaries of life by a tariff, and to that extent place it beyond their power to sustain life. An allopathic dose of that brand of philanthropy would tend to depopulate the island.

Let me illustrate this for just a moment. Let us see where we are. Let us understand what we have got to meet in the coming campaign. The tariff upon coarse lumber coming from any foreign country into any part of the United States, and into Puerto Rico—because that is enough a part of the United States to have the tariff apply—is $2 a thousand. What does this bill do? Our lumbermen have the protection of $2 a thousand, as against the Canadian lumberman, and I see a man sitting in this Hall who lives within a mile of the territory over which floats the Cross of St. George. To discriminate against its industries the Dingley bill, the work of my distinguished and lamented predecessor, with the cooperation of the great men in this House, was passed. That gave to the lumber industry a protection of $2 on a thousand. What does this bill do? It takes off 25 per cent of it and leaves it with a protection of $1.50 on a thousand. On codfish it is precisely the same in proportion.

I only use this as an illustration. Where is the warrant in Republican history, where is the warrant in a Republican platform, for discriminating against these industries and these products that happen to be exported to Puerto Rico by the amount of 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff, and putting no duties whatever upon other products or manufactures going to other countries or other places in this country? Where is that proposition? I submit it as a Republican proposition. I make no complaint for this reason, but it illustrates the operation of the bill.

DUTY ON IMPORTS FROM PUERTO RICO.

I now take the provision in this bill in which the great fundamental proposition is involved. The amount at stake I shall not take time to discuss. I do not undertake to weigh in the scales of an apothecary the integrity of the Republic or human rights of people anywhere. If they are infringed so far as I am concerned, by so much as a hair, I will not approve or adopt the proposition.

This provision does what? It imposes a tariff of one-quarter of the Dingley tariff upon the products of Puerto Rico coming into the United States, and upon what products? Upon sugar and upon tobacco. There is none upon coffee. The value of the coffee produced before this awful cyclone struck this devoted island was $4,200,000 a year. The value of the sugar was $2,700,000 a year. The value of the tobacco was $300,000 a year. This imposes a tax for the revenue of Puerto Rico upon two industries, sugar and tobacco, and leaves coffee entirely free, and coffee represents as much as both of them—yes, more than both of them put together. And so far as this tax is concerned, conceived in the "good Samaritan" habit, in the "good Samaritan" theory, of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL], out of great philanthropy and benevolence—this philanthropy that takes out of a man's pocket with the right hand, and shifts it over to the left hand, and carries it back to his left-hand pocket, less expense of collection—magnificent philanthropy and benevolence, without a copper's expense to the magnificent people who exercise the philanthropy and benevolence!—upon whom does it rest? It rests solely upon the producers of sugar and tobacco. Of course there are other industries, but these are the principal ones. It leaves the producers of sugar and tobacco paying all that tax, the coffee planters and all other property and business paying none of it. That is the practical proposition. Why is this suggested here now? What is its purpose? What is its object? It is said that it is not to protect any American industry; it is said that it does not bear grievously upon Puerto Rico; but what else is said? It is said that we are here and now—and that is the great objection which I have to this bill—it is said that we are, here and now, as the representatives of the Republican party, to announce to the world our policy in connection with Puerto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago.

And what is that policy? That policy is to protect the industries of the United States, against the industries of Puerto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago. That means what? That we are going to develop those territories? That we are going to give them an opportunity to blossom like the rose? It means this, and you may as well meet it here, as meet it hereafter: It means that when they can raise sugar in Puerto Rico, that does not interfere with us, they can raise it and send it here. It means that when they raise it, so that it does interfere with us, we will put our foot upon their necks, with a tariff, and stop it from coming here in competition with our sugar. It means that anywhere and everywhere, in Puerto Rico or the Philippine Archipelago, any industry or any occupation, however much it may be developed under the flag, with our energy, and our enterprise, and our industry, the moment it comes into competition with anything raised or manufactured in the Republic, meaning the forty-five States, according to the new theory of sublimated selfishness, just that moment, the Republic will put its hand upon it and keep it down, so that it will not compete. How much will you develop Puerto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago on that policy?

I say here frankly, I say here coolly, and I am not excited about this, that I do not believe that proposition will appeal to the good sense, the fair mind, honest judgment, of the people who have been in the habit of voting loyally the Republican ticket. I care nothing about the other side. So far as we are concerned, I do not believe it will appeal to them. That is the proposition—that Puerto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago are an orange for us to squeeze. The 12,000,000 subject people in these islands are simply, under this proposition, "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for 75,000,000 free people. How much American capital will go into Puerto Rico or into the Philippine Archipelago, if this proposition is to be sustained, when they know that any development they may make there is subject to the repressing hand of an American Congress? They are our own people in more senses than one, according to the theory of those who propose this bill—peculiarly our own, because they are a good deal more our own, if they have no constitutional rights, than they would be if they came in as a part of this body politic, with the political rights of American citizens, so that they could protect their own interests.

This is from the standpoint of policy and fair dealing.

BREACH OF GOOD FAITH.

The breach of good faith is another reason why I am opposed to this measure.

In 1898 the army of the United States, in a war declared in the interest of humanity, and upon the proposition that the old flag would carry with it liberty and freedom and equal opportunity and all the blessings of a Christian civilization, went where? It went to the island of Puerto Rico, and Major-General Miles held the standard. I will read to the House, the proclamation with which General Miles signalized his advent upon Puerto Rican soil. It is dated Ponce, Puerto Rico, July 28, 1898.

In it he said, among other things, referring to the soldiers of the Union:

> They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose, to seek the enemies of our country and yours, and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistance. They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold.

This is not the conversation of any Secretary of War itinerating over this magnificent island. He said further:

> We have not come to make war upon the people of a country that for centuries has been oppressed, but, on the contrary, to bring you protection, not only to yourselves but to your property, to promote your prosperity—

And now mark the language—> and to bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government.

Now, if the gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee, instead of spending so much time in trying to ascertain that the United States meant the United States, and that a State meant a State, and that forty-five States constitute the United States, and that the United States, meaning forty-five States, is described by the boundary line of the forty-five States—if they had taken their dictionaries and looked just for a moment at Webster, for his definition of immunity, they would have ascertained what the promise was that General Miles made to this devoted people. What does "immunity" mean?

> Freedom or exemption from any charge—

And it did not take me a day to hunt this up—

> Freedom or exemption from any charge, duty, obligation, office, tax, imposition, penalty, or service.

Was there any tax, in the nature of a tariff, in any part of the Republic, between the States and the Territories, when General Miles made that promise to these people? The word "immunity" in his proclamation could have referred to nothing by any decent construction of the English language except what? Immunity from charges, taxes, and service. The same immunity that the citizens of the United States enjoyed, and in no State or Territory was there then, nor will there ever be, any duty or tax upon exports and imports between States or Territories, or States and Territories. That is one of "the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government." Relying upon this proclamation these people did what?

"AND THE COMMON PEOPLE HEARD HIM GLADLY."

They prostrated themselves before him; they covered him with wreaths and garlands of flowers; they kissed the flag that was carried there under that promise [applause], and the delegates from Puerto Rico stand here, asking the Republican party to make good the promise made by General Miles for the Republic, when they eagerly delivered "The Ever-Faithful Isle" into his all-conquering hands. Miles, the magnificent representative of our institutions, the typical American citizen, who won his way by sheer force of merit, ability, and valor, from the position of a common soldier, step by step, to the position of leader of the Armies of the Republic. [Renewed applause.]

I never will vote to violate the promise he made or to repudiate the pledge. The Republican party can not afford, in this or any other campaign, to violate that sacred promise. It is written in the blood of our heroes that fought at El Caney, San Juan and Santiago. It was made in the presence of all Christendom, and it is sealed by the God of battles. [Loud applause.] The Republic can not violate that promise made to this weak and helpless people, without sullying its honor and tarnishing its fame. [Renewed applause.] It is not written in the history of the Republican party that at any time, or anywhere, from the hour of its birth agony, when it sprang into existence, full planoplied as the unconquerable champion of liberty and freedom, under the valiant leadership of the great Pathfinder, it ever violated its plighted faith, or swerved from the path of rectitude and honor.

These are the characteristics which led one of the greatest purists known to our political history to declare:

> I shall not repeat to you the splendid story of the Republican party. It is a story that we never tire of telling and that our children will never tire of hearing, a story which is written in the hearts of all American citizens, because it recounts greater service for liberty, for the country, for mankind, than those of any party, in any other nation, and at any other period of time.
> What is the secret of this unparalleled history? It is because the Republican party has always been the party of the best instincts, of the highest desires of the American people. This is its special glory. It has always represented the American instinct of nationality, American patriotism, and a Christian devotion to freedom.

The Republican party can ill afford, upon the threshold of a national election, to enter the campaign violating its faith with Puerto Rico. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine be allowed to conclude his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I thank the committee for their consideration. It is suggested by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LONG], and well suggested, in a speech which it was not my pleasure to hear, but which undoubtedly has increased his reputation and demonstrates his ability, that the treaty contains a provision that Spain can have the same tariff with these possessions that we give to them, and if we give the open door to Puerto Rico we give the open door to Spain. We do it unless—what? Unless we violate the agreement we made with Spain; and it is entirely competent, if the Republic sees fit to do so, to violate that agreement.

But here stand two agreements—one made with Spain, and one made with the prostrate, helpless, long-suffering, starving Puerto Rico. Which shall be violated? If I had my choice, and were I compelled to determine between them, I would violate our faith with a power which, until we brushed it off the earth as a military and naval power during the last two years, had some ability to protect and defend itself. I would not go before the civilized world upon the proposition that we would break faith with the downtrodden and the oppressed. I would go further than that. I would not break faith with either. I stand behind the eminent gentlemen who negotiated that treaty. I believe they acted in the interest of the Republic, and as faithful representatives of the American people. We can not repudiate the promise made by General Miles on the shores of Puerto Rico. I believe the Republic can afford to keep all of its promises, no matter what the consequences be. It should not violate or repudiate either.

I read now a speech made by General Henry to the alcalde and citizens of Puerto Rico at the close of hostilities and the celebration of peace in Puerto Rico:

ALCALDE AND CITIZENS: To-day the flag of the United States floats as an emblem of undisputed authority over the island of Puerto Rico, giving promise of protection to life, of liberty, prosperity, and the right to worship God in accordance with the dictates of conscience. The forty-five States represented by the stars emblazoned on the blue field of that flag unite in vouchsafing to you prosperity and protection as citizens of the American Union. * * * I congratulate you all on beginning your public life under new auspices, free from governmental oppression, and with liberty to advance your own country's interests by your united efforts.

Now they are learning that "protection as citizens of the American Union" was "a delusion and a snare;" that they are not "citizens of the American Union," and it was never intended that they should be; that the "protection" referred to was the protection of the citizens of the United States, in "the American Union," against the people of Puerto Rico. This is reading between the lines with a vengeance. The alcalde, in his innocence and simplicity, replied, in part:

* * * Puerto Rico has not accepted American domination on account of force. She has suffered for many years the evils of error, neglect, and persecution, but she had men who studied the question of government, and who saw in America her redemption and a guaranty of life, liberty, and justice. There we came willingly and freely, hoping, hand and hand with the greatest of all republics, to advance in civilization and progress, and to become part of the Republic, to which we pledge our faith forever.

I can not dwell longer upon this painful proposition. I must call your attention to what Secretary Elihu Root, the great lawyer, the honest man, the representative Republican, upon these facts said. He says:

But the highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interests of this people as our own, and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

Here you have the solemn promise made by General Miles when he conquered these islands, the promise relied upon by them, its construction by Mr. Root, Secretary of War, and the statement of that eminent Republican, that true patriot, William McKinley, when he said it is our "plain duty" to give these people free trade; and yet it is proposed that we shall act contrary to the advice of Davis, contrary to the advice of the delegates, contrary to the advice of Root, contrary to the advice of the President of the United States, in violation of our faith, and that by gentlemen who undertake to know more here than the men know there, about their condition and what ought in justice to be done.

There are two sides to this as a political proposition. I do not want to defend upon the stump—I hope there will be no occasion to do so—I do not want to defend upon the stump the proposition that the Republican party with its eyes open, with its attention called to the fact, persisted in violating the good faith of the Republic. Why, gentlemen here say that we are about to inaugurate a policy of colonial government. I want to ask the gentlemen in this House if they desire to signalize their entry upon a colonial government, in their very first act, by a breach of good faith. Do you remember the history of proud Spain? What is it? What is it that has characterized Spain ever since the sixteenth century, ever since Pizzarro rode ruthless and roughshod over Mexico, and the Duke of Alva filled the Netherlands with carnage, blood, butcheries, and indescribable horrors, in his infamous attempt to crush out the very beginning of civil and religious liberty? What is it that has characterized her and made her contemptible before every honorable nation upon the earth? It is her duplicity and her breaches of good faith.

Will the Republican party, in the teeth of the declaration of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States, signalize its embarkation upon that policy with its first act a breach of good faith? That policy upon the part of Spain, has made her for all time a "hissing and a by-word" and a reproach to all Christian peoples. I stand here, if I stand alone, as a member of the Republican party, the party that I love, the party that has done so much for the liberty and welfare and prosperity and development of the Republic, to enter my solemn protest against such an act.

Even under the guise of "good Samaritanism," even under the guise of "philanthropy" or any guise or subterfuge of any sort, I can not and will not agree to it. I leave that for my friends to discuss and reflect upon. It is hardly worth while for a man who sits in the House, and happens to hear coming from persons, unduly and unnecessarily alarmed, a demand for this legislation, to shut his eyes and think that these things do not exist because he does not then see them. They are here; they will be with us; they will be like the Old Man of the Sea; they will cling to our backs throughout the next campaign and, I fear, through many others.

Puerto Rico kneels to-day, weak, helpless, starving, with her hands held toward us in supplication. She pleads for the fulfillment of this promise. Her prayers may fall upon deaf ears, that will not hear in this House, but there is one tribunal to which I fully believe they may confidently appeal—the enlightened, unselfish, Christian conscience of a great and free people.

LEGAL PHASES OF THE QUESTION.

I have a few suggestions to offer upon the legal propositions involved, and I shall go over them as rapidly as I may. What is the proposition of the Ways and Means Committee? It is:

In case of territory acquired with no limitations upon the power of Congress, its power is absolute and conclusive except in so far as it is limited by the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, which prohibits the existence of slavery in any place over which the United States has jurisdiction.

In other words no single provision of the Constitution besides this relating to slavery, according to the Ways and Means Committee, applies outside of the limits of the forty-five States of the Union. No other provision of the Constitution controls our action in connection with territory or property. They assert in effect that it is necessary to establish this proposition in order to sustain the bill.

I do not propose to discuss this question exhaustively from a constitutional standpoint. I concede that my opportunities for investigation and examination have not been such as to enable me to so speak. Such a discussion would require the fullest deliberation, the maturest consideration, and the most exhaustive investigation. I shall only discuss the proposition relied upon by the committee.

Let me say at the outset, that so far as I am concerned in discussing this proposition, wherever there is a doubt, I shall resolve it in favor of, and not against, human rights. I think the Republican party will stand better in the next campaign, if it resolves these doubts, where there are any, in favor of, and not against, human rights. Whenever this question may reach the Supreme Court of the United States, I believe it to be their duty to resolve these questions with a view to establishing, and not destroying, the rights of the governed. Considerable was said the other day about the Dred Scott case. What did that case decide? Stop and think of it a minute. The great question which that case decided, which shocked the moral sense of the American people was—what? That Dred Scott was not a citizen, and the court in effect said that persons of African descent had no rights that white men were bound to respect. That proposition overwhelmed with defeat for a generation a great political party and helped bathe our country in blood. The Republican party, it would seem, proposes now to pass this bill, and bring its legislative influence to bear upon the Supreme Court of the United States—for what? In order that they may get from it a deliverance that there are 12,000,000 white and brown people, that we have succeeded in acquiring, who are not citizens, and have no rights that white men are bound to respect.

When I speak of rights, I mean legal rights, existing by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution—not provisions of the Constitution that are torn from it and thrown into a stump speech, made part of a peroration, and then called, forsooth, moral, inherent rights. I speak of rights in the sense that, when they exist, no person, no matter how poor or how weak or how ignorant, can be deprived of them. Why? Because if the legislature, either State or national, undertakes to pass a law that transcends the constitutional prohibitions, the person who suffers from that act has in the courts a remedy—a place to which he can go—where there will be asserted in his behalf rights written in the Constitution—not rights asserted in a stump speech or guaranteed only by a peroration—rights which can be asserted against the power of the Government itself, not rights that are enjoyed at the will of another. That is the distinction between a moral and a legal right.

I wish to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] said it would be "grotesque" to suggest that we could govern these people in accordance with the limitations of the Constitution. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] said it would be "impossible" to do so. It thus appears that we have reached a stage, when the leading statesmen of the Republican party stand up and say that unless they can construe the Constitution just as they like, to give them absolute, arbitrary, power, they are incapable of forming a plan of government to take care of these people now under our control.

I submit to those distinguished men that they had better not distrust so early their great abilities. It is a cause for chagrin, if our leaders lie down in the face of these difficulties and cry, "Incapable! Incapable!"

It is true that the difficulties are great, but I believe it to be perfectly feasible to deal with these possessions under constitutional limitations.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS.

Let me call attention to some of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution of which citizens of the States are hereafter to have a monopoly.

"Duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform." That is the provision we have now under discussion. Habeas corpus is not to be suspended. Is that so very grotesque? Is that impossible? Private property can not be taken except for public use and upon just compensation. No bill of attainder or ex post facto law to be passed. Would there be anything grotesque about that in the Philippine Archipelago? Or is it a fact that the American Congress wants to have in its hands the power to confiscate the property of the friars of the Catholic Church that is said by some people to be the cause of a great deal of this trouble in the archipelago? The Catholic Church, which, notwithstanding the fact that many of us may not believe in its doctrines, has on so many occasions, and in so many places, and in so many ways, carried forward the banner of education and been in many instances the pioneer of civilization as against barbarism. [Applause.]

No capitation or other direct tax unless in proportion to a census or enumeration. Is there anything grotesque there? No tax or duty on articles exported from any State, a regulation to secure the freedom of interstate commerce.

No law impairing the obligation of contracts. Are we to suppose that the protection of this clause is for us, and not for the people in those islands which we have acquired?

The trial of all crimes shall be by jury. Is there anything so very grotesque in that? Twenty-five per cent of the people of Puerto Rico are intelligent enough to govern themselves as well as we can govern them. Some one has said that would leave the administration of justice in the hands of twenty-five per cent of the people, but I am impressed with the idea that this would be as well and as safe as to leave it all in the hands of one man. The wild tribes in those islands of the sea, where they maintain tribal relations, can be governed entirely in harmony with the provisions of the Constitution, by maintaining their tribal relations, precisely as we govern our Indians. Is there anything grotesque or difficult about that—the elimination as an element of difficulty of every tribe, barbarous or savage, possibly three-fourths of the whole? If the gentleman from New York, or the gentleman from Massachusetts, means that it would be "grotesque" or "impossible" in the light of our history and the success we have had in governing the Indians, pushing them off from this continent into the Pacific Ocean, or in managing the negro problem, I would agree with him on that hypothesis. It may turn out hereafter to be "grotesque" and "impossible," because the history of the Republic discloses many things in this respect in which no honest man can feel any pride.

No bill of attainder or ex post facto law.

No capitation or other direct tax unless in proportion to census or enumeration.

No tax or duty on articles exported from any State.

No preference in interstate commerce.

No law impairing obligation of contracts.

Trial of crimes shall be by jury, held in State where committed; when not committed in a State at such place where Congress may by law have directed.

There shall be no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting free exercise thereof.

Freedom of speech or press not to be abridged.

The right to assemble and petition for redress of grievances and right to keep and bear arms shall not be abridged.

No soldier in time of peace to be quartered in any house without consent of the owner.

Every person is secured against unreasonable search.

Warrants must be upon probable cause and describe the place to be searched.

No person is to be held to answer for capital offense unless on presentment by grand jury; or be subject for same offense to be twice put in jeopardy; or be compelled to be a witness against himself; or be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Speedy trial shall be had before an impartial jury. The accused shall be informed of the nature of the accusations against him, confronted with the witnesses, have compulsory process for witnesses, and assistance of counsel for his defense.

Suits at common law where value exceeds $20 trial by jury shall be observed.

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

These are civil rights which now exist by constitutional provisions, but they do not exist, according to this proposition, for these subject people. Seventy-five millions of free people jealously guard, and would fight to the death to preserve these rights, but it seems very absurd and "grotesque" to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to even suggest that the unfortunate inhabitants of these islands which we have acquired, are entitled to any of them, except the high privilege of not being allowed to enslave each other. And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], the soil of whose State has been consecrated in the struggle for liberty by the blood of the "chattel," Crispus Attucks, insists that we have 12,000,000 people in our possession, and that it is "impossible" to govern them unless we deprive them of constitutional rights without which liberty and freedom are nothing but a name.

There is not a single right guaranteed by the Constitution, that can not be properly and legitimately enjoyed by the people in this archipelago and the people in Puerto Rico except possibly those provisions relating to trial by jury and presentment by grand jury; and the character of their intelligence is such as to indicate that it would be just as safe to trust the trial of a man charged with crime in Puerto Rico in the hands of a people twenty-five per cent of whom are intelligent as it would be to trust it in the hands of one man, sent down there by us, to mete out justice in his own way. [Applause.]

The attention of the House should here be called to this important fact. Citizenship in the American Union to the average man, I take it, implies certain conditions certain circumstances, and a certain status. The average man undoubtedly thinks of a citizen as a voting machine or as somebody to be elected to office, and voted for by somebody else. Please note the fact that the right of suffrage, and the right of holding office are not guaranteed to citizens under the Constitution. You need not be afraid to talk about these people in Puerto Rico, these Caucasians and white men, as citizens, because you fear that they may step up and undertake to outvote you, or that they may disturb the political equilibrium of the country, or that they may undertake to emulate some of our distinguished men and hold an office every time they can get a chance, of whom it has been well said that "few die and none resign." There is a vast distinction between civil and political rights.

I refer briefly to the authorities: "The word citizen in the Constitution of the United States conveys the idea of membership of a nation and nothing more. Women are citizens of the United States. The right of suffrage is not one of the necessary privileges of a citizen of the United States. The fourteenth amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. The United States did not add the right of suffrage to the privileges and immunities of citizenship, as they existed at the time the Constitution was adopted. Suffrage was not coextensive with citizenship in the States at the time of its adoption. It was not intended to make all citizens of the United States voters. The Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone, and the constitutions and laws of the several States which commit that important trust to men alone are not necessarily void." (Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wall., 178; United States vs. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 542; Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 15.)

Here is the proposition. Why be afraid of it? Do you want to eliminate the Constitution in order to impose a protective tariff upon your dependencies and for that reason alone? Let me make this suggestion: I submit to the Republicans whether or not the true theory of a protective tariff is not that it is imposed for the purpose of protecting our capital and our labor against foreign capital and foreign labor; protecting it against the labor and capital of aliens—aliens in birth, aliens in spirit, aliens in government, aliens in law, aliens in development, aliens in hopes, aliens in prospects, aliens in success, aliens in everything, and in whose hopes, whose prosperity, and whose success we have no legal interest whatever? That is the proper foundation of the protective tariff.

It is the protection of the American laborer against the laborer in any other land, under any other flag, who lives under any other government, under any other laws, governing himself in his own way, over whom we have and exercise no control.

What is here proposed? We take these people—we do not let them govern themselves as they did practically when they were dependents of Spain, but we take them—and we govern them according to our own sweet will, in our own way, in our own discretion, and then we impose upon them, our people, belonging to us—and if they are not citizens, they belong to us in more senses than one—our own people, who have no control over their institutions, who have no opportunity to protect themselves, who can not make or administer economic laws—we give them laws, we make them as we like, we apply them as we like, and then, if, under those circumstances they can succeed, we put our feet upon their necks and crush down our own people. I fully believe in, and adhere to, the principle of a protective tariff, but I utterly deny that it is in any sense properly predicable upon such a condition of things.

There is a vast, a glittering dream of empire. That it may be realized, plighted faith is to be broken, the Constitution trodden under foot, human rights ignored. Have a care, gentlemen, have a care. Even as you grasp it—

With hopes, that but allure to fly,
With joys, that vanish while he sips,
Like Dead Sea fruits, that tempt the eye,
But turn to ashes on the lips!

LEGAL PROPOSITIONS RELIED ON.

I now examine briefly some of the legal propositions relied on. The committee say, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says, and upon this proposition is based the report of the Ways and Means Committee:

In each and every case it has been thought necessary, in order to modify the otherwise unlimited powers of Congress, to make special provisions in the treaty by which the territory is acquired.

Now mark that language: It has been thought necessary to make provisions in the treaty in order to modify the otherwise unlimited powers of Congress.

So far as legislation with respect to these treaty-acquired territories has been had, it is to be attributed to the guaranties secured by the terms of the treaty.

The committee make that assertion half a dozen times in their report and my friend from Pennsylvania lovingly reiterates it in his speech. If that means anything it means that a treaty can control the action of Congress. That is one of their legal propositions. They say that treaties have been enacted for the purpose of limiting the powers of Congress. Here is what they say, in explaining adverse cases:

They had all to do with territory belonging to the United States acquired for purposes of statehood, and with respect to which the general and plenary powers of Congress—

Now, mark this. I notice the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee smiles. Let him wait and hear the authority I give him—with respect to which the general and plenary powers of Congress had been modified by treaty stipulations.

That is, the general and plenary powers of Congress can be modified by a treaty stipulation. If it should turn out, after examining the authorities, that an act of Congress would repeal a treaty, that proposition would simply be a legal absurdity.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman says that we are bound in our action toward Puerto Rico by the proclamation of General Miles.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; I do not claim that we are as a legal proposition.

Mr. PAYNE. Bound in good faith to carry it out. If that is true, why should we not be bound by a solemn treaty to carry it out in good faith?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is not a legal proposition. I say we are morally bound. Is not the gentleman able to recognize the distinction between a moral proposition and a legal one? Ask another question. I say here is a legal proposition which you set up in your report as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and as a legal proposition. Do not be afraid to look your logic in the face. You make it as a legal proposition, and you ask this Republican House to stand behind you on this, on the ground that a treaty controls the action of Congress as a legal proposition. That is what you say, and you give it as a reason for these cases that have been decided against you over and over again. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] gave it twice or three times in his speech. Now I will read, not from a portion of a stump speech, but from a decision which shows its utter absurdity as a legal proposition:

A treaty, then, is a law of the land, as an act of Congress is, whenever its provisions prescribe a rule by which the rights of the private citizen or subject may be determined. And when such rights are of a nature to be enforced in a court of justice, that court resorts to the treaty for a rule of decision for the case before it as it would to a statute.

But even in this aspect of the case there is nothing in this law which makes it irrepealable or unchangeable. The Constitution gives it no superiority over an act of Congress in this respect, which may be repealed or modified by an act of a later date. Nor is there anything in its essential character, or in the branches of the Government by which the treaty is made, which gives it this superior sanctity.

A treaty is made by the President and the Senate. Statutes are made by the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. The addition of the latter body to the other two in making a law certainly does not render it less entitled to respect in the matter of its repeal or modification than a treaty made by the other two.

In short, we are of opinion that, so far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation can become the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal.

(Head Money Cases, 112 U. S., 598–599.)

Now, where is your treaty that controls the action of Congress? [Applause.] Let me read again in order that it may be so plain "that he may run that readeth it."

The validity of this act, as already mentioned, is assailed as being in effect an expulsion from the country of Chinese laborers in violation of existing treaties between the United States and the Government of China, and of the rights vested in them under the laws of Congress. The objection that the act is in conflict with the treaties was earnestly pressed in the court below, and the answer to it constitutes the principal part of its opinion. (36 Fed. Rep., 431.) Here the objection made is that the act of 1888 impairs a right vested under the treaty of 1880, as a law of the United States, and the statutes of 1882 and of 1884, passed in execution of it.

It must be conceded that the act of 1888 is in contravention of express stipulations of the treaty of 1868 and of the supplemental treaty of 1880, but it is not on that account invalid or to be restricted in its enforcement. The treaties were of no greater legal obligation than the act of Congress. By the Constitution laws made in pursuance thereof and treaties made under the authority of the United States are both declared to be the supreme law of the land, and no paramount authority is given to one over the other. A treaty, it is true, is in the nature of a contract between nations, and is often merely promissory in its character, requiring legislation to carry its stipulations into effect. Such legislation will be open to future repeal or amendment. If the treaty operates by its own force, and relates to a subject within the power of Congress, it can be deemed in that particular only the equivalent of a legislative act, to be repealed or modified at the pleasure of Congress. In either case the last expression of the sovereign will must control.

See also Whitney vs. Robertson (124 U. S., 190); Horner vs. United States (143 U. S., 578); Fong Yue Ting vs. United States (149 U. S., 721).

What becomes of the main proposition of the committee? Ten or twelve lawyers set out in their report before the House, and try to make the House believe, that one of the reasons why dozens of these decisions have been rendered against their proposition is because a treaty controlled the action of Congress and therefore the Constitution applied. It is an absolute legal absurdity without any foundation. It is not worthy to be suggested in the discussion of a great constitutional question involving the rights of 12,000,000 people and millions yet unborn.

I proceed briefly and rapidly and call attention to some cases upon which the gentlemen rely. They have two sets of cases, upon which they rely for establishing the proposition that the Constitution does not extend ex proprio vigore outside of the limits of the forty-five States. They discuss it as though the Constitution by virtue of an act of Congress itinerated about the Territories, and landed, now here, and now there, by virtue of such act. They do not stop to think that an act of Congress, when it provides that the constitutional limitations apply to a Territory, has the force only of an act of Congress, and it is precisely the same as though the limitations were specified in the act, the Constitution being referred to only for the purpose of saving the clerical work of writing in the provisions in detail. The act itself under those circumstances is equally as subject to repeal as any other act of Congress.

Not to stop and discuss it here, my theory of the Constitution and the power of Congress thereunder briefly is this: I do not believe for a moment that Congress, the creature of the Constitution, is at any time, or in any place, superior to its creator. [Applause.] I believe that it sits here, and when it undertakes to pass any law in connection with a Territory or possession or any other subject, it passes it here under the ægis of the Constitution from which it derives its power and in which is contained the limitations which control in every instance its exercise.

I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] was in his seat, as in a few minutes I would like to tell him something about Daniel Webster that I think would be interesting to him. [Laughter.]

These two lines of cases are, first, those holding that residents of the District of Columbia and of the Territories are not citizens of a State, and therefore the District of Columbia and the Territories are not a part of the United States; and second, those which sustain the power of Congress, to create Territorial courts, which are courts other than those provided for by the Constitution, and the power of Congress to legislate for the Territories, which has been loosely described as plenary and unlimited, and therefore Congress is unrestrained by constitutional limitations in legislating for territory outside the limits of the forty-five States. If either branch of the proposition falls the whole proposition falls with it.

THE "STATE" CASES.

As to the first branch of the proposition: Their first case is Sere vs. Pitot (6 Cranch, 336). They say the court said:

The power of governing and legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and hold territory. Could this position be contested, the Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States." Accordingly we find Congress possessing and exercising the absolute and undisputed power of governing and legislating for the Territory of Orleans. Congress has given them a legislative, an executive, and a judiciary, with such powers as it has been their will to assign to these departments, respectively.

This was a case where the action was brought by an assignee of a chose in action, and the court definitely held, before they made the remark quoted by the committee, that the action could not be maintained, saying:

It is the opinion of the court that the plaintiffs had no right to maintain this suit in the district court against a citizen of the Orleans Territory, they being the assignees of persons who were also citizens of that Territory.

It is of so much importance to the people of Orleans to decide on the second objection that the court will proceed to consider that likewise.

Whether the citizens of the Territory of Orleans are to be considered as the citizens of a State, within the meaning of the Constitution, is a question of some difficulty which should be decided, should one of them sue in any of the circuit courts of the United States. The present inquiry is limited to a suit brought by or against a citizen of the Territory in the district court of Orleans.

Gentlemen have spent hours in this debate, endeavoring to demonstrate that the criticised expressions of the courts in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheat., 319) and Cross vs. Harrison (16 How., 201) precisely in point against their contention, are dicta. It was impossible for them to have read the opinion in Sere vs. Pitot without learning that their quotation was a dictum, yet they cite it with an air of authority and without an intimation of its real character. In Hepburn vs. Ellzey (2 Cranch., 414), which was a suit by a resident of the District of Columbia against a citizen of a State, it is true that the Supreme Court of the United States held that the plaintiff was not, within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution relating to jurisdiction, a citizen of a State, and therefore could not maintain his suit. They used on this point the language which they quote:

This depends on the act of Congress describing the jurisdiction of that court. That act gives jurisdiction to the circuit courts in cases between a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought and a citizen of another State. To support the jurisdiction in this case, therefore, it must appear that Columbia is a State.

On the part of the plaintiffs it has been urged that Columbia is a distinct political society, and is, therefore, "a State" according to the definitions of writers on general law.

This is true. But as the act of Congress obviously uses the word "State" in reference to that term as used in the Constitution, it becomes necessary to inquire whether Columbia is a State in the sense of that instrument. The result of that examination is a conviction that the members of the American Confederacy only are the States contemplated in the Constitution.

New Orleans vs. Winter (1 Wheaton, 93) (1816) was a suit by a resident of a Territory against a citizen of a State and the court said:

It has been attempted to distinguish a Territory from the District of Columbia; but the court is of opinion that this distinction can not be maintained. They may differ in many respects, but neither of them is a State in the sense in which that term is used in the Constitution. Every reason assigned for the opinion of the court, that a citizen of Columbia was not capable of suing in the courts of the United States under the judiciary acts, is equally applicable to a citizen of a Territory.

Barney vs. Baltimore (6 Wallace, 287) (1867) was a suit under the same clause by an assignee, the assignor residing in the District of Columbia. The court held that the assignment was colorable and fraudulent, therefore void, and, following Hepburn vs. Ellzey and New Orleans vs. Winter, held the action could not be maintained. Hepburn vs. Ellzey, it is seen, is the parent case.

The committee, in commenting upon these cases, make an assertion that is entirely without foundation. I do not say it is intentional. It may have been an inadvertence. I do say it is a palpable misstatement of what these cases hold.

These three cases simply hold, that a resident of a Territory, or of the District of Columbia, is not a resident of a State. The committee says:

Against the dictum of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake ought to be set off the express decision of the Supreme Court, when the very point was directly involved, that the term—

Now mark this—

"United States" in the Constitution does not include Territories.

The cases hold that a resident of the District of Columbia or a Territory was not a resident of a State. They do not hold that in such case he was not a resident of the "United States." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the contrary, let me read what the committee did not succeed in getting into their report from the opinion in Hepburn vs. Ellzey. After the court had discussed the proposition and had in effect reached the conclusion that a resident of the District of Columbia was not a citizen of a State, they said:

It is true—

Speaking of the same man they had just held was not a citizen of a State—that as citizens of the United States and of that particular District, which is subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, it is extraordinary that the courts of the United States, which are open to aliens and to citizens of every State in the Union, should be closed upon them. But this is a subject for legislation and not judicial construction.

So far as the term "United States" is defined in these cases it includes Territories.

There is your foundation case, in which the great Chief Justice says, that although a citizen of the District of Columbia, and not a citizen of a State, he was at the same time a "citizen of the United States." [Applause.]

The committee in their report did not give us the benefit of the whole opinion. Why search week after week and copy Professor Langdell's article in the Harvard Law Review? If they had taken the time when looking up the cases to read all the court said they would have saved themselves considerable trouble. [Laughter.]

We have Kent cited here by the gentleman from Illinois. I did not hear it, but I read it. We have Story cited here by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois. I heard it in the speech of the gentleman from New York. I now learn that Mr. Story was an eminent legal authority, a man of undoubted character and ability. I yield to no man either in the legal profession, or out of it, in my reverence for, and admiration of, those great lawyers, Mr. Justice Story and Mr. Justice Kent. I could not but remember however that it is not six weeks since the gentlemen who now come hugging Story up in their arms as a repository of the law were tumbling over themselves in their unnecessary haste to tread him under foot and voted him down as an authority. [Laughter and applause.]

Kent and Story both state in general terms the proposition relied on. I understand the gentleman from Illinois, when he read the extract, read it very eloquently, with that grace of elocution and diction of which he is preeminently capable and he is a man of ability. Kent's Commentaries were written in 1827, and he cites as authority to sustain his text Hepburn vs. Ellzey (1805) and New Orleans vs. Winter (1816). In 1833 Judge Story wrote his commentaries, and whom do you suppose he relies upon as authority for his text? Kent's Commentaries. When Hepburn vs. Ellzey fails on the broad question, this great structure of authority fails with it. Although I have great respect and admiration for Mr. Justice Kent and Mr. Justice Story, I suppose it is possible for these distinguished men to be overruled by subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, especially so when the court has the assistance of discussion by eminent counsel on each side of the case—an advantage which no elementary writer has. I have reached Daniel Webster. I do not see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] in his seat.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] in his reply to his colleague [Mr. MCCALL] called attention to the fact that the latter gentleman in his speech did not cite from the speech of Daniel Webster an extract, which he put into his report, as a minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] to say that Mr. Webster was not discussing this proposition at that time. He arraigned his colleague for inserting the quotation in his report and intimated that it was purposely omitted from his speech. The omission was an inadvertence. I do not see the gentleman in his seat; but I have the record in my hand. With the record in my hand I make the assertion that Daniel Webster was discussing this proposition. I say on this floor, to the country, and to the people of Massachusetts that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] had no right to arraign his colleague for any act of omission or commission. His attack was unjustifiable and uncalled for.

I propose to read what Daniel Webster said in 1848. If any man wants to challenge it now is his time to do it; he will not bother me any by an interruption. If any man who has read that speech is disposed to challenge the accuracy of the statement I make, let him stand up and do so and I will read the whole speech to him. [Laughter.]

Webster was making a speech upon the prosecution of the Mexican war. He took the ground in that speech that the war was a war for the acquisition of territory. He was discussing the precise question pending before this House now, what they would do with the territory after they had acquired it by war. I will read what he said:

I think it is nothing else than the fear of executive power that commits us to the support of this war—for the acquisition of territory.

Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts undertook to stand here, if I understood him aright, and say that this subject was not under discussion when Daniel Webster made the speech to which I am calling attention.

Then he goes on to discuss the consequences of the acquisition of territory, and what would be done with it after it had been acquired. I am astonished that, even for the purpose of making an attack on his colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] would make the assertion that I understood him to make on this floor. What did Webster say?

An arbitrary government may have territorial governments in distant possessions, because an arbitrary government—may rule its distant territories by different laws and different systems.

What are you proposing to do here? Precisely that thing. That is what you have asserted as your reason for this bill. You are going to start in with Puerto Rico. You will have a different scheme for the Archipelago. Does anybody deny it? How many members have so stated on this floor? They can not deny it unless they amend the record. What does Webster say about that proposition?

Russia may govern the Ukraine and the Caucasus and Kamtschatka by different codes or ukases. We can do no such thing.

There is the witness called in by the Ways and Means Committee and by this professor of law, whose name has been introduced here as a makeweight for the committee. I will call attention in a moment to the statement which this professor makes as a part of the foundation of this whole theory.

There is the "Godlike Daniel's" statement. I do not know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts would writhe in his seat if he heard it, and I do not know whether the "Godlike Daniel" will turn over in his grave when he learns that it has been repeated; but it is the solemn truth and so it will stand. It is true he makes the sweeping assertion in another debate, at one point, that the Constitution does not extend to the Territories, but in the same debate, when his theory is tested by a concrete illustration, it fell to the ground by his own admission. Witness this colloquy with Mr. Underwood:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say that we are bound, in legislating for the Territories as well as for the States, scrupulously to observe every principle and provision of the Constitution, for we have taken an oath to support it. If we, through inadvertence or design, violate it, then the executive and judicial departments, whether in the States or Territories, and who are called upon to apply and enforce our acts upon the people, are bound by their oaths to disregard everything condemned by the Constitution. Let me put a case by way of illustration. Ours is a Protestant country, in the main, while New Mexico and California are Catholic countries. Suppose we provide by our legislation that nobody shall be appointed to office there who professes the Catholic religion. What do we do by an act of this sort?

Mr. WEBSTER. We violate the Constitution which says that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office.

His answer clearly would not be correct if the Constitution does not control the action of Congress in the Territories. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] informed us that he had read the whole of this debate. If so, he knew of the existence of this fatal admission. Did he give us the information? There is the witness introduced by the committee squarely contradicting himself.

I do not stop to waste any time upon the suggestion that Daniel Webster, in an argument in court, reported by the reporter, is said to have made certain remarks in support of this proposition. I am a country lawyer. I come from the backwoods. I do not have much business to do where I am. I try a few cases in the law courts every year, anywhere from 10 to 19, for the last ten or fifteen years. [Laughter.] I think I can safely say that each case has been reported and the court reporter has made an abstract of my brief. Upon none of the abstracts would I risk my reputation as a lawyer, on his statement of what I said. [Laughter.]

There is not a lawyer in this House who does not know this statement to be true. Yet Daniel Webster's argument in a law case reported by somebody, who may have modified it, or analyzed it, or condensed it, is cited here as the law to determine the rights of 12,000,000 people. I am coming to a citation that will interest the chairman of the committee. But I must take these matters in their order. The law on this point has grown up chronologically, one case following another. Fleming vs. Page (9 Howard) simply held that the port of Tampico was a foreign port; and why? Because it was in the occupation of the forces of the United States, and never was ceded to the United States. But what did the court say in that case? Briefly, they said, referring to the Florida case:

For after Florida had been ceded to the United States, and the forces of the United States had taken possession of Pensacola, it was decided by the Treasury Department that goods shipped from Pensacola—before an act of Congress was passed erecting it into a collection district and authorizing the appointment of a collector, were liable to duty.

Before an act of Congress was passed. You are about to pass one, and if you get it passed—I do not think you will, but you are trying to—if you get it passed you will have an act of Congress creating a collection district, and if what the court said in Page vs. Fleming is true it will then be subject to the provisions of the Constitution. That is the opinion of Judge Taney. By the way, I should say right here a word about an opinion that has been referred to rendered by the appraiser, the Hon. Henderson M. Somerville, a great judge—and I have no doubt he is. I have no doubt he is an able lawyer. His opinion was cited here for the purpose of establishing the validity of this power that the committee invoke under this bill. What does that decision hold? I will not stop to read it. A gentleman on the committee thought it sustained this bill until I called his attention to the fact that it did not. By the way, before I get through with this speech I have no doubt I may, in a feeble way, illustrate a certain passage of the Scripture which reads as follows:

He that is first in his own cause seemeth just; but his neighbor cometh and searcheth him.

I am the "neighbor." [Laughter and applause.]

The decision is by Judge Somerville; I understand they do not propose to quote it. I should not think they would. What does it hold? It holds that the military conditions, that are the residuum of the Spanish war, in connection with Puerto Rico, which authorize the President of the United States by proclamation to create tariffs, are still in existence and can be superseded or terminated only "by affirmative legislation" on the part of Congress. He expressly says that he does not undertake to say what power Congress has. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] labored under a different impression yesterday. This is the opinion, however. I have it here, and I have read it from the copy in the hands of the gentleman from Minnesota.

I wish to call attention to the assertion of the chairman of the committee that Judge Cooley sustains his position. I submit, inasmuch as they introduce Judge Cooley here, and perhaps, independently of that introduction, he is entitled to this statement from me, that no man during the last twenty-five years has undertaken to write upon the fundamental law of this country, who is entitled to as much weight, and as much credit, as Thomas M. Cooley, ex-chief justice of Michigan. [Applause.] The chairman of the committee, by a garbled quotation—note what I say, a garbled quotation—I will ask you to challenge that statement, if you desire, after I get through with it—the chairman of the committee, inadvertently, I presume, by a garbled quotation from Cooley, undertakes to make the House believe that Thomas M. Cooley sustains the proposition that they rely upon in this bill, and he quotes this:

The Constitution was made for the States, not for Territories. It confers power to govern Territories, but in exercising this the United States is a sovereign dealing with dependent territory according as in its wisdom shall seem politic, wise, and just, having regard to its own interests, as well as to those of the people of the Territories.

That sounds pretty well, does it not? That looks as though Thomas M. Cooley meant what the gentleman claimed he meant. Let me go right on and read the very next sentence, which the chairman of the committee, anxious under his duty as a leader of the Republican majority to give to this House the law as it is, did not read. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Is is believed, however, that the securities for personal liberty which are incorporated in the Constitution were intended as limitations of its power over any and all persons who might be within its jurisdiction anywhere, and that citizens of the Territories as well as citizens of the States may claim the benefit of their protection.

How does that sound? [Applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. That sounds all right.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Wait a minute. There is more of it which you will not like so well.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I like that.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If you care to adopt the proposition that I am now about to read from Cooley, you will take your bill under your arm and walk out with it. I am not reading part of this, I am reading it all. Do not labor under any misapprehension.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, I am not alarmed at all. The sound is not hurting me.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not hurt you a mite?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; it does not.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. You can hear it all without any trouble?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Continue to listen. [Prolonged laughter.]

In this dependence of the Territories upon the central Government there is some outward resemblance to the condition of the American colonies under the British Crown; but there are some differences which are important, and indeed vital. The first of these is that the Territorial condition is understood under the Constitution to be merely temporary and preparatory, and the people of the Territories while it continues are assured of the right to create and establish State institutions for themselves so soon as the population shall be sufficient and the local conditions suitable; while the British colonial system contained no promise or assurance of any but a dependent government indefinitely. The second is that above given, that the people of the American Territories—are guaranteed all the benefits of the principles of constitutional right which protect life, liberty, and property—

Now, this is not in a stump speech or in a peroration. Hear what he says—and may defend them under the law, even as against the action of the Government itself.

Cooley, Principles of Constitutional Law, 3d ed., pages 37–38.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

How does that sound?

Mr. GROSVENOR. That sounds all right.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is precisely in the teeth of the proposition that these gentlemen undertake to establish here. I will now read to you the rest of this citation, also a part which the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means Committee did not read, and which my friend on the right [Mr. GROSVENOR] would not have quoted if he had:

While in the colonies these principles were the subject of dispute, and, if admitted, would be within the control of an absolute imperial legislature, which might overrule them at will. There is also a difference in respect to taxation, which, though not so striking, is still important. The Territories levy their own taxes for all local purposes, and they are never taxed separately for national purposes, but only as parts of a whole country and under the same rules and for the same purposes as are the States.

Precisely in point against your contention. Has the committee been frank with the House? Can this branch of their proposition stand upon their own authorities?

TERRITORIES AND TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Now, to the cases that involve the branch relating to Territories and Territorial courts. It is said that inasmuch as Congress creates Territorial courts that are not expressly provided for in the Constitution, they are either created under that clause of the Constitution which enables it to enact all needful rules and regulations "respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," or else under this tremendous power which invests Congress with the authority of the National Government and of the State, and therefore enables it to act without limitation, without control, and without constraint, or under both powers, and therefore that in acting for the Territories, Congress is not hindered or controlled by the limitations of the Constitution; its power is plenary and absolute.

This is their second proposition. I will not stop to read in detail the cases. I summarize them generally by that statement, and I think fairly. I will now review what the Supreme Court of the United States has said, in relation to the character of these Territorial governments, and courts, for the purpose of showing to the House that this branch of their case, which they have spent hours, and hours, to establish, has no legitimate weight in determining this tremendous proposition, as the existence of such unlimited powers, is not recognized. In Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, 511) (1828), the court said, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall:

They do not, however, participate in political power; they do not share in government until Florida shall become a State. In the meantime Florida continues to be a Territory of the United States, governed by virtue of that clause in the Constitution which empowers Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Perhaps the power of governing territory belonging to the United States which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self-government may result necessarily from the fact that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States. The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned.

Mr. Justice Nelson, in Benner vs. Porter, (9 How., 242), said:

They are not organized under the Constitution, nor subject to its complex distribution of the powers of government, as the organic law; but are the creations, exclusively, of the legislative department, and subject to its supervision and control. Whether or not there are provisions in that instrument which extend to and act upon these Territorial governments it is not now material to examine. We are speaking here of those provisions that refer particularly to the distinction between Federal and State jurisdiction.

The Territorial courts, therefore, were not courts in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government could be deposited.

In a dictum the court, in Clinton vs. Engelbrecht (13 Wallace, 434, 1871), said:

There is no supreme court of the United States, nor is there any district court of the United States in the sense of the Constitution, in the Territory of Utah. The judges are not appointed for the same terms nor is the jurisdiction which they exercise part of the judicial power conferred by the Constitution of the General Government. The courts are the legislative courts of the Territories, created in virtue of that clause which authorizes Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territories belonging to the United States.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in 1873, held that—

The powers thus exercised by the Territorial legislatures are nearly as extensive as those exercised by any State legislature; and the jurisdiction of the Territorial courts is collectively coextensive with and correspondent to that of the State courts—a very different jurisdiction from that exercised by the circuit and district courts of the United States. In fine, the Territorial, like the State courts, are invested with plenary municipal jurisdiction. (Hornbuckle vs. Toombs, 18 Wall., 655-656.)

The court had not yet had occasion to accurately state the constitutional power with reference to Territories, and therefore had contented itself, with the sweeping general statements which my friends have mistaken for the law. In this last case they begin to narrow it down by comparing Territorial with State courts.

Mr. Justice Clifford, in 1879, in City of Panama (101 U. S., 460), again states the proposition in a general way:

Courts of the kind, whether created by an act of Congress or a Territorial statute, are not, in strictness, courts of the United States; or, in other words, the jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of the judicial power defined by the third article of the Constitution, but it is conferred by Congress in the execution of the general power which the legislative department possesses to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the public territory and other public property.

As late as 1898, in an opinion by Mr. Justice Brown, in Ulter vs. Franklin (172 U. S., 423), we have an accurate summary of the legal effect of all these cases. He says:

This court has repeatedly held that Congress has full legislative power over the Territories, as full as that which a State legislature has over its municipal corporations.

As full as what?

As full as that which a State legislature has over its municipal corporations.

Is there a man who ever saw a law book, or heard of a law school, who does not know that the States are controlled, by the constitutions of the States, and of the United States, in legislating upon their municipal corporations? And a judge of the Supreme Court says, in 1898, that Congress has that same power—no more, and no less. Is it necessary for me to go into the history of the law, when the court says it has been "repeatedly" so held? Instead of holding the power of Congress to be unlimited, by necessary inference, it holds that in legislating for the Territories, Congress is subject to the constitutional limitations. Inasmuch as this branch also is absolutely essential to their main proposition, what becomes of the main proposition when the branch utterly fails?

I do not know whether that decision was rendered three days after the argument or not. It seems that in Loughborough vs. Blake, to which I am now about to call your attention for a moment, my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY], in the exercise of a commendable industry, has discovered that the case was argued on a Tuesday and decided on a Friday, and therefore it is not entitled to any weight before the House of Representatives. [Laughter.] I should like to have the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] inform an eager and expectant profession how long a case must be kept on ice, before the law is good, when it is pronounced. [Laughter.] How many days, in his judgment, would be the limit? Now, that is a most singular proposition. He is a very bright man, and a very able man—I think one of the ablest in this House—and this only shows the exigencies of the case, the doubts that inhere in the proposition, when such suggestions are made for disposing of what they call a dictum.

A few words as to this case, so much discussed in this debate. Chief Justice Marshall there said:

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

It is now said that this statement of the law by the learned Chief Justice was a dictum; that the case could have been decided upon another ground suggested in the opinion, and therefore the principal theory upon which the opinion is unquestionably based is not good law. It is true that he did refer to the other ground, in three lines, as follows:

If the general language of the Constitution should be confined to the States, still the sixteenth paragraph of the eighth section gives to Congress the power of exercising "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever within this district."

It is also true that the opinion is saturated from beginning to end with the other proposition, which is so fatal to the contention of the committee. This extract is an illustration:

If it be said that the principle of uniformity established in the Constitution secures the District from oppression in the imposition of indirect taxes, it is not less true that the principle of apportionment, also established in the Constitution, secures the District from any oppressive exercise of the power to lay and collect direct taxes. (Ibid., page 325.)

In this connection, I notice the assertion of Professor Langdell, of the Harvard Law School, in his article in the Harvard Law Review (which seems to have been the foundation for a number of the speeches in support of this bill). He says:

It is however only a dictum, as the learned Chief Justice himself admits.

I wrote the learned gentleman, asking him to point out to me the place where the Chief Justice made this admission. In answer he said he did not say that he "expressly" admitted it to be a dictum, and then argued that from his theory of the opinion it was a dictum.

This was all the basis the learned gentleman had for his naked and unequivocal assertion, that the Chief Justice had admitted that the reasons given for a decision were not in fact the reasons. You will not be surprised when I say I have not felt at liberty to accept without investigation the conclusions of any of the gentlemen. Such assertions do not appear to me justifiable in the discussion of grave constitutional questions.

I take no time to discuss this real estate proposition invented by Professor Langdell, upon which my friends rely as a reason for the decisions relating to the District of Columbia—that is, the District of Columbia was once a part of Maryland and Virginia, and while the real estate of the Territory was a part of Maryland and Virginia it was covered by the ægis of the Constitution, as it was then a part of the United States. They do not know whether it carried the Constitution along with it when it became the District of Columbia, but they are under the illusion that the Constitution is ambulatory; that it inheres in some way in the soil, or becomes attached to the soil. A kind of a porous plaster proposition. [Great laughter.] They say it would be difficult to tell why it does not, but has it not occurred to them that it would be more difficult to tell why it does? It is sufficient to say that this novel and interesting proposition has never been suggested, directly or indirectly, by the United States Supreme Court in any of its repeated decisions where it has held that the Constitution applied to the District of Columbia, in effect, ex proprio vigore.

The impression is sought to be created that this alleged dictum in Loughborough vs. Blake stands isolated and alone, and has never since been recognized by the United States Supreme Court, as law. The contrary is true. Its reasoning has several times been recognized as correct. In 1868 Mr. Justice Swayne, in Pacific

Insurance Company vs. Soule (7 Wall., 446), cited this case as authority for the statement that "it has been held that Congress may require direct taxes to be laid and collected in the Territories as well as the States." Note the point, "in the Territories as well as the States," the specific proposition held by this alleged dictum. In 1871, in Day vs. Buffington (3 Clifford, 386), Mr. Justice Clifford laid down this proposition:

Undoubtedly the power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises is coextensive with the territory of the United States, but when properly construed it does not interfere with the power of the States to levy taxes for the support of their own governments, nor is the exercise of that power by the States an exercise of any portion of the power that is granted by the Federal Government—and cited first Loughborough vs. Blake as sustaining it. That the Territories, for the purposes of taxation, which is the precise question before us now, were a part of the "United States" seemed to him undoubted.

As late as 1885, the Supreme Court of the United States, in a unanimous opinion by Mr. Justice Gray, expressly declare that this alleged dictum was, in fact, the precise point decided. They say:

The objection taken in argument, that the act of March 3, 1877, is unconstitutional because it provides that the tax upon all lands within the District of Columbia, * * * is founded on a misunderstanding of the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 317). The point there decided was that an act of Congress laying a direct tax throughout the United States in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the Constitution might comprehend the District of Columbia.

(Gibbons vs. District of Columbia, 116 U. S., 407.)

That is to say, fifteen years ago, it was believed that for the purposes of taxation the term "United States" included the District of Columbia.

It is unfortunate that the United States Supreme Court did not have the benefit of the learning and research of this new school of constitutional lawyers. They would not have made, perhaps, a statement of the law, that does not now appear to be orthodox.

He says what? The gentlemen on the other side contend that this case only holds that Congress had the exclusive power to assess taxes for the District of Columbia. What did Justice Gray, speaking of those peculiar conditions, say?

That the act of Congress laying a direct tax throughout the United States in proportion to the census directed to be taken by the Constitution might comprehend the District of Columbia.

But who is likely to know best what Loughborough vs. Blake decided? Professor Langdell, of the Law Review, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, any of my distinguished, and able friends, or the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose business it is to pass upon the arguments upon either side, and to lay down the law of the land as it is, without reference to political exigencies, conditions, and circumstances? If Loughborough vs. Blake is the law of the land, this bill is clearly unconstitutional.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CASES.

In this connection I review the cases which hold that the Constitution controls Congress, while legislating for the District of Columbia. While it is true that in 1871 an act was passed extending the Constitution to the District of Columbia, none of the cases give either that, as reason, or Professor Langdell's discovery that it was once a part of Maryland and Virginia, for so holding. On the contrary, they appear to so hold on general principles.

In 1821, in discussing the power of Congress to establish a lottery in the District of Columbia, the court (Mr. Chief Justice Marshall) held:

In the enumeration of the powers of Congress, which is made in the eighth section of the first article, we find that of exercising exclusive legislation over such District as shall become the seat of Government. This power, like all others which are specified, is conferred on Congress as the legislature of the Union; for, strip them of that character, and they would not possess it. In no other character can it be exercised. In legislating for the District they necessarily preserve the character of the legislature of the Union; for it is in that character alone that the Constitution confers on them this power of exclusive legislation.

(Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 424.)

Since Congress legislates in the same forms and in the same character, in virtue of powers of equal obligation, conferred in the same instrument, when exercising its exclusive powers of legislation, as well as when exercising those which are limited, we must inquire whether there be anything in the nature of this exclusive legislation which necessarily confines the operation of the laws made in virtue of this power to the place with a view to which they are made.

(Ibid., 426.)

In this case Webster, of counsel, insisted:

That Congress had not the power, under the Constitution, of establishing a lottery in the District of Columbia for municipal purposes, and of forcing the sale of tickets throughout the Union, in contravention of the State laws—conceding that as a general proposition the Constitution operated, but insisting that the Constitution did not give this particular power. That the court took the same view is clear from their reference in the opinion to his position.

Second. Is the law constitutional?

If the first question be answered in the affirmative, it will become necessary to consider the second. (Ibid., 441.)

The case turned upon the first question.

In 1887 Mr. Justice Harlan, in Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 548, 549, 550), stated the law as follows:

The contention of the Government is that the Constitution does not require that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to the people of the District of Columbia; that the original provision that when a crime was not committed within any State "the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed," had, probably, reference only to offenses committed on the high seas; that in adopting the sixth amendment the people of the States were solicitous about trial by jury in the States and nowhere else, leaving it entirely to Congress to declare in what way persons should be tried who might be accused of crime on the high seas and in the District of Columbia, etc.

* * * * * * *

Upon a careful examination of this position we are of opinion that it can not be sustained without violence to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. * * *

In Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 154) it was taken for granted that the sixth amendment of the Constitution secured to the people of the Territories the right of trial by jury in criminal prosecutions; and it had been previously held in Webster vs. Reid (11 How., 437, 460) that the seventh amendment secured to them a like right in civil actions at common law. We can not think that the people of this District have, in that regard, less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

Mr. Justice Field, in discussing an analogous question in 1889, in Geoffrey vs. Riggs (133 U. S., 268), said:

*This article is not happily drawn. It leaves in doubt what is meant by "States of the Union." * * * The term is used in general jurisprudence and by writers on public law as denoting organized political societies with an established government. Within this definition the District of Columbia, under the Government of the United States, is as much a State as any of those political communities which compose the United States. Were there no other Territory under the Government of the United States, it would not be questioned that the District of Columbia would be a State within the meaning of international law; and it is not perceived that it is any less a State within that meaning because other States and other territory are also under the same Government.*

Mr. Justice Gray, speaking for the court in 1898, in Capital Traction Company vs. Hoff (174 U. S., 5), gives the result of all the preceding cases, and emphatically holds in effect, on general principles, without the assistance of any enabling statute, that the constitutional limitations restrain Congress in legislating for the District of Columbia. He says:

1. The Congress of the United States, being empowered by the Constitution "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever" over the seat of the National Government, has the entire control over the District of Columbia for every purpose of government, national or local. It may exercise within the District all legislative powers that the legislature of a State might exercise within the State; and may vest and distribute the judicial authority in and among courts and magistrates, and regulate judicial proceedings before them as it may see fit, so long as it does not contravene any provision of the Constitution of the United States. (Kendall vs. United States (1838), 12 Pet., 524, 619; Mattingly vs. District of Columbia (1878), 97 U. S., 687, 690; Gibbons vs. District of Columbia (1886), 116 U. S., 404, 407.)

It is beyond doubt, at the present day, that the provisions of the Constitution of the United States securing the right of trial by jury, whether in civil or in criminal cases, are applicable to the District of Columbia. (Webster vs. Reid, 1850, 11 How., 437, 460; Callan vs. Wilson, 1888, 127 U. S., 540, 550; Thompson vs. Utah, 1898, 170 U. S., 343.)

CROSS VS. HARRISON.

I have a few words now to say about the case of Cross vs. Harrison (16 How., 201, 1853), and I shall say some things about that which have not been said. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] said some things, that had not been said. He has been engaged in a very extensive research, and he discovered that the treaty that ceded California to the United States contained a provision that made, in terms, that territory a part of the United States, and he insisted, that for that reason, that decision was justified. Bear this in mind, and I shall only read briefly from Cross vs. Harrison. This is the case nearest in point. It is flatly against the contention of the committee.

I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. MOODY] on the floor, if he pretended that the opinion in that case, gave that as a reason why they held that California became a part of the United States, and he said he did not. I had read the case and I knew it was not there. I have since read the briefs of the counsel. The brief of the counsel for the United States does not state it. He did not rely upon it, and did not mention it either directly or indirectly. The brief of the counsel for the plaintiff cites the Florida treaty, the Louisiana treaty, and a number of other treaties, but does not refer to this recently discovered peculiarity in the treaty ceding California, and I submit that there is no foundation for the assertion that the opinion in that case was based upon any such technical proposition.

The committee in their report handle this case of Cross vs. Harrison with gloves. They say:

To the same effect, upon analysis, is the case of Cross vs. Harrison (16 Howard, 166). In that case the single question involved was the right of a military governor to collect duties prior and subsequent to the ratification of the treaty whereby California became a part of the United States.

Exercising belligerent rights, a military governor, during the war with Mexico, had levied and collected duties at the port of San Francisco. This he continued to do subsequent to the ratification of the treaty and down until the time when Congress created a collection district and the collector entered upon his duties. It was contended that during all this time no authority existed for the collection of duties, and that, therefore, their collection was unlawful. But the court said:

"Our conclusion, from what has been said, is that the civil government of California, organized as it was from a right of conquest, did not cease or become defunct in consequence of the signature of the treaty or from its ratification. We think it was continued over a ceded conquest without any violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States, and that until Congress legislated for it the duties upon foreign goods imported into San Francisco were legally demanded and lawfully received by Mr. Harrison, the collector of the port, who received his appointment, according to instructions from Washington, from Governor Mason."

It will be observed that while the committee have given us the conclusion "from what has been said," they take fine care not to inform the House "what has been said" as the foundation for this conclusion. This care is wise, as the reasoning is directly against them. Some specimens of "what has been said" will be instructive. The court said:

By the ratifications of the treaty California became a part of the United States, and as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce, it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage. * * *

This government de facto will, of course, exercise no power inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land. For this reason no import duties can be levied in California on articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, as no such duties can be imposed in any other part of our Union on the productions of California. Nor can new duties be charged in California upon such foreign productions as have already paid duties in any of our ports of entry, for the obvious reason that California is within the territory of the United States.

This statement, it will be seen, fully covers the case under discussion:

Third. Although the Constitution of the United States extends to California.

* * * * * * *

But after the ratification of the treaty California became a part of the United States, or a ceded, conquered territory. (Ibid., page 191.)

* * * * * * *

The best test of the correctness of what has just been said is this: That if such goods had been landed there duty free, they could not have been shipped to any other port in the United States without being liable to pay duty. (Ibid., page 192.)

* * * * * * *

In confirmation of what has been said in respect to the power of Congress over this Territory, and the continuance of the civil government established as a war right, until Congress acted upon the subject, we refer to two of the decisions of this court, in one of which it is said in respect to the treaty by which Florida was ceded to the United States: "This treaty is the law of the land, and admits the inhabitants of Florida to the enjoyment of the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States." It is unnecessary to inquire whether this is not their condition, independently of stipulation. They do not, however, participate in political power; they do not share in the government until Florida shall become a State. (Ibid., page 194.)

*By the ratifications of the treaty, California became a part of the United States. And as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce, it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage. * * *

Shall one, then, be permitted to land goods in any part of the United States not in a collection district because he has voluntarily gone there with his vessel where an entry of his goods can not be made? * * *

It having been shown that the ratifications of the treaty made California a part of the United States, and that as soon as it became so the Territory became subject to the acts which were in force to regulate foreign commerce with the United States, after those had ceased which had been instituted for its regulation as a belligerent right.* (Ibid., page 198.) * * *

*By the last foreign goods, as they are enumerated, are made dutiable. They are not so because they are brought into a collection district, but because they are imported into the United States. * * *

The right claimed to land foreign goods within the United States at any place out of a collection district, if allowed, would be a violation of that provision in the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. Indeed, it must be very clear that no such right exists, and that there was nothing in the condition of California to exempt importers of foreign goods into it from the payment of the same duties which were chargeable in other ports of the United States. * * *

The plaintiffs have no claim for damages against the defendant in justice or equity. They paid duties to which the United States had a rightful claim, and no more than the law required.*

That opinion is twenty pages in length. Eighteen pages of it is devoted to the demonstration of the proposition involved in the reasoning just indicated. Cross vs. Harrison, upon that general reasoning, not in cases precisely in point, has been cited in five subsequent cases in the United States courts. As to the power to impose duties, collect revenues by the Commander in Chief in conquered territory it is cited and approved in The Amy Warrick (2 Sprague, 154), Hamilton vs. Dillon (21 Wall., 87), New Orleans vs. Steamship Company (20 Wall., 394), and generally on that point by Dow vs. Johnson (100 U. S., 183), Coleman vs. Tennessee (97 U. S., 536).

In no instance has its reasoning or authority been questioned or denied. Under these circumstances, this case should control the action of the House, and make the passage of this bill impossible.

TERRITORIAL AND TERRITORIAL COURT CASES.

Moreover, there is an uninterrupted line of decisions which hold that the constitutional limitations are operative upon Congress whenever it undertakes to legislate for the Territories, and therefore outside of the "United States," as it is attempted to be narrowly defined. In no instance which I shall cite, does the court base its opinion, in whole or in part, upon this absurd pretense that a treaty limits the power of Congress, or upon the suggestion that the Constitution itinerates to a Territory, by an act of Congress.

If they are good law, then the Constitution restrains Congress in legislating for Puerto Rico and this bill is unconstitutional. In the Dred Scott case (19 How., 615) (1856), Mr. Justice Curtis, in his dissenting opinion, said:

If, then, this clause does contain a power to legislate respecting the territory, what are the limits of that power?

To this I answer that, in common with all the other legislative powers of Congress, it finds limits in the express prohibitions on Congress not to do certain things: that, in the exercise of the legislative power, Congress can not pass an ex post facto law or bill of attainder; and so in respect to each of the other prohibitions contained in the Constitution.

In 1878 Mr. Chief Justice Waite said:

2. As to the challenges by the accused.

By the Constituiton of the United States (Amendment VI) the accused was entitled to a trial by an impartial jury.

(Reynolds vs. United States, 98 U. S., 154.)

The Constitution gives the accused the right to a trial at which he should be confronted with the witnesses against him. "Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids any such legislation.

Ibid., 162.

In 1879 the same Justice said:

The organic law of a Territory takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. It is obligatory on and binds the Territorial authorities; but Congress is supreme, and for the purpose of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

(National Bank vs. Yankton, 101 U. S., 133.)

In the same year Mr. Justice Clifford declared that—

Our Constitution in its operation is coextensive with our political jurisdiction, and wherever navigable waters exist within the limits of the United States it is competent for Congress to make provision for the exercise of admiralty jurisdiction, either within or outside of the States; and in organizing Territories Congress may establish tribunals for the exercise of such jurisdiction or they may leave it to the legislature of the Territory to create such tribunals.

(The City of Panama, 101 U. S., 460.)

Mr. Justice Matthews in 1884 stated that—

The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of Government, State and National; their political rights are franchises which they hold as privileges in the legislative discretion of the Congress of the United States. This doctrine was fully and forcibly declared by the Chief Justice, delivering the opinion of the court in National Bank vs. Yankton County (101 U. S., 129, Bk. 25, L. ed., 1046).

See also American Insurance Company vs. Canter, 1 Pet., 511); United States vs. Gratiot, 14 Pet., 526; Cross vs. Harrison, 16 How., 164; Dred Scott vs. Sanford, 19 How., 393.

(Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 44-45.)

In McAllister vs. United States (141 U. S., 179) (1890) Mr. Justice Harlan clearly states the law when he says:

In view of these and other provisions of that act, it is clear that the district court of Alaska was invested with the powers of a district court and a circuit court of the United States as well as with general jurisdiction to enforce in Alaska the laws of Oregon, so far as they were applicable and were not inconsistent with the act and the Constitution and laws of the United States.

This case well illustrates the unsubstantial character, from a legal standpoint, of what has been referred to in this discussion, here, and elsewhere, as inherent, fundamental, magna charta, or moral rights. An alleged inherent or fundamental right was asserted in that case. In relation to it the court said:

An elaborate argument, displaying much thought and extended research upon the part of counsel, has been made in support of the proposition that upon general principles lying at the foundation of our institutions the judicial power in the Territories, exercised as it must be for the protection of life, liberty, and property, ought to have the guaranties that are provided elsewhere within the political jurisdiction of the nation for the independence and security of judicial tribunals created by Congress under the third article of the Constitution.

We have no occasion to controvert the soundness of this view, so far as it rests on grounds of public policy. But we can not ignore the fact that while the Constitution has, in respect to judges of courts in which may be vested the judicial power of the United States, secured their independence, by an express provision that they may hold their offices during good behavior, and receive at stated times a compensation for their services that can not be diminished during their continuance in office, no such guaranties are provided by that instrument in respect to judges of courts created by or under the authority of Congress for a Territory of the United States. The absence from the Constitution of such guaranties for Territorial judges was no doubt due to the fact that the organization of governments for the Territories was but temporary and would be superseded when the Territories became States of the Union.

And, again:

It was insisted, at the bar, that a Territorial judge, appointed and commissioned for a given number of years, was entitled, of right, to hold his office during that term, subject only to the condition of good behavior. This view was not rested upon any specific clause of the Constitution, but was supposed to be justified by the genius and spirit of our free institutions, and the principles of the common law.

These "general principles lying at the foundation of our institutions" and "justified by the genius and spirit of our free institutions and the principles of common law" were very promptly disregarded, because they did not happen to be written as guaranties in the Constitution. This case clearly discloses the hollowness of the pretense, that proposes to deprive 12,000,000 of people of constitutional guaranties, and give them instead, "general principles lying at the foundation of our institutions." "Moral rights!" A rope of sand in time of need.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in 1890, in an opinion, said:

Under the general Territorial system, as expressed in the various organic acts, the power of taxation is absolute, save as restricted by the Constitution or Congressional enactments.

(Talbot vs. Silver Bow Company, 139 U. S., 441.)

In Talton vs. Mayers (163 U. S., 384) Mr. Justice White said, in 1895:

The fact that the Indian tribes are subject to the dominant authority of Congress, and that their powers of local self-government are also operated upon and restrained by the general provisions of the Constitution of the United States, completely answers the argument of inconvenience which was pressed in the discussion at bar.

In 1896, without undertaking to specify the source of the power he was discussing, Mr. Justice Brewer said:

Therefore either the seventh amendment to the Constitution or these acts of Congress, or all together, secured to every litigant in a common-law action in the courts of the Territory of Utah the right to trial by jury and nullified any act of its legislature which attempted to take from him anything which is of the substance of that right.

(American Publishing Company vs. Fisher, 166 U. S., 464.)

Mr. Chief Justice Fuller (1896) stated the law as follows:

In these three cases judgments were entered on verdicts returned by less than the whole number of jurors by which they were tried. It has been decided by this court that the Territorial act of March 10, 1892, permitting this to be done (Utah Laws, 1892, page 46), was invalid, because in contravention of the seventh amendment to the Constitution and the act of Congress of April 7, 1874 (18 Stat. at Large, 27, chapter 80).—(American Publishing Company vs. Fisher, 166 U. S., 464.)

Springville vs. Thomas, 166 U. S., 707–708.

The question involved was not matter of construction of the Territorial act, but the court discussed its validity; and this depended on the validity of the act of Congress giving it the scope which the court attributed to it.

In this there was error. In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases, and the act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule, and could not be treated as attempting to do so. (Ibid., pages 708–709.)

In 1897 Mr. Justice Harlan again, exhaustively discusses this question:

That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question. (Webster vs. Reid, 11 How., 437, 460; American Publishing Company vs. Fisher, 166 U. S., 464, 468; Springville vs. Thomas, 166 U. S., 707.)

* * * * * * *

It is equally beyond question that the provisions of the National Constitution relating to trials by jury for crimes and to criminal prosecutions apply to the Territories of the United States.

The contention of the Government was that the Constitution did not secure right of trial by jury to the people of the District of Columbia; that the original provision, that when a crime was not committed within any State the "trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed," had probably reference only to offenses committed on the high seas; that in adopting the sixth amendment the people of the States were solicitous about trial by jury in the States and nowhere else, leaving it entirely to Congress to declare in what way persons should be tried who might be accused of crime on the high seas and in the District of Columbia, and in places to be thereafter ceded for the purposes respectively of a seat of government, forts, magazines, arsenals, and dockyard; and consequently that that amendment should be deemed to have superseded so much of the third article of the Constitution as related to the trial of crimes by jury. That contention was overruled, this court saying:

"As the guaranty of a trial by jury in the third article implied a trial in that mode and according to the settled rules of the common law, the enumeration in the sixth amendment of the rights of the accused in criminal prosecutions is to be taken as a declaration of what those rules were, and is to be referred to the anxiety of the people of the States to have in the supreme law of the land, and, so far as the agencies of the General Government were concerned, a full and distinct recognition of those rules, as involving the fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property. This recognition was demanded and secured for the benefit of all the people of the United States, as well those permanently or temporarily residing in the District of Columbia as those residing or being in the several States.

"There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of this District may be lawfully deprived of the constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and property, especially of the privilege of trial by jury in criminal cases." "We can not think," the court further said, "that the people of this District have, in that regard, less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States."

Thompson vs. Utah, 170 U. S., 346, 347, 348.

To hold that a State could deprive him of his liberty by the concurrent action of a court and eight jurors would recognize the power of the State not only to do what the United States in respect of Thompson's crime could not at any time have done by legislation, but to take from the accused a substantial right belonging to him when the offense was committed. (Ibid., 351.)

In our opinion, the provision in the constitution of Utah providing for the trial in courts of general jurisdiction of criminal cases, not capital, by a jury composed of eight persons, is ex post facto in its application to felonies committed before the Territory became a State, because, in respect of such crimes, the Constitution of the United States gave the accused, at the time of the commission of his offense, the right to be tried by a jury of twelve persons, and made it impossible to deprive him of his liberty except by the unanimous verdict of such a jury. (Ibid., 355.)

Without having had an opportunity to exhaustively investigate this question, I believe that a fair analysis of the authorities upon which the committee rely, shows their contention to be unfounded. With Loughborough vs. Blake and Cross vs. Harrison, not only undenied or overruled, but directly, and indirectly approved, and affirmed; with no case holding that, for the purpose of imposing duties and imposts, the term "United States" is confined to the geographical area of the 45 States; and with an unbroken line of decisions holding that Congress, without the qualification or aid of treaties, or acts of Congress, legislates for the District of Columbia and the Territories, always subject to constitutional limitations and restrictions, I submit that the great weight of authority, sustains the proposition that the 12,000,000 of unfortunate people, whose destinies have been united with ours by the fortunes of war, can not be, and of right ought not to be, deprived of the civil rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution. Their weal or woe, and that of millions yet unborn, hangs trembling in the balance. The gravity of the situation transcends the power of the imagination. Upon the law and the facts the House should refuse to pass this bill. The honor, good faith, and integrity of the Republic are at stake.

We hear a great deal in these days about the glory of the Republic, the grandeur of its institutions, its unparalleled civilization. May the action of the House worthily exemplify these lofty sentiments. Then may our flag float over the whole Republic, in the Occident as well as the Orient, over the Pearl of the Antilles, and the Thousand Islands near far-off Cathay, upon land and sea, over schoolhouse and church, the emblem of our integrity and good faith, of liberty and freedom, of the inestimable blessings of a Christian civilization; of human rights guaranteed by the Constitution, not dependent upon the evanescent will of State or national legislatures, too often affrighted by their own shadows; of rights embedded in the Constitution, not floating like empty bubbles upon the perturbed surface of eloquent perorations; rights that are eternal and world-wide, not ephemeral and circumscribed; of opportunity, not oppression, and of regeneration, not repression. Thus, and only thus, will it be and ever remain, by the blessing and favor of Almighty God, the unsullied and untarnished symbol of our honor, our glory, and our splendor. [Prolonged applause.]

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH

HON. THOMAS M. JETT,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, February 26, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. JETT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am glad of the opportunity to enter my protest against the passage of this bill that the committee now has under consideration, and have had for more than one week. I have listened with much interest to the speeches made here since this discussion began. It has been an interesting discussion to me, as this is the first time, in the brief period in which I have participated in public affairs, that I have heard a question of this character discussed. I have spent much time and labor in investigating, first, as to the right to pass this bill, and, second, as to what the effect of its passage might be, and I have reached a conclusion in my own mind how I shall cast my vote when the roll is called upon the pending bill.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is of much consequence. I regard it as one of the most important bills, so far as the rights and interests of the American people are concerned, that has been before the Congress of the United States since the war between the States; and realizing the importance of this measure, I have endeavored to consider it fairly and impartially, with a view of reaching that conclusion that was in keeping with the institution of a republic as contradistinguished from an empire.

The position taken by the Republican party and its Administration in the support of this measure is one that is inconsistent with the traditions of this country and foreign to the fundamental law of the land. It is a step sought to be taken by the Republican party that makes conservative men tremble for the future welfare of our nation. It is a blow to constitutional government; and when constitutional government is destroyed the liberty of the citizen is likewise destroyed. It discriminates between citizens of the same country, who owe allegiance to the same flag. It places burdens upon one class of citizens for the benefit of another class. It overturns all precedents established since the foundation of the Government, and declares the Declaration of Independence to be null and void.

Mr. Chairman, by this bill it is intended to levy a tariff duty upon all articles of merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico and coming into Puerto Rico from the United States. The question now that presents itself is, Can this be lawfully done? And this depends, as I understand the situation, upon the question of whether or not Puerto Rico is territory of the United States.

Article II of the treaty of peace concluded at Paris December 10, 1898, is as follows:

Spain cedes to the United States the island of Puerto Rico and other islands now under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies and the island of Guam in the Ladrones or Marianas.

By this treaty Puerto Rico was ceded to the United States, and from the very moment of its ratification and exchange it became the territory of the United States. We have so recognized it from that time, and now are called upon to legislate for the inhabitants of this territory. If the people of Puerto Rico became subject to the jurisdiction of the United States upon the ratification of the treaty of Paris, they became subjected to Congressional legislation and became entitled to all the rights and benefits of American citizenship conferred by the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.] And now, Mr. Chairman, what right have we to discriminate against the people of this island?

The Federal Constitution authorizes Congress—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

It is, therefore, provided in and by the Constitution that taxation in all its forms must be uniform in its operation "throughout the United States."

The highest tribunal in the land has held that the Territories are a part of the United States; and as the Territories are a part of the United States, it necessarily follows that the injunction of uniformity extends to them equally as to the States themselves.

These clauses of the Constitution received a clear and distinct interpretation by the Federal Supreme Court in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton). In this case Congress had levied a direct tax, and in its apportionment the Territories and the District of Columbia were included. The contention was that the apportionment could only be made among the States, and that the District of Columbia and the Territories, not being States, were exempt and not subject to this tax.

The following is the opinion of the Supreme Court upon this point, delivered by that great Chief Justice, Marshall:

The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the power to "lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words which modify the grant. These words are, "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend. The power, then, "to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises" may be exercised, and must be exercised, throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to the people of the United States; but, as an American, I am proud to know that the Government of the United States is not unlimited in its sovereignty.

The people in their aggregate capacity do not make treaties or laws. The people, it is true, act through Representatives, but no act of those Representatives can be performed outside of the Constitution. The Constitution was made by the people as a check upon their Representatives. The people may amend the instrument, but, until changed by them, in the mode provided therein, that Constitution, with all its limitations, operates upon and restrains every act of every department of the Government.

It will be found from the reading of this opinion that the court said that while the District of Columbia and the Territories were subject to the laws of taxation, they were protected from oppression by the constitutional guaranties of uniformity and equality of apportionment in the exercise of the power.

If the position taken by the majority of the committee in advocating the passage of this bill be correct, and Congress has the power to govern territory of the United States independent of the constitutional limitations, it would therefore necessarily follow that the Congress would have the power to impose customs duties and taxes on the products of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma when they were imported into any of the States of this Union.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, Congress has any such power, to levy customs duties on the products of our Territories or any of them: but, greatly to my surprise, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], when addressing himself to this subject, said, in response to a question, that Congress could legislate and give free trade to Arizona and give a high protective tariff to New Mexico. This is the first time I have heard this doctrine advanced either in or out of Congress, and I truly hope it may be the last, for I have no faith in such contention.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the authority heretofore cited in support of my position does not stand alone. The Supreme Court of the United States has adhered to the doctrine announced in 5 Wheaton. That opinion does not stand out by itself, but has been followed and accepted by all except the gentlemen on the other side of this House who are trying to force the passage of this bill. Your position is inconsistent with the theory and practice of a Republican form of government. The exercise of such power as you contend for is imperialism in its most complete sense. This country never has held and can not now hold territory as a political dependency and subject to unequal taxation. The blessings of liberty and of free government rest alike upon all our people, whether in the thirteen original States or any other State of this Union or in the latest acquired territory.

It does not matter in what manner territory is obtained or acquired, it is to be held under our Constitution with the object of finally being admitted as a State into the Union.

In support of this contention I submit the following authorities:

In Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S. Reports) the Supreme Court of the United States held that—

The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territory to become States in the Union.

Again, in the case of Shively vs. Bowlby (152 U. S. Reports) that court said:

The Territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed of cession from the original States or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify it, of being admitted into the Union as States upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects.

Judge Cooley, whose Commentaries are universally accepted as conclusive interpretations of our constitutional law, summarizes the doctrine as follows:

And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow, of course; not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but also because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its own imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions.

Mr. Chairman, with this I am convinced that Congress has no power or authority to enact this proposed legislation. Authority after authority could be cited to support this contention, but I will content myself with these.

The Congress of the United States is the creature of the Constitution; and if any limitations are imposed upon its powers in general terms, they must be applied to all legislation with which it attempts to deal. It was never intended that Congress should be a despotism in some parts of the Union and a body of constitutional limited powers in other parts. To pass this measure is to acknowledge to the world that we propose to govern Puerto Rico as a dependency, to all of which I am unalterably opposed. To pass this bill would be to deprive these people of their rights. It would be taxation forced upon them without representation. It would mean a renunciation of that great principle that brought on the Revolutionary war and that caused the fathers to enter upon a long and bloody contest. But all these things are forgotten by the Republican party since they have entered on this mad career of imperialism. It is a question of dollars and cents now with our Republican friends, instead of life and liberty.

Again, Mr. Chairman, it is a notable fact that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means introduced on the 19th day of January a bill the provisions of which provided that the laws of the United States should be extended to Puerto Rico and that all customs tariffs should be abolished. This was done in accordance with the suggestion of the President, who recommended that it was "our plain duty to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets." This the President said was necessary because the island—had been denied the principal markets she had long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under Spanish sovereignty; that the markets of Spain are closed to her products except upon terms to which the commerce of all nations is subjected. The island of Cuba, which used to buy her cattle and tobacco without customs duties, now imposes the same duties upon these products as from any other country entering her ports. She has therefore lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba without any compensating benefits in this market. The markets of the United States should be opened up to her products.

The Secretary of War in his annual report uses the following language:

The highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interest of this people as our own; and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to all this, General Davis, who has been in charge as Governor-General of this island, recommended the same as the President and Secretary of War Root. Why this sudden change of heart on the part of the Republican members of this House? Is it to be understood that the President has so suddenly changed his views also? It has been proclaimed by some of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that the President has signified his intention of signing and approving this bill if it passes the House and Senate. It is thought by some that the purpose of this argument is to whip into line some of the brethren who desire to vote on this measure in accordance with the recommendation of the President, given in his message, but many think, as it is a question with two sides, that perhaps he has changed his mind. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is a reason for this change of position, as it is well known that the trusts and combinations are dictating and controlling the policy of the Republican party to-day. They have been in the saddle since the beginning of the present Administration. They have fattened and grown; they have had their own way so long that they have become bold and dictatory. They swept down upon leaders of the Republican party and told them that the recommendation of the President in his message should not be carried out, but that the interests of the sugar and tobacco trusts should be protected and cared for. This explains the reason for this change of heart you gentlemen have so recently experienced.

Mr. Chairman, the treatment sought to be accorded to the Puerto Ricans by this bill is not in keeping with the duty of a great and strong nation such as is the United States. When General Miles landed upon their soil with the American Army, they hailed him as their redeemer, and now when they ask for liberty and equal rights you offer them taxes. You say that they are destitute and in need of food and raiment; we acknowledge this, and are in favor of bettering their condition. What do you offer? Nothing but taxes.

Mr. Chairman, before I conclude I desire to say a few words in relation to the Philippine Islands. The Puerto Rican question is thus linked with the Philippine question. The latter presents the great difficulty in the way of the solution of the relations of our newly acquired possessions. I am frank to say here and now that I am not in favor of holding the Philippines permanently. I am in favor of informing the Filipinos that it is not our intention to permanently hold these islands, but that as soon as they have shown they were capable of governing themselves the islands would be turned over to them and let them establish a republic. We should through treaty relations secure coaling stations and make the best provisions for trade possible. This is the patriotic position for our nation to take, and any other, in my judgment, is contrary to the principle announced when the Spanish-American war broke out. Is not this true, gentlemen?

Let us recapitulate. We go to war with Spain in behalf of an oppressed colony of hers. We solemnly proclaim this to be a war not of conquest—God forbid—but of liberty and humanity. We invade the Spanish colony of the Philippines, destroy the Spanish fleet, and invite the cooperation of the Filipino insurgents against Spain. We accept their effective aid as allies, all the while permitting them to believe that in case of victory they will be free and independent.

Mr. Chairman, it is insisted by our Republican friends that we should permanently hold these islands on account of the trade advantages they would bring to us, regardless of cost or the price of liberty. It seems that some gentlemen on this floor value more highly an opportunity to make money than they do the rights and privileges of the individual citizen or of a people. That we would be benefited in our trade relations by holding these islands is only the merest guess and speculation. The people, on account of their geographical situation, and on account of their customs and habits in these islands, will not, in my judgment, give us a larger market, at least sufficient to equal the great expense they would be to our people and Government in providing for and looking after them, not to say anything about the European difficulties they might bring us into.

It is true a few speculators would be benefited, a few transportation companies would fatten and prosper, a few individuals who would get in and control the franchises would do likewise, but the taxpayers and the great body of our people would have to suffer for the benefit of the few.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] made a very remarkable statement concerning these islands while he was addressing this committee. He said:

> We have these islands and we are going to make all the money out of them we can.

I desire to submit some figures to show the committee and the country the kind of investment this Administration has made for the people. They will show what great expense has been thrust upon us by this military and imperialistic policy. I will show first the appropriations for the Army before this policy was entered upon.

There was appropriated for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, $23,252,608.09, and for the year ending June 30, 1897, $23,284,902.73; for the year ending June 30, 1898, $23,129,144.30; for the year ending June 30, 1899, $23,193,392, and for the year ending June 30, 1900, $80,080,104.06, and a few weeks ago the deficiency bill that passed this House carried in it for the Army $47,000,000, making the expenditure for the Army alone for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, $127,080,104.06. The present Army appropriation bill carries $111,600,364.55, being the sum appropriated for the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and this is $16,000,000 short of the estimate made by the War Department to defray the expenses of the Army for a single year.

By these figures we are to judge whether this policy is a paying investment to the United States. It will be found by examining into the great additional expense that we are put to on account of this Philippine policy, and comparing this expense account with the amount of trade done annually by these islands, that the expenses will greatly exceed the benefits derived. We are informed that the last year of which we have any account, it being for the year 1897, the value of the Philippine importations and exportations combined did not exceed $34,000,000. I am willing to submit this to the people to say whether it is an investment that meets their approbation or not.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I desire to state that our friends have become very solicitous about the character of legislation that should be had for the Puerto Ricans. They seem to have forgotten the act that permitted the admission of Hawaii with its 100,000 people and only 3,000 of them Americans. By that act territory was taken into the United States that was inhabited by a class of people at least 90 per cent of whom were less capable of self-government than the Puerto Ricans. In the Hawaiian Islands the contract-labor system is in vogue. The Chinese, Portuguese and Japanese laborer is placed in a position to come in competition with our labor here at home. To this I am opposed. I despise this contract system; it should be wiped out. It should not be permitted upon American soil; yet our Republican brethren, being fully aware of the fact of its existence and having the control of both Houses of Congress, have not, so far as I have seen, taken any step to get rid of this great evil, but are attempting to pass a bill that does not give to the Puerto Ricans the benefits given to the people of Hawaii that had this iniquitous labor system in force.

Mr. Chairman, I want to see just laws enacted; laws that are not discriminating in their character; laws that are uniform throughout the Union; but I hope that I may never see the Philippines taken in as a part of our permanent possessions, with their 10,000,000 people to compete with the intelligent people of America in all the various pursuits of life.

Mr. Chairman, long live this Republic! May it ever recognize the rights of the individual citizen and protect all alike who may come in under the folds of the American flag; and may that flag at all times and wherever it may be hoisted represent liberty! liberty! liberty! [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The Puerto Rico Tariff.

The real question is not tariff. It is not Puerto Rico. But it is the great political question of the right and power of Congress to legislate upon all questions pertaining to the new insular possessions as it may see fit, as limited and authorized by the Constitution and the spirit of our institutions.

HON. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. GROSVENOR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It may be well, at the conclusion of the debate upon the pending proposition, to place in condensed form a statement of the real issues here involved. The country at large has been wholly misled by the cursory and imperfect statements which have gone forth from Washington, and it would seem that very much of the hostility to the passage of this bill which has been indicated has grown out of the lack of full information.

In the first place, it may be proper to state that never within the memory of any member of this House has there been such an ardent and intense effort on the part of the Democracy to either carry or defeat a measure here as has been put forth to defeat this bill. From morning until midnight, in the House and in the lobbies, in the hotels and in the homes, one undivided, strenuous effort has been made by every Democratic member of this House, with four exceptions, to defeat the passage of this measure. Lobbies of unusual strength, both political and financial, have thronged the city of Washington, and have fought with a desperation worthy of the highest motive. Is it to be believed for a moment that these efforts have been made for the sole purpose of securing equal rights to the people of Puerto Rico? That idea may beguile children in politics, but it can not deceive men of observation and experience. A little investigation as to the potential elements of the future political effect which will flow from the passage of this bill will very clearly establish the true theory of this Democratic outcry.

When the flag was fired on in 1861 the Democrats of the North showed no such anxiety as they do now to defeat this bill. The effect of the sinking of the Maine was a zephyr compared with a tornado in the effect had upon the discovery of this situation.

Does anybody suppose that the little question of the levying of a duty of 15 per cent of the Dingley tariff upon certain products of Puerto Rico coming out and the goods being imported in had anything to do with the magnitude of this excitement? If anybody does believe it, he is wonderfully mistaken.

Why, Mr. Chairman, with the limitations of this measure as to its application and duration, its effect for harm will be only upon one class of individuals, and they are abundantly able to bear it. I refer to the speculators who have purchased the surplus of the sugar and tobacco crops of Puerto Rico which are now awaiting free trade for shipment to New York. These men have been represented here and have done their utmost, efficiently and wisely for them, to secure the defeat of this bill, and that we can understand.

First, let me refer to the direct object and purpose of this legislation. Puerto Rico not only suffered by her transition from Spanish tyranny to American freedom and the breaking up of her labor system and the general confusion that necessarily arises from such a condition, but, unfortunately, she was swept almost to a condition of destruction of all her interests by an awful hurricane.

We are told that coffee, upon which there is no tariff, will not be produced in any significant quantity for at least two years. Her sugar product and her tobacco product will be the principal exports of real money value. The Government of the United States has already contributed something like $700,000, as we are informed, to aid the people of Puerto Rico in their distress, and the further information is received that they must have a large sum in addition, and the Ways and Means Committee was called upon to devise some measure by which this money could be raised. There were three ways—three propositions:

First, a tax, local and municipal, upon the property of Puerto Rico. The poverty of the country would have made such a tax inhuman and outrageous, and the Good Samaritans who are shouting around this Chamber, and the preachers who are chiming in all over the country, and the humanitarians of the press, if they will look into it, will discover that to have left the people of Puerto Rico to their own devices to raise money for the carrying on of a local government, the establishment of schools, the restoration of roads and bridges, would have placed them in a condition comparable only with the conditions which drove the farmers of the Berkshire Hills and the men of other sections of the United States following the Revolution into a condition of revolution, riot, and anarchy. It would have been tyranny and oppression beyond human description.

The second course would have been to take from the Treasury of the United States an amount of money, say $3,000,000 a year, for a few years, and give it to the government of Puerto Rico to expend for its own purposes. Would not this have been a fine condition of affairs? Here would have been the cry of the Democratic party: "You have acquired a colonial possession called Puerto Rico, too worthless to protect itself, and you are taking the money of the people of the United States and placing it in the hands of a government of unknown character, unknown ability, and unknown capacity for governing, and you are sustaining that government by taxation upon the people of the United States." Such a measure would have relegated three-fourths of the Republican membership of this House to private life and turned over the Presidential election of 1900 to the Free Silverites. It was not to be thought of. No man dared to make the proposition. Then there was left but a single other resource, and that was proposition three.

Under the decision of the Board of General Appraisers at New York all this sugar and tobacco and whatever else Puerto Rico had to send to the United States is taxed under existing law the full amount of the Dingley tariff act, and the proposition of the Ways and Means Committee was simply to do this: Tax the products of that island coming to the United States 15 per cent of the Dingley tariff act and raise at the custom-houses to be established in Puerto Rico an amount of money equal to 15 per cent upon our exports into Puerto Rico, and then take that money, received at both ends of the line, the money arising from their trade with us and ours with them, and turn it over to be expended for the purposes of Puerto Rico.

Under this system 100 pounds of sugar coming from Germany would pay $1.60; coming from Puerto Rico 24 cents. This at once gives the people of Puerto Rico command of the United States market for their sugar at a handsome profit, and here is a provision that will furnish ready money for the exigencies of a suffering people. There was more humanity in it than in all the opposition that has been made to it. Here was dollars and cents, and there was a cry of the "flag and the Constitution." Now, we favor the flag and the Constitution. It is rather late in the day to accuse the Republican party or the Republican majority on this floor of not favoring the flag and the Constitution, but in the hour of starvation and need we believe that to wave the American flag at those people or shake the Constitution at them is a very bad way of removing the exigencies of their immediate position. So this plan is the only one that is feasible or possible under the present conditions of the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, we do not shut our eyes to another proposition. There is underlying this bill and this vote and the principle upon which this bill stands a mighty political question. It is a question upon the one side of which stood John C. Calhoun for thirty-five years and upon the other side of which stood Daniel Webster and Thomas H. Benton. Those great statesmen fought out the question with varying fortunes to each so long as the issues remained political, and ultimately more than two and a half million of soldiers fought out the question on the battlefield. The issue can be stated very succinctly. Having acquired dominion over Puerto Rico and the fourteen hundred Philippine Islands, can Congress legislate over those islands in the matter of revenue legislation?

That is the important and concrete question involved in this bill, but incidentally the settlement of this point by Congress involves all the future of the Philippine Archipelago. Can Congress fix a tariff on the sugar and the rice and the other articles produced by the cheap labor of the Filipinos as against the productions of the high-grade, well-paid labor of the United States, or must the rice and the cotton and the sugar and the tobacco and the manufactured articles—the long list of articles of every description now manufactured in the Philippine Islands—or must they come into the United States and into competition with our free labor without a tariff duty?

That, Mr. Chairman, is but a small part of the question. Can the ten millions of Malays, Zulus, Filipinos, Chinese, Japanese, and all the conglomerate elements of the population of that archipelago come over in shiploads, by hundreds, by thousands, by tens of thousands, by millions, and as American citizens, clothed with all the rights and immunities conferred upon American citizens by the Constitution, move into the United States and dominate and usurp our labor markets? Here lies the milk of the cocoanut.

Here is the incentive for the enormous Democratic effort to drive Congress into this measure. Here is the whole of it. They care no more about the question of 15 per cent duty than they do as to the number of English sparrows in the shade trees of Washington, but they do care for and pray for the opportunity to go before the people of the United States and say: "Here is a condition fixed by the vote of a Republican House of Representatives that binds Congress to keep hands off and permit the overflow of the Philippine Archipelago into the labor channels of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, I charge that every vote given against this measure which is based upon this idea, which is, in my judgment, the underlying and controlling mainspring of Democratic hostility, is a vote to place the free labor of the United States in direct and acute competition with the cheap barbaric labor of the Philippine Islands. It is to break down all barriers; it is to overwhelm this country; it is to deny to Congress the right to interfere; and when you have reached that conclusion you have solved the problem as to what has been the cause of the activity of the Democracy in this behalf.

If we can not legislate upon the tariff question, we can not legislate upon the immigration question; if we can not exclude the products of Puerto Rico because Puerto Rico is a part of our domain, then we can not interpose any objection to the coming of the hordes of these people, and when they arrive in the United States they enter our courts and demand the rights of citizenship, and directly demand the right to vote. But would it not be a glorious thing for our Democratic friends, now in a stress of weather on a lee shore, if they could hail such a proposition as this to be used in the coming campaign? So the Ways and Means Committee, looking ahead and not backward, decided that we would assert the rights of the American people to dominate and regulate this newly discovered and acquired possession.

In doing so we are following the lead of Jefferson, of Adams, of Jackson, of Marshall, as we are of Webster and Benton, and, we say, of the Supreme Court of the United States. We propose to treat Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands upon the exact principle that the United States treated the territory and inhabitants of the Louisiana purchase, the Florida territory, the Gadsden purchase, and Alaska and all the other possessions, but there is this distinguishing difference that our friends on the other side do not seem to have fully apprehended or comprehended. Nearly all of those territories were acquired with stipulations engrafted into the treaty as to the future of the inhabitants, by which we acquired ultimate title.

These territories, Puerto Rico and the Philippines, were acquired with the distinct condition placed in the treaty that everything relating to the people of these islands should be settled by Congress. The makers of the treaty declined to touch any conditions and left it all to the uncontrolled action of Congress. "But," say our enemies, "do you say and claim that the Constitution of the United States has no effect upon the Territories?" That is what we say, yes; and then our opponent says, "Then you may legislate for the establishment of religion in these territories; you can deny the writ of habeas corpus by law; you may do all the other things that are forbidden." Not at all.

No man on this floor in this long debate has taken any such position. These negative propositions of the Constitution are limitations upon the power of Congress to act in any condition. Congress shall not pass a law touching religion. Where? Everywhere. It has no power to do it and is forbidden to do it. We adopt all that there is in this instrument upon that point; but we say when the Constitution, after having put in all these limitations and restrictions upon the power of Congress, then moves right out into the open field of authority and says, "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States," we assume this doctrine to give to Congress the right here sought to exercise, and we will stand by our position until the Supreme Court of the United States in the proper way shall hold otherwise, and then, of course, we shall bow to the wisdom and judgment of that tribunal.

Now, I conclude as follows:

First, we have adopted the only safe and feasible method of raising revenue for the immediate emergency presented by the conditions in Puerto Rico;

Second, we have established, so far as this legislation can go, the right and power of Congress to legislate discriminately upon all the great topics and subjects of legislation which shall arise incident to the acquisition of this territory;

Third, we have placed the Republican party in favor of free labor as against barbaric labor, and the products of free American labor are protected against the products of this other quality of labor;

Fourth, we have opened the door to the expansion of our trade in the east without the limitations and crippling influences that any other system would have brought about; and

Fifth, and preeminent, in this way we establish the right to protect our citizenship against the influx of the people of those territories.

And, Mr. Chairman, out of all this comes to the people of these Territories the blessings of free government. The President has given his assurance over and over again in language forcible and eloquent that the flag carries the principles of this liberty to all the islands of the sea. Persuaded by the principles of American liberty, no oppression to those people can ever be tolerated for a moment; forbidden by the terms of the Constitution to pass laws of oppression, no such law will ever be attempted; impelled by the principles of the Constitution, the liberty of these people will be guarded jealously by Congress, and as rapidly as they show fitness, as rapidly as conditions will justify, they will be lifted up and up and up until the full honor of American citizenship and American political equality of rights shall have been reached by them all.

Trade of Puerto Rico.

All the people of these islands who were the subjects of Spain will become citizens of the United States by the mere act of cession unless the treaty of cession should provide that those who wished could remain subjects of Spain and aliens as to the United States. This has been a necessary rule of international law for hundreds of years, and the rule is founded upon the obvious fact that the people of every country or of any part of it must owe allegiance to and be subject to the government of some sovereign power, be it a tribe or emperor or king or republic, and must, unless they are slaves or serfs, have the rights of such.

But a republic can have no subjects; its people must be either citizens, slaves, or aliens. If aliens, they are the subjects or citizens of some other power, which is bound to protect them. The transfer, therefore, of the sovereignty of Spain over the Philippines to the United States makes all her subjects at once citizens of the United States. If citizens of the United States, they have all the rights that belong to other citizens in the Territories, whether on the mainland or on the islands of the sea. Neither geography nor distance has anything to do with it.—Ex-United States Senator George F. Edmunds, ex-chairman of Judiciary Committee of United States Senate.

HON. JOHN WESLEY GAINES,

OF TENNESSEE.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. GAINES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The history of the Puerto Rican question presents a spectacle of partisan gymnastics and somersaulting never before exhibited in this Chamber and down the Avenue, and without precedent in all the annals of legislation. It will be profitable to make a verbal map of it; to point out the successive steps, backsteps, and sidesteps, taken at its various stages, so that the country may catch at a glance all its absurdities and doubling backs. It presents a solution of the old riddle, and it now appears that—

> The slimy snake that made the track
> Was both sliding in and sliding back.

On December 5, 1899, the President in his regular annual message, prepared with matured thought and reflecting the profoundest judgment of his Cabinet and advisers, announced this grave proposition:

> Our plain duty is to abolish all custom tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico, and give her products free access to our markets.

In accordance with this sound injunction, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the leader of his party upon this floor, on January 19, 1900, ratified and approved the President's message by introducing "A bill to extend the laws relating to customs and internal revenue over the island of Puerto Rico ceded to the United States," giving Puerto Rico "free access to our markets." The laws of the United States relating to customs are founded in the constitutional provision which ordains that—

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. * * * But all duties, impost, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

And this bill—of January 19—was intended to be and was what the President had suggested as a "plain duty"—a free-trade bill.

Something then happened. It is hard to tell exactly what it was that happened, but something then happened. There were scurryings to and fro about the ways and means portals and great commotion reigned in sugardom. Exactly how it was done may never be generally known, but that it was done is plainly sure.

The trusts spake and the waters receded!

On February 8, 1900, just twenty days from the time that he introduced the free-trade bill, this same gentleman, the same chairman of the same committee, the same leader of his party, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], "reported" a bill levying a tariff rate of 25 per cent of Dingley rates upon all commerce between the United States and Puerto Rico. It slapped the "plain duty" pronouncement squarely in the face.

Astonishing to relate, no mortal man has been found with the hardihood to claim the paternity of this bill, whether from shame or fear, no man knows, and it has wandered through this entire debate a misbegotten foundling. It was begotten in the corridors, where the trust emissaries crowded, and its bloated lineaments and the strong smell of sugar and tobacco that hangs about its garments betray its nature.

More astonishing things were yet to happen. The bill confessedly outraged the Constitution; but what of that? The old-faded thing is out of date. It was the tempest of disapprobation it raised within the party in power that wrought consternation among its promotors. They were caught between the upper and the nether millstones. The trusts had commanded and the leaders had yielded, thinking they could drive in the rank and file and deliver all the goods, and now the rank and file out in the country dared to rise in remonstrance.

What was to be done? Groping for a compromise, a loophole, a anything that would gull the people and serve to deliver the promised goods, another absurdity was evolved. The rate was reduced from 25 to 15 per cent of Dingley rates. It never once occurred to them that 15 per cent of wrong is as wrong as 25 per cent; that the difference is only in the amount of the swag. It violated principle and right and constitutional provision as grossly in the one bill as in the other, and to lessen the grade of the steal does not change the spelling of it, and it was a brazen insult to public intelligence in that it assumed that the people could be thus bamboozled and fooled.

And now came the climactic contretemps. The President himself ate his own words—violated the "plain duty" he had himself pointed out. He had to do it or the party was lost. It made no difference what became of the country and the Puerto Ricans and the Constitution, so the party was saved and the trusts held harmless. There was consternation in the ranks of the G. O. P. Recalcitrance was rampant. Never before was the party whip lashed with such hysterical desperation. The trusts had whipped in the leaders, and the leaders had whipped in the committee, and now the party whips must whip in the recalcitrants. There were hurried scurryings up and down the Avenue, and the window panes in the White House rattled with the buzz. It was evident, even if the bill should pass, that the margin would be narrow, and a veto would be fatal.

What else could the President do but veto it after having delivered himself of the "plain-duty" injunction? A veto seemed inevitable, but the resources of the sugar-tobacco combination were not yet exhausted. A veto must not be.

The President must come down off the "plain-duty" perch. Would he come? Could he stultify himself thus? Humiliating as it is to an American citizen to confess it, the President came down. In their desperation a caucus was called on the night of February 26 to whip in and persuade in and frighten in the recalcitrants, and among the many other things that happened was this. I read from the Washington Post of February 27:

Representative SHATTUC, of Ohio, was one of the first speakers after Chairman CANNON had called the conference to order. "I am willing to defer my judgment to the judgment of the President," said he; "but I want some assurance besides whisperings under somebody's hat that the President is for this bill. If no assurance can be given as to that, I wish to say that I shall not be bound by any decision this conference may reach. I shall feel free to vote as I please on this tariff bill." This brought Chairman PAYNE to his feet. "I saw the President this afternoon," he declared, "and the President told me that he had no doubt of the constitutionality of the Puerto Rican tariff bill. He told me also that if the bill is passed by Congress he will sign it."

There you have it on authority. This report of this caucus proceedings has not to this good hour been disputed. The President had surrendered. He had promised to withhold his veto. It was whispered here that he had gone so far to leeward of "plain duty" as to send for members and ask them to vote for the bill. It at once reveals the power of the trusts and the shame of the American people.

The answer to all this monstrous doing and the condemnation of it will come in November from the people, and the most appropriate criticism that I can pass upon it is to set in apposition to it the great speech of the tribune of the people, William J. Bryan, delivered at Nashville, Tenn., February 24, a few days since, while this farce was being enacted, directly apropos, and falling from the lips of the man who is soon to assume the "plain-duty" function of the Executive office, and who, it may be depended, can not be cajoled nor persuaded nor lambasted into forsaking principle and justice and right for the sake of the trust lords.

The lofty tone and profound expression of sound principle embodied in this great speech, measured beside the pitiable spectacle presented in the history of this bill, pictures a giant beside a pigmy and measures all the distance between statesmanship and jugglery, between right and wrong, between patriotism and perfidy.

The Nashville American says he spoke nearly two hours to an immense and appreciative audience. He justly denounced the gold standard, trusts, and on this bill and imperialism said:

EXPANSION.

But there is a question that is plainer than the money question. The question of imperialism is the plainest question that has been in American politics for a generation. When you discuss a political question you have got to take some principle and apply it to the economical question, and you have got to illustrate it and make it plain; but in the Declaration of Independence our forefathers declared that certain truths were self-evident; and what did they mean by self-evident truths? Truths so plain that every citizen could understand them at a glance. We are to deal in the imperial question with certain self-evident truths. Don't be deceived by the attempt to confuse the public mind in regard to expansion and imperialism. There is a difference between expansion and imperialism. Expansion is the extension of the limits of a republic without a change in the character of the government. An empire is a different thing from expansion; an empire is a different thing from a republic.

We have had expansion in the past. We expanded when we took in Florida. We took in contiguous territory that could be settled by American citizens and build up American States. We expanded when we took in the Louisiana Territory. We took in contiguous territory that could be settled by American citizens and build up American States. But now we are not expanding. We are not crossing an ocean to secure a land for settlement. We are crossing the ocean to secure races for subjugation under the Republic. Under a republic the flag goes where the constitution does not reach. Under a republic the president has the powers conferred by the constitution. Under an empire he has any power on earth that he wants to exercise. [Applause.]

Under an empire a congress is as unlimited as a monarchy with no limits placed upon it. They tell you that we are carrying the blessings of civilization to the Orient. Here that flag stands for people who govern themselves; there it stands for the people who are to be governed by others. Here it stands for people who determine their own taxes; there it stands for people who are to be taxed without representation. And if you want to see the difference between a republic and an empire; if you can not see the difference between that flag here and in the Philippines, let me remind you that after the war an amendment to the Constitution was adopted which provided that no man could own another man on American soil or where the jurisdiction of this country extended, and yet the Sultan of Sulu stipulates that the Sultan will pay this country a certain sum for the privilege of flying the American flag over that country. But here under the American flag, according to the terms of the Sulu treaty, he is not free, but he has a right to purchase his freedom whenever he can make a price. [Applause.]

WHAT AN EMPIRE MEANS.

If you have any doubt as to what an empire means, read the difference between a republic and an empire in the bill recently introduced in the House of Representatives to provide one tariff for Puerto Rico and another for the United States. The Puerto Ricans have not made any complaint, but now, my friends, they are to be told by the Republican party that they are not citizens, but subjects; that they are to be governed as we think best; not as they think best themselves. The President only a few months ago declared it was our duty to give them the advantage of trade with the United States.

My friends, what excuse do you hear given for an imperial policy? I hear three; first, that money is in it; second, that God is in it; and third, that we are in and can not get out of it. [Laughter.]

Have you heard any other? If you will take any speech you have heard in defense of imperialism you will find that every argument will fall under those three heads, and most of the speeches on imperialism cover at least two of these heads.

I will give you the substance of an ordinary speech on imperialism. The speaker starts off by saying that God did it; that God opened the way; that God pointed out the path and commanded us to enter on a march of conquest and scatter civilization through the bursting dynamite bombs; and after laying it all on the Lord, they then say, "and it will pay."

Philanthropy and 5 per cent is the way that Secretary Gage expressed it. He said that philanthropy and 5 per cent will go together; and whenever philanthropy gets tired and rests by the wayside, 5 per cent goes right along and never gets lonesome.

Take those three arguments. Let me call your attention to the first, that there is money in it. Do you know that when a man says there is money in it he assumes the burden of proof to show that we will get more money out of the Philippines than it costs us? The man who says we will get out of it more than it costs us must first show us how much we will spend, and then he must show us how many men we will lose and how much it will cost, and when he reduces it to a money basis he is not prepared to put a value upon human life. If we are going to buy trade for blood, then how much trade ought we to get for blood? I dare the Republicans to put a price upon human lives. Who can measure the value of one human heart full of love for his fellow-man? What man can place the value upon the life of the American soldier? I would not put one American citizen on the auction block and sell him for all the trade of the Orient if we had to buy it with the blood of the American soldier. [Great applause.]

I have been told that there is a sentiment down South in favor of expansion; that some people seem to think that it is going to open the market to cotton manufacturers of the South. If there is a manufacturer who believes we can purchase trade at the cannon's mouth, I want him to go there and purchase it with his own blood, and not sacrifice other people's sons to buy it. [Applause.]

WILL NOT SEND HIS CHILDREN.

He will not go himself; he will not send his sons; he will not send his relatives; he will send somebody else's children. My friends, it is a serious question. When a boy is fighting for what he believes is right, his mother is raising her son for a great sacrifice, and yet the man who says it will pay brings it down to that level. Franklin said that the trade purchased by war was not worth what it cost. He was right. You can not show that the men who help to bear the burden will get the blessing derived from such wars.

But I want to suggest this also, that even if a man was willing to go into a war of conquest to secure trade—I want to suggest that if we secure the Philippine Islands and raise the flag there and hold those people in subjugation, instead of selling them cotton goods, our capitalists will go over there and establish factories there and use the Philippine labor and India cotton in making goods to be sent back to the United States.

You can not afford to do wrong for money. If you do it, you will be so shortsighted that you can not see all the consequences of the act. You can not afford to do wrong, no matter how much it pays.

In the 1896 campaign some people denounced our platform. One preacher said it was written in hell, and another said the devil wrote it, and I felt hurt at the last suggestion, because I helped to write it. [Laughter.]

But no matter what you say about that platform, we will write a platform on the Philippine question so high that no Republican will write one above it—a platform that will declare that this nation can not afford to do wrong no matter how much it pays. But if there is anybody who can not afford to get up on that platform, we will write a low one that will declare that you can not do wrong unless it does pay, and we will challenge him to say that it does pay. [Applause.]

If you think our people will go there to live and work under the sun that shines over those islands, read the experience of other nations. The Netherlands have been dominating Java for years, and yet there are less than 60,000 people of European life out of all nations. Spain dominated the Philippines for years, and yet there are less than 10,000 Spaniards out of 8,000,000 people. England has for a long time dominated India, and yet there are only 100,000 out of many millions, and it takes a native army of 140,000 to help the British army take care of the 100,000, and it is evident that the natives are not glad that the English are there.

England needs soldiers in South Africa, and God grant that she may need more than she will ever be able to send there. She needs soldiers in South Africa, and yet, instead of going to India after them, she calls for volunteers at home. I read a book written by an Englishman, who said that there was not a native paper in India supporting the English Government.

Do you think that we are going to the Philippine Islands to educate people? Why, England has been educating in India for one hundred and fifty years, and little less than 5 per cent of the total population can read and write. Do you think that we are going to the Philippines to educate? England has been preaching a gunpowder doctrine for a century and a half. Do you think we are going to the Philippines to Christianize? It is a Christian portion of the Philippines who are against us, and our hold is most secure in our Mohammedan portion of the island.

My friends, we dare not educate the Filipinos if they are to be held in subjugation. We dare not educate them, lest they learn to read the Declaration of Independence and mock us for our inconsistency.

You convince a man that it is his religious duty to do a thing, and he will do it; convince him that it is his religious duty to give up his money, and he will give it up; but convince him that it is his religious duty to give up his life, and he will give it up; but, more unfortunate still, convince him that it is his religious duty to take another man's money, and he will take it. [Laughter.] Convince him that it is his religious duty to take another man's life, and he will take it. And how many men's lives have been taken by men that declared that God commanded them to kill somebody or to rob somebody?

LINCOLN'S VIEWS OF THE MATTER.

Somebody asked Lincoln if he was not anxious to have the Lord on his side, and he said no; that he was anxious to be on the Lord's side. A Republican Senator said that God opened the door of the Philippine Islands and pushed us in. [Laughter.]

I want to know the hour and the place where God communicated it, and if I find out just exactly where the Senator was when he heard this voice I will undertake to prove an alibi and show that it was somebody else's voice that he heard. [Laughter.]

I do not mean to say that men may not prophesy to-day with divine inspiration. I do not mean to say that God may not speak to the world through human voice, but I voice it as my humble opinion that when God gets ready to speak to the world he will use somebody else than MARK HANNA as his mouthpiece. [Cheers and laughter.]

We read in history that our forefathers in tramping the snows of Valley Forge, with bleeding feet, appealed to God to help them as they resisted the doctrine of taxation without representation, and it is worse than mockery to invoke that same God to help us as we try to force that same doctrine of taxation without representation upon a weaker people because we can do it by force. [Applause.]

I believe, in deciding this question, we shall decide whether this, the greatest Republic in history, shall be a moral factor in the world's progress—shall rise and draw men unto it—or whether it shall step down to the level of the old nations of the world. I would not trade the glory of this Republic for the glory of all the empires that have risen and fallen since time began. [Applause.] For a hundred years this nation has been the greatest power in the world. During the closing years of the eighteenth century this nation was established, and during the nineteenth century the doctrine of self-government planted upon the American soil has grown and grown, and that doctrine of self-government has proven to be more powerful than all the armies and all the navies and all the nations of the world. And now shall we turn back from the place from whence we started? Shall we cast away this omnipotent truth? This question determines whether this nation shall be like all the world or whether it shall tread the path that leads to the grave. I am not willing to prepare this nation for interment. I am not willing to admit that this Republic must die. Empires must fall when they meet a superior force, but a Republic built upon the Declaration of Independence and administered according to the Jefferson doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none need never die, can never die, and I want this to be such a Republic. [Applause.]

A FIGHT FOR LIBERTY.

Let this nation declare by resolution that we fight not for land, but for liberty. That is what we told the Cubans. Let us tell the Filipinos that. We told the Cubans that we were going to drive the Spaniards out, and that when that was completed they would stand up and be free; and let us tell that to the Filipinos, and we shall protect them from outside interference, as we protected the republics of South America. Let us say to the world that we expect to give independence to the Filipinos as soon as a stable government is established. You tell me you want your flag to be feared. I want that flag to be loved by every human being. [Applause.] You want all people to bow in its presence. I want them to look up to it for hope and inspiration.

This nation has a mission to perform. I do not know what God's plans are. If you tell me it is destiny, I do not know. If you tell me it was the destiny of Cain to kill Abel, I tell you it was the destiny to wear the brand of a murderer forever afterwards.

For more than a hundred years we followed the pathway that leads from the low domain of night to the lofty realm of light. I am not willing to turn back. I want this nation to stand erect. I want it to resist temptation. I want it to show that there is a difference between a republic and a monarchy. I want it to so act that whenever any people anywhere are willing to die for liberty, we can say to them: "God bless you; may you win your fight, and stand upon the principles of self-government." [Great applause.]

We can not do it if we ourselves engage in an imperial policy; and if you have not seen the danger that threatens this nation, let me show you the paralysis that is now creeping over the Republican party because of its policy of imperialism. Now that a fight is on between a republic and a monarchy—a fight where every American citizen must sympathize with those who seek their independence—it is impossible for the Republican party to say one word in behalf of their principle. But I would rather that the Democratic party would go down to defeat fighting for the Declaration of Independence than rise upon the principles that a republic had been destroyed upon American soil. [Great applause.]

Trade of Porto Rico.

We confront our hereditary foe, England!—Republicans false to national honor!

How the blood of Dewey and Schley, of Miles and Lee, and every man who wears the blue must boil with helpless rage at these unresented insults to our flag.

I charge the Republican party with seeking to destroy this Republic, with being false to our national honor, with trampling under foot the Declaration of Independence, and attempting to override the Constitution.

HON. JAMES A. NORTON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Porto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. NORTON of Ohio said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: As has been well said on this floor, this is, indeed, a critical time in the history of our country. It is not alone in times of great public excitement, when the waves of popular passion and prejudice are sweeping mountain high over the length and breadth of our land, that the greatest danger always exists, but in the calm before the storm, when the people are lulled into relaxed vigilance and fancied security; then it is more than ever true that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and we have reason to ask the watchman on the heights "what the signs of morning are."

We have reached a time when the conviction is growing and becoming more fixed in the minds of our people that this Republic—this nation of ours—should be more true to its aims and purposes, should show in the administration of its affairs greater fidelity to the cause and interests of the great mass of the people instead of groveling subserviency to the dictation of a favored few; a time when statesmanship rather than mere partisan advantage, when justice and right instead of avarice, greed, and oppression, should be emblazoned forth as the watchword of the day. In this closing year of the century, soon to take its place in the long line of the past, we should so make history that it may challenge the most glowing epoch of the golden age.

In all times of trouble or danger humanity ever instinctively turns to the strong and powerful for help, and happy is that country whose rulers and leaders are not recreant to the trust reposed in them in such an hour, when there is a responsive and determined action that assures the people that their honor will be maintained and the right upheld.

Bitter indeed is the disappointment that fills the hearts of the American people to-day. In the place of help there is distress; instead of the party in power seeking to relieve the people, it seeks to destroy; instead of being a tower of strength it proves a broken reed. The issues of the day are not fairly met, and there is no relief. It is argued that Congress has the power to commit wrong as well as to allow wrong to exist, but no argument, no act of Congress can make wrong and injustice to become right and equity.

The President, in his annual message to this body last December, declared that Porto Rico was a part of the United States, a portion of our domain, and that the beneficent effects and protection of our Constitution were extended over that island. To-day the trusts and monopolies have made their wishes known, and every interest of right, duty, justice, and humanity is sacrificed at their demand, and famine and starvation stalk over Porto Rico, permitted by the Administration in exchange for the millions to be poured by the trusts into the Republican campaign corruption fund. The leaders of this imperialistic movement should study history, should reread the words of Lincoln:

Let us have faith that right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty.

This they should do, but they will not do it; it would be contrary to the orders they receive from their syndicated masters. That would indeed be a changed condition.

Mr. Chairman, we have had exhibited on this floor a strange spectacle. We have had a strange apology and defense of the President from the lips of one who knows him best. The gentleman from Ohio declares that because the policy of the President and Administration was one thing on the 4th of December last that was no reason why it might not be entirely different to-day. In view of the lightning changes made politically by the Republicans, from the President down to the gentleman from Ohio, we ought not to be surprised at any transformation that may take place in their policies. [Applause.]

What have we confronting us in this bill? An arrangement imposing a tariff on Porto Rico products. The gentlemen on the other side take great pride in pointing to the fact that this proposed tariff is only 15 per cent of the tariff rates under the Dingley bill taxed upon goods brought from foreign shores, and that it is imposed out of their great love and tender sympathy for the poverty-stricken Porto Ricans; and here I want to say that the pictures drawn of the terrible woe and want and suffering in Porto Rico have not been in any way exaggerations. To-day the people of that sea-girt isle are absolutely in the direst need, hundreds dying from starvation, and this through no fault of theirs. Desolation and ruin riding on the wings of the tornado and fierce storm swept over their homes, and in their track gaunt specters of misery moaned and with pallid lip and chattering teeth tell their tales of despair.

Now comes this bill and proposes to be kind to these people by degrees. "We will tax you now only"—mark that, only—"15 per cent as much as we might; only 15 per cent as much as Spain taxed you." The pages of history are black with the records of Spanish cruelty and oppressive taxation; and are we to measure our benevolent assimilation by Spanish standards and only prove ourselves a petty per cent better and higher in all the noble impulses of humanity than Spain! Were the Spaniards right in their derisive epithets, calling us "pigs" and "a bargain-counter nation?" I do not so read the great heart of the American people.

When this Government sent relief to the stricken people of Charleston and South Carolina, we asked no per cent tax in return; when we gave to the fire-swept counties of the prairies, we asked no payment in return; when we opened our bounty to the flood-devastated people along the Mississippi, we did not say to them, "Thank God, because we will only tax you 15 per cent on your products for the next two years." No; there were no strings tied to our generous contributions to these suffering ones.

If, under the ratification of the sale of American honor consummated in the peace treaty at Paris, we acquired dominion over the Philippines and over Porto Rico, then we owe to the Porto Ricans in this their hour of distress the same duty that we have so often recognized and discharged toward the people on the American continent. Our responsibilities are as binding to aid and assist the Porto Ricans as they were to aid the stricken people of the Mississippi Valley. Mr. Chairman, if the contention of the Republican leaders ever since the close of the war with Spain be true, then there can be nothing left for the advocates of the passage of this bill to stand on, and free trade between Porto Rico and our other States and Territories must, under and by virtue of our Constitution, be and remain as fixed as free trade between New York and New Mexico. [Applause.]

But they say we must protect our industries from the competition they will meet in the productions of Porto Rico. Does it not seem puerile and foolish, nay, is it not pitiable, that a great nation like ours, a nation which challenged the admiration of the world when it threw down the gage of war for humanity's sake and in the name of humanity alone, should now fear the industrial competition of a little island, whose area is so insignificant and whose population can never reach 1 per cent of our own? If the gentlemen who are contending for this bill could for a single moment break away from the hypnotic spell that holds them, free themselves from the dominating influences of trusts, and realize the diminutiveness of the island, both in area and population and in lack of capital and labor, they would be ashamed at the position taken by them, if shame is ever felt by abject slaves.

It is not, however, a mere question of commercial magnitude or its immediate effect upon certain trades and industries of our land. If that were all, we might afford to try the experiment, but there is a principle involved that is pernicious and dangerous to our Republic. We do not approach the discussion of this question from any partisan spirit, seeking only party advantage, but as true Americans, lovers of right and justice, advocates of doing that which is right in the right way, and we recognize with pleasure that all the members on the other side of the House have not surrendered their manhood, their honor, and their conscience to the debasing halter and slavery of trust domination. I believe that there are yet among the Republicans a few men who would rather "be right than to be President;" men who put right above expediency. The great lack of the Republican party is that these men are not the leaders. The misfortune of that party is that it has no leadership founded upon principle.

Washington and Lincoln have passed away, but alas, their mantles have not fallen upon any of the men in charge or control of the Republican party to-day. If President McKinley was a higher and truer statesman than he was pictured to be by the gentleman from Ohio a few days since on this floor, he would never, it would be impossible for him to reach such a condition, that "nothing would give the President greater sorrow and regret than the defeat of this bill," after having not later than the 4th of last December said to us: "Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Porto Rico, and give her products free access to our markets."

It must be that the gentleman from Ohio has failed in his diagnosis of the President's conditions, or the President has missed taking at its flood the tide of opportunity which comes so rarely to the nation's Executive to make the right prevail. He took his stand firm upon the rock of truth, and pointed out to Congress the path of duty; but, then, weakly, ignominiously, he faltered, hesitated, and was led away by the false leaders around him holding before him the dazzling, iridescent, glittering bubble of trust contributions to his campaign for reelection.

Mr. Chairman, if we set up the doctrine and it is established that we have the right to tax the people of Porto Rico, and impose upon them tariff and customs duties that are not uniform with the rates, duties, and taxes in other parts of our dominion, then we establish the right to do anything else to them and with them that we see fit to do, and not only to them but to all other people under our jurisdiction, and we become no longer a Republic but an empire. Imperialism, indeed, would be enthroned and our starry banner, instead of being an emblem and messenger of benediction and peace, would fly as the symbol of cruelty, outrage, and despotism. [Applause.]

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that Cæsar is already in power and imperialism firmly established, but there is hope that with the ides of November will come other "changed conditions," and with the passing of another twelvemonth will pass away forever from our fair land the hideous gloom of wrong and injustice that covers it; and that the domination of greed, avarice, usurpation, and oppression shall be forever done away. The advocates of this measure are shrewdly using, as it were, "the livery of heaven to serve the devil in." They are trying to form a combination, wherein if the syndicates can tax Porto Rico, the friends and supporters of the Nicaraguan Canal may have the aid and assistance of the syndicate's lobbyists.

Out upon such a bargain; for with their support would be forced the approval of the treasonable treaty just concluded between our English Secretary of State and the British minister, in which our American birthright is sold and bartered away for a miserable mess of pottage. Again we are face to face with our hereditary foe, and again we are at a disadvantage by not having "only Americans on guard." In many a bloody battle, on sea and on land, the prowess and valor of the soldiers of the Union have been proven when arrayed against the British flag. By their blood our heroic armies have attested their devotion to their country's cause, and by their undying bravery and courage have beaten back by trial at arms the British foe, and proven that the free air of America gives birth to greater heroes, braver, truer manhood, than all the boasted Anglo-Saxon can produce.

Beaten at open warfare, true to her instincts, England seeks, by underhanded diplomacy and secret understandings, backed up by British gold, to wrest from the United States conditions and privileges which would nullify the fruits of many a hard-won victory. England seeks to steal from us territory in Alaska and privileges and rights in Nicaragua. Her whole history has been one of arrogant contempt of all principles of honor. She has trampled treaties under her feet whenever they stood in the way of her foul designs. From the beginning of our history down to the present day England has been our enemy, open or secretly, still our enemy, and it is time that a halt should be called in her thievery and aggression. Without the shadow of a right, or the slightest pretense of a claim, the British Government is seeking to add to Canadian territory miles and miles of our unquestioned rich mineral lands and valuable coast lines in Alaska, and while fortifying her possessions in the tropic seas guarding the entrance to the proposed Nicaragnan Canal, seeks to impose upon our Government a prohibition to control and protect the canal, should we build it.

Base England, red with freeman's blood,
And black with perfidy and sin.

[Applause.]

The official literature of England teems with studied insults toward us. There comes to me now the language of one Commander Bedford Pim, of the royal navy, also a fellow of the Royal Geographical Society and an associate of the Institute of Civil Engineers, who has written two or three books. In one of these books, Dottings on the Roadside in Panama, Nicaragua, and Mosquito, he calls England the "Protector of Mosquito," and a little further on speaks of our civil war, saying, "Our bullying cousins begun to let blood among themselves." Now, this illustrious author, who calls us "his bullying cousins," in his book, The Gate of the Pacific, says:

Early in the seventeenth century the Mosquito Indians allied themselves with the buccaneers, and from that period their friendship for the English may be dated.

Here is a remarkable specimen of unintended candor. When it is remembered that the definition of a buccaneer is "a robber on the sea; a pirate; a term applied especially to the piratical adventurers who made depredations on America in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries," we are unconsciously reminded of the old saying that "birds of a feather flock together," and are not surprised at the friendship between the natives and their English "protectors," when the greatest pleasure of Britain's leading navy officers at that time was in scuttling ships and cutting throats.

From those days down, England has sought to crush freedom wherever it could be done, in every corner of the earth, and now the groans of struggling liberty in South Africa are rising in mighty agonizing prayer to the God of Heavens. Grant that those prayers may not rise in vain! [Applause.]

To wish for the success of England in South Africa is to desire the triumph of the pirate on sea and the footpad on land—is to wish for the downfall of human liberty and the triumph of the most cruel injustice and greed.

Where is the spirit of Washington, of Jackson, or of Lincoln? Behold, our vessels stopped on the high seas and searched by British officers, and our Government authorities are silent. Our consuls placed at England's bidding, and our official correspondence opened, delayed, censored, and destroyed, and this British-loving, craven diplomat at the head of our Department of State tamely submits.

How the blood of Dewey and Schley, of Miles and Lee, and every man who wears the blue, must boil with helpless rage at these unresented insults to our flag. The men in the Navy, the men in the Army, the men in the workshops and on the farm, Americans, patriots everywhere, want to know what is this secret understanding with England that causes our truckling to her behests. Is this Administration so recreant to all the teachings of our history, has it fallen so low as to enter into an alliance with that nation, whose flag is found, as Labouchere, in the Truth, of London, says:

And the winds of the world made answer,
North, south, and east, and west:
"Wherever there's wealth to covet,
Or land that can be possess'd;
Wherever are savage races
To cozen, coerce, and scare,
Ye shall find the vaunted ensign,
For the English flag is there!

* * * *

"Where is the flag of England?
Go sail where rich galleons come,
With shoddy and loaded cottons,
And beer and Bibles and rum:
Go, too, where brute force has triumphed,
And hypocrisy makes its lair,
And your question will find its answer,
For the flag of England is there!"

The daughters of the American Revolutionary heroes have just been in session in this city, and they have recalled the days when France sent us Lafayette, sent us money and men and munitions of war, but for which we might be English colonists to-day, or else struggling like the Boers. Russia has ever stood close to us whenever there was need; and we have ever found in her government a friend. All the countries of the world, save England and Spain, have been friendly to us. The rabid Anglomaniacs of the East have sought to create the impression that England stood in the breach and kept the other powers from interfering in behalf of Spain during our late war; but their claims were not only never substantiated, but clearly disproved by those who were in position to know, and we are under no obligations to England for anything.

That such a condition can exist to-day, and in the United States, shows how far we have been led from the ancient landmarks, how the evils of imperialism have corrupted the head of the nation. It perhaps is but the logical sequence of the policy adopted by the Administration of entering upon a colonial system, fashioned after that of Great Britain, a complete departure from the fundamental doctrines and principles of our Republic.

Mr. Chairman, every consistent American hopes that this Congress will do that which is right. The people look to us with deep anxiety. From every pulpit in the land there rises prayers that our deliberations may be marked with wisdom and our conclusions founded on the principles of truth, justice, and right. The Christian, American sentiment of to-day earnestly desires that the Philippine question may soon be settled on an American basis, and that we upon whom the solution devolves under the Constitution may proclaim to the world that the time has not yet come when an American Congress shall deny to any people the right of self-government, or that we will ourselves palliate the crime against liberty shown by our criminal aggression and government by force. The simple question of the national independence or the complete subjugation of the Filipinos is not all that is at stake. American honor, good faith, and loyalty to republican institutions are to be tested before the world.

It can not be that the United States can safely acquire territory inhabited by 10,000,000 people who are never to be given a share in political power, because this country can never exist in a divided state. A house divided against itself can not stand, and a nation can not have absolute despotism in one portion of its borders and remain a free republic in the remainder. If we take the evidence of Admiral Dewey and those who, like him, have had opportunity for observation and are competent to judge, then the people of the Philippine Islands are better fitted for self-government than the people of Cuba, and we should assure them that the independence for which they have so long contended and which we promised to aid them to secure will not be denied them.

If, on the other hand, we ignore Dewey and the official reports of our Army officers, and accept the tales of scheming, truckling placemen, and syndicate-bound commissions, then, I ask, would it be wise and prudent to annex 10,000,000 of "outlaws, Malays, heathens, and barbarians" to our voting population? I believe that the people of the Philippines should be left to work out their own destiny under the directing care of divine Providence. They are struggling to-day, they are suffering the horrors of war—war, not rebellion, but war—with all its agonies, that they may indeed have their native country free, rather than that the virgin acres of their island homes should be prostituted to and mortgaged for all time to the bonded slavery of the syndicates of greed, which alone is guiding and directing this war.

Do you speak to me of the honor of our flag and the honor and glory of the American soldier? Such words from the lips of the advocates and defenders of this policy of imperialism are sacrilege and, in verity, blasphemous. To no man do I yield in my love of and devotion to my country's flag; to none do I give place in bestowing the full meed of glory and honor to the American soldier. Only a few days since I stood on this floor in his defense, when the agent of the great trusts sat silent in his seat, submitting to insults cast upon the boys in blue; scarce a fortnight since I said in this Chamber:

> The soldier of the United States stands unique in the history of the world. The records of the ages show us no such sacrifices, no such devotion, no such love of country, and no such heroic achievements as the history of the American soldiery presents.

I was a soldier myself, and I know from experience—from my association with thousands of my comrades—how the soldiers love and honor the flag, and what their valor is. I am honored by a son in the United States Navy, and palsied would be my tongue ere I would say a word or harbor a thought against our glorious Navy, over which floats the Stars and Stripes.

But if that starry flag could speak, if it could give utterance to the true sentiments which it symbolizes, if it was endued with sentient being, it would droop with shame and its tones would wail on the breezes of the Orient saying, "How are the mighty fallen. I came to wave here, not from mercenary motives, not for gold or diamonds or conquest, but for humanity's cause. I came to bring to you glad tidings of great joy, that the great country where I had my birth had on the wings of destiny sent me to shower the blessings of freedom and independence upon you and aid you in the spread of education, virtue, temperance, and patriotic devotion to country throughout every isle in this beautiful archipelago. Alas, how vain my hope! I behold a land deluged with blood, ravaged by disease and death, not alone of the Filipino's loved sons, but of, oh, so many of our dear, precious, brave American boys. I see a sight ne'er known before on Luzon's shores—400 saloons. I see Christians murdered and warred upon by order of those who have throttled the wishes of my people, while they court and dally with the pagans in the harems of the Sultan of Sulu. I wave the emblem of liberty over a government of slaves."

All this and more could be said in very truth, and yet, knowing all this, the champions of unholy greed and despotic imperialism dare to profane their lips by invoking the flag and appealing to the sacred cause of liberty. O tempora! O mores! O Liberty! what crimes and treasons are committed in thy name! Now, let me quote a few words spoken by the consul-general of the United States, Spencer Pratt, at Singapore, on June 8, 1898, when presenting an American flag to the Filipinos of Singapore, at a meeting held to express their gratitude to Admiral Dewey for assisting Aguinaldo to secure "independence under the protection of the United States." Mr. Pratt said:

> This flag was borne in battle and is the emblem of that very liberty you are seeking to attain. Its red stripes represent the blood that was shed for the cause, the white the purity of the motive, the blue field the azure of the sky, the stars the free and independent States of the Union. Take it and keep it as a souvenir of this occasion.

What a sad awakening from the dream of hope inspired by the representatives of American honor came to these Filipinos when there came the proclamation of President McKinley telling them that his intention was to "benevolently assimilate" them. From the Executive Mansion here in Washington, at the dictation of the associated syndicates and trusts—whose greed and corruption panted after the treasures of Luzon greater than the "hart panteth after cooling streams," and hungered for franchises more than the Israelites of old "longed for the fleshpots of Egypt"—William McKinley signed his name to the proclamation prepared for him by these same syndicates, a proclamation so brazenly unjust and cruel that even Otis was moved to blue pencil and modify before he dare publish it. Shameful is our record! [Applause.]

> There is the moral of all human tales;
> 'Tis but the same rehearsal of the past.
> First freedom, and then glory—when that fails,
> Wealth, vice, corruption—barbarism at last.
> And history, with all her volumes vast,
> Hath but one page.

Centuries come and centuries go. Nation after nation rises to commanding influence and heights of glory, and then decay. We, as a people, have reached a preeminence beyond all that the most enthusiastic dreamer or prophet of the past ever hoped for. Shall we maintain our leadership and press onward, marking in our advancement the dawn and oncoming of the millennium, or shall we, too, pass away and our record be put down upon the annals of time as a failure?

That failure can only come to us as a people through our own actions. If we are faithful and true to the principles of truth upon which our Republic was founded; if justice and right shall so move upon the hearts of the people as to cause them to rise in their strength and say, "We will not follow after strange gods," then there is hope for our future.

We have but just celebrated the birthday of Washington. Shall we revere his memory and depart from his teachings? But if we follow the schemes of the Republican leaders of to-day we most assuredly will be led away from the plain paths of duty and right.

The Administration and its friends seem to be afraid of calling their course and policy by its right name. They try, under cover of the word "expansion," to hide their imperialism. That, too, while they try to make possible the "divine right" to govern confined to a few. They try to teach that "The king can do no wrong," that the king and State are one, and therefore opposition to the passing McKinley is treason to our country. This is the result which Senator HANNA and his syndicate backers are seeking and striving to accomplish.

It is indeed a far cry from HANNA to Lincoln, yet I am reminded as the Republican speakers have been eulogizing Lincoln at banquets so recently, that it was Lincoln who, in speaking on the "Spot resolution," announced his "uncompromising antagonism to the course of the Administration in regard to the war on Mexico." Mr. Lincoln was denounced by the representatives of the shoddy contractors then, as "taking the side of the common enemy of the country," even as the patriots of to-day who can not indorse the acts of HANNA and his associates, as represented in the imperialism of McKinley, are denounced as "traitors." For me, I would rather choose to be called a "traitor" in company with Washington, Lafayette, Lincoln, and HOAR, than to be such "patriots" as Benedict Arnold, HANNA, Quay, and the trust bosses of the present day. [Applause.]

This Government was not organized to promote corruption, to go into the real-estate business, to barter and sell, nor to maintain an open slave market; neither did our fathers design that we should go into partnership with polygamy; and yet that is exactly what this Administration has been doing, and seeks to defend by well-turned phrases and hypocritical "moral reasons." Well has that aged statesman of England, John Morley, said:

First, you push on into territories where you have no business to be, and where you had promised not to go; secondly, your intrusion provokes resentment, and in these wild countries resentment means resistance; thirdly, you instantly cry out that the people are rebellious and that their act is rebellion (this in spite of your own assurance you have no intention of setting up a permanent sovereignty over them); fourthly, you send a force to stamp out their rebellion; and fifthly, having spread bloodshed, confusion, and anarchy, you declare, with hands uplifted to the heavens, that moral reasons force you to stay; for, if you were to leave, this territory would be left in a condition which no civilized power could contemplate with equanimity or composure.

If our President had followed his natural desires and his religious instincts, this terrible arraignment would not, could not, have been made, but under the malignant influence of his evil advisers, at the sacrifice of the highest national welfare, he has adopted a policy that has cast a dark and damnable stain upon our national honor, and should bring about the overthrow of the party he has sought to serve. As I believe that God reigns, I believe that the continuance of this purpose and policy will not only result in our national mortification, but will mark the beginning of our national downfall.

In our own land the natural sequence of this policy is seen in the bloody scenes in Kentucky and in the military reign of terror in Idaho. It is also found in the advent of leprosy on our shores, in the coming of the dread bubonic plague, in the long death roll of our brave American boys, and the still longer roll of emaciated, diseased, and insane victims of neglect and exposure, made so by the inefficiency of the epauletted sycophants in our army in the Philippines, who care naught for the private in the ranks, but lick the hand of the Administration and permit no news to come to this country that might "hurt the Administration."

A few days ago, here in our capital city, the funeral services of the gallant Lawton were held, and in two beautiful cities of the West brave Logan and Armstrong were laid to rest. At Lawton's funeral the President and his Cabinet were present, and well might they be there as chief mourners. Methinks, as the slow cortège passed along, as the solemn dirge echoed on the clear air, as the volleys for the dead resounded over Arlington's hills, there must have been a moment when their hearts were thrilled and touched at the thought that upon them and upon their heads alone rested the blame of this needless sacrifice. If, however, for one moment humanity held sway over their hearts, it was only for a moment. Greed, avarice, covetousness, and ambition speedily resumed their domination, and the untold agony, the useless slaughter, in comparison with which millions of treasure were but a bagatelle, was forgotten in the glamour of the imperial crown. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I plead for peace, but only for peace with honor. Give to the struggling Filipinos liberty and independence; send them messages of good will; help them to establish on their hilltops and in their valleys the American schoolhouse, wherein liberty, virtue, honor, and truth are taught in common with science, art, and literature, and a brighter aureole of glory will shine around our name than all the gold and treasure of the whole world could purchase.

Mr. Chairman, I hope for and confidently expect Democratic success at the coming election, but I would willingly forego party triumph if in the ascendency of the Republican party even a fair modicum of justice to the great body of the American people were assured, but, judging by its recent record and history, its success would be the bitterest cruelty to America, its triumph would be the fastening of the chains of industrial slavery upon my compatriots, and the enthronement of syndicates and trusts of foreign breed and foreign hearts. [Applause.]

The Republican party exists to-day solely by virtue of the immense fund raised for its preservation by the protected trusts, to whom it has given legislative authority to practice robbery. These trusts, in their turn, from their ill-gotten hoards, still are expected to keep in power the organized party of corruption, that only panders to their greed and rapacity. Trusts are unlawful combinations in restraint of trade. They reduce, by destroying competition, both producers and consumers to commercial helplessness and servitude.

This Government has an anti-trust law on its statute books that our Supreme Court has declared constitutional and operative. But the Administration has an Attorney-General from the trust miasmatic State of New Jersey, and it is his duty to prosecute and enforce that law. Does he do it? No, indeed. He sits in the council of the nation, representing the Department of Justice, a mockery. He is a member of the Cabinet of a President whose election was secured by these identical trusts; and if he dared to move against them, he would be attacking his creators, striking the breasts that gave him sustenance, and fighting the very life and hope of his party. There is no hope for relief from the trust evil through the Republican party, because that party and the trusts are bound together by the umbilical cord of common interests and mutual plunder. There can never come hope for the people for relief from the ravages of this hideous wrong and injustice until the Democratic party is in power to make and enforce law. [Applause.]

This Republican party in the ship-subsidy scheme propose to build up another trust and compel the taxpayers of the land, under compulsion, to contribute to the development and maintenance of a huge monopoly.

To-day there are already vast protected corporations which overshadow the Government itself. In the suit recently instituted between two of the "infant-industry" rogues, Carnegie and Frick, in the papers filed, Mr. Frick's attorney says:

The business from 1882 to 1900 was enormously profitable, growing by leaps and jumps from year to year, until in 1899 the firm actually made on low-priced contracts in net profits, after paying all expenses of all kinds, $21,000,000. In November, 1899, Carnegie estimated the net profits for 1900 at $40,000,000, and Frick then estimated them at $42,000,000. Carnegie valued the entire property at over $250,000,000 and avowed his ability in ordinarily prosperous times to sell the property on the London market for £100,000,000, or $500,000,000.

And this showing by a firm capitalized at only $25,000,000.

This party still keeps in operation the war tax; their necessities in carrying out their imperialistic policy demands it, and as a consequence the old soldier, the veterans of the civil war, are denied their just dues, and thousands all over our land are feeling the galling humiliation of charity or suffering the woes of starvation, sacrifices to Republican greed.

Internal improvements are stayed, and our public buildings are becoming a byword and are pointed to with shame by the progressive citizens of our land. Our harbors are being neglected and are fast becoming menaces to our shipping, instead of places of refuge and safety, and all that the lords of the Republican party may have their sweet will and pleasure.

They have laid their hands upon the money of our country and defrauded the people out of one-half of their just currency. I can not characterize this action better than the following quotation:

Mr. Cleveland during all his years as the head of the Government was dishonoring one of the precious metals, one of our own products. He endeavored even before his inauguration to office to stop the coinage of silver dollars, and afterwards and to the close of his Administration persistently used his power to that end. He was determined to contract the circulating medium and demonetize one of the coins of commerce, limit the volume of money, make money scarce and therefore dear. He would have increased the value of money and diminished the value of everything else—money the master, everything else the servant. He was not thinking of "the poor" then. He had left "their side." He was not "standing forth in their defense." Cheap coats, cheap labor, and dear money; the sponsor and promoter of these professing to stand guard over the welfare of the poor and lowly! Was there ever more glaring inconsistency or reckless assumption?

Whose words are these? Who so eloquently championed the cause of the money of the people? William McKinley. At a "Lincoln banquet" in Toledo, Ohio, in 1881, before he had been hypnotized by Hanna. [Laughter.] Now, while I am quoting from "Philip sober," let me refer to a spirited attack upon McKinley's policy of imperialism in the Philippines, the act of "Philip drunk." At the New England dinner in Philadelphia, in 1890, William McKinley, then Congressman, declared that "human rights and constitutional privileges must not be forgotten in the race for wealth and commercial supremacy." That would almost fit the discussion of the Porto Rican question.

Then, again, hear the eloquent words that fall from his lips:

The government of the people must be by the people, and not by a few of the people; it must rest upon the free consent of the governed, and all of the governed. Power, it must be remembered, which is secured by oppression, or usurpation, or by any form of injustice, is soon dethroned. We have no right in law or morals to usurp that which belongs to another, whether it is property or power.

Now, these quotations may make my remarks "treasonable" and forbidden the mails, but in 1881, in 1890, and down to his election in 1896, there was not a more bitter enemy of the single gold standard or of imperialism than Mr. McKinley; but to-day, to-day, "What a fall is there, my countrymen." [Laughter and applause.]

For over a century as a people we have toiled and labored in the building of a nation. We have bled, have oft drank the blood of other nations, and once drank deeply of our own. Our hopes, our aspirations, and all our struggles have been to build up a nation which should be to all mankind—

The land of the free
And the home of the brave—

within whose borders no wrong or injustice could remain unrighted, where human liberty and freedom should be enthroned to remain as long as human liberty should be. Our fathers planned foundations deep and broad, and in the fabric of the superstructure builded all that was best and true. To us the heritage came, and to our posterity we should hand it down unstained and undimmed by aught that might pale its luster, lessen its glory, or lower its crown of virtue and honor.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud of my country. I love it and her institutions; but, sir, I fear for its perpetuity. I arraign the Republican party as seeking to destroy this Republic. I charge it with being false to our national honor, with trampling under foot the Declaration of Independence, and attempting to override the Constitution. I charge it with endeavoring to stifle liberty and oppress humanity, with betraying the hopes of the people and consigning them to the serfdom of financial slavery. I charge it with the desire to institute imperialism and militarism in our free Republic and bring upon our people all the horrors and burdens of a large standing army and forced conscription. I charge it with making covenant with "those twin relics of barbarism," polygamy and slavery, and bringing them under the protection of the United States and our flag. And yet I cling to the hope that an outraged people will speedily awake, cast off their chains, and in the power of their glorious manhood assert their strength, driving forever from power and opportunity to do evil this party which so dishonors our national flag.

When our embattled farmers stood
With their proud flag unfurled,
And in the name of Freedom fired
The shot heard round the world,
The flag that thus they lifted high
For all mankind to see
Was christened in their patriot blood
The Banner of the Free!

Long wave the flag so nobly borne
By freemen stanch and true,
The finest flag in all the world,
The old Red, White, and Blue!
God grant above no conquered race,
Whose rights unheeded be,
Shall float the flag we love to call
The Banner of the Free!

[Applause.]

The Late Garret A. Hobart.

HON. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, January 26, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the House has received with profound sorrow the intelligence of the death of GARRET A. HOBART, late Vice-President of the United States.

"Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private virtues of the deceased may be appropriately commemorated.

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate"—

Mr. GROSVENOR said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The death of GARRET A. HOBART brings forcibly to our minds some features of our political history which, aside from the personal consideration, are of profound importance. The office of Vice-President has not been considered by our people as possessing that degree of importance which it would seem ought to appertain to that position. Death has more than once laid low the President of the United States and opened that great office to the constitutional successor. Six different Vice-Presidents have died in office—George Clinton, Elbridge Gerry, William R. King, Henry Wilson, Thomas A. Hendricks, and now GARRET A. HOBART. I wish to call attention to an event in our history curious, interesting, and important. It reflects upon the necessity of careful arrangement in the matter of succession in high office.

Thomas A. Hendricks, who had been elected Vice-President with Mr. Cleveland at his first term, died during a vacation of Congress. In other words, he died when there was no House of Representatives in existence as an organized body. Mr. Hendricks had studiously prevented the election of a President pro tempore of the Senate. The construction given to the constitutional provision that "in the absence of the Vice-President or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States" the Senate might elect a President pro tempore operated to permit the Vice-President to preside so constantly in the Senate that no temporary presiding officer could be elected. And so it was that when Mr. Hendricks died there was no President pro tempore of the Senate. Nor was there a Speaker of the House of Representatives; for the House of Representatives had expired on the 4th of March preceding. The effect of this was to leave but one life between organized government and chaos; and that life was the life of Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. Cleveland did not go to the funeral of his vice-presidential associate. There was very considerable criticism in the press and everywhere throughout the country because of what seemed to be an indifference manifested by Mr. Cleveland. Afterwards the real reason came out, and was complimentary to the kindly nature and generous heart of Mr. Cleveland. He was preparing for the long journey in the inclement weather of November to attend the funeral at Indianapolis, when the question suggested itself to some one—not the President, as it was understood—that it was hardly the right thing for him to do, to travel all the way to Indianapolis, exposing himself to the danger of railroad accidents and other contingencies, and upon the advice of gentlemen of both parties Mr. Cleveland withdrew his engagement and remained in the city of Washington.

It is easy to see how wise was his precaution. Had he been killed in an accident or in any other way lost his life, there was no chart to guide the people of the country in supplying his place. Thereupon, and for this reason, and growing out of this very circumstance, as I understand, Congress passed the existing law cutting off the succession of the Speaker of the House and conferring it (following the Vice-President, the successor by the terms of the Constitution) upon the Secretary of State and successively upon the other members of the Cabinet in the order named in the statute. This covers all the members of the Cabinet except the Secretary of Agriculture, an office created since the passage of that law and which, therefore, was not enumerated by the act. And so we have assured safety again.

GARRET A. HOBART brought the office of Vice-President to a higher degree of value than it had ever had since we were acquainted with the operations of the Government. He was a man of strong personality, a man of high business qualifications, thorough political training and sagacity, genial-minded, warm-hearted, a lovable and admirable personality. And he came to his high office with a purpose to cooperate, not segregate, the office. His nomination at St. Louis was not the accident of political movements by any means. To a great many men who participated in the preconvention politics of 1896 the nomination of HOBART was as well assured before Congress adjourned as it was after the ballot was declared.

He was a fitting coadjutor of the splendid Administration of William McKinley. This is no time nor place, perhaps, to eulogize the current Administration. It may be proper, however, to say that in all its personality, in all its conduct of affairs, the mode and manner of its procedure, the contact of its officials with the public, the dignity and bearing of the Chief Magistrate and those about him, this Administration has been popular and admirable. And there was not one feature of the Administration, aside from the great personality of the President, that was so attractive to the people of the United States as was the personality and participation of HOBART.

As I have said, he did not come here to isolate his office and simply be the presiding officer of the Senate, but he came here to become of the Administration, to be of its councils, to be of its advisers. And the President gladly availed himself of the wisdom, the knowledge, and the administrative ability of the Vice-President. Their friendship was as the friendship of brothers. The proximity of the residence of the Vice-President to the Executive Mansion made association easy, and all forms of dignified distance and ceremonial intercourse were for the most part set aside. A close association between the President and the Vice-President was one of the great features of the period.

Mr. HOBART stamped himself upon the results of legislation. He had no vote, but he had a voice, and his judgment commended itself to Senators and Representatives. During his incumbency of the Vice-Presidential office more than one great event in legislation happened. The enactment of the Dingley law and the ratification of the Spanish treaty were two most memorable contests; and no man outside of the President had more to do with carrying those measures to a successful issue than did GARRET A. HOBART. His wisdom, his just appreciation of others, his kindness of heart, his magnetism, and his personality in general made him a great factor in reaching the results that grew out of those matters.

Of his social life I had but limited personal knowledge; yet I came to be impressed, as others did, with the warmth of his character, with his geniality. He came in contact with American citizens as an American citizen. He had no pride of place that compared with his pride and love of home and home ties. Others will speak more fully of these characteristics. As husband and father, as citizen and politician, as Vice-President, and as a high official in other places his life was above criticism, his efficiency beyond disparagement, and his memory will be to us all a benediction.

Mr. Speaker, I bow with reverence and humility before the awful blow that Providence delivered upon the American people in the untimely death of HOBART. I seek to look beyond the darkness of the clouds that lower upon us, and have faith to believe that beyond them there shines the light of the countenance of the Father of us all, who "doeth all things well." But it is difficult sometimes to feel that degree or reconciliation that is due; we naturally come back to the human standard, and wonder while we bow our heads. We must be rescued from a condition of revolt by the assurance, which we must take with blind faith, "He doeth all things well."

Trade of Porto Rico.

"A great empire and little minds go ill together."

HON. TOWNSEND SCUDDER,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCUDDER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Something higher than party politics, something nobler than campaign expediency, is demanded of the President and the Congress of the United States by the American people.

Expansion has not been accepted by the great body of intelligent citizens of our country with unqualified satisfaction. It is fair to assume that but a small majority would have supported the proposition by their votes had the present extension of the jurisdiction and the resulting responsibilities of the Republic been presented at the polls.

The situation confronting us was not of our choosing. We were drawn into it by the force of circumstances fresh in the minds of all; I need not dwell upon them; a situation incident to our life as a great nation, attended by difficulties, by complications, and by dangers, it is true, but as a people we have no cause for alarm provided we be true to ourselves and true to our obligations to those whose lot has been cast with our own henceforth and forever. Conditions are to be accepted as they exist. The time for protestation has passed. We have expanded. Now is the time to act wisely and in keeping with the lofty motive which justified our interference in the affairs of Cuba, justified the war we waged with Spain, the war we gloriously won.

We destroyed the Spanish fleets in the Pacific and in the Atlantic; we stormed her cities and captured her armies; we drove her from the west and from the east; we took Porto Rico and the Philippines by way of indemnity for the cost of the war, and we paid Spain $20,000,000 to boot—just why I have never been quite able to understand. All this was accomplished by the sovereign will of the American people expressed through their agents in Congress. Porto Rico and the Philippines are ours by virtue of a title recognized by every civilized nation—the title of conquest. The wisdom of taking these islands is no longer a question of practical concern. That they are ours is a fact. Their retention is assured, and it should be recognized that they are to be permanent possessions of the United States, disqualified to be admitted to our Union as States, because we did not take Porto Rico, nor the Philippines, nor Hawaii to make States of them. Neither should we make a State of Cuba, in the event of her wishing to be annexed to this country.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution was made by the States, and is for the States, and for them alone. Territories are the property of the United States, and Congress can dispose of them as it pleases. This does not mean that the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is denied to the inhabitants of Territories. They can have, under local regulations, every personal property and business right and protection enjoyed by our citizens under the laws of the Republic, but they can not come into our Union, be represented in the Federal House or the Senate, and take part in the making of laws for the Union or in the election of President and Vice-President of the Republic. These are privileges reserved for States. Statehood is not for them, and should not be for them, and will not be for them with the approbation of the people of the United States; and all this because our Government can not endure permanently half white, half black, red, brown, and mixed; half civilized and educated, half pagan and barbarian; half northern and western, half tropical and oriental; half naked, half clothed; one-half a homogeneous continent, the other half numberless islands extending half way around the globe, striving all to join harmoniously in the government of this land of ours, freed by our fathers with their lifeblood and bestowed upon us as a sacred legacy.

No; statehood is not for these possessions, this new property that has come to us unsought; to statehood they are not entitled, nor for it are they qualified. Justice, however, is their due and justice must be done them. It is the duty of Congress to decide quickly what is needful and proper in respect to each outlying possession by itself considered. Mr. Chairman, it is the case of Porto Rico, which is now before us, and our duty is plain to decide what is needful and proper for that island by itself alone considered. In my opinion this bill should not pass, but free trade with Porto Rico should be established. If a deficit be found in the revenues of the island, an appropriation of moneys should be made out of the general fund in the National Treasury to meet that deficit.

Free trade will benefit the producers in Porto Rico; it will benefit the consumers in the United States; it will go a long way toward simplifying the problem of government in the island.

The high protectionists who are objecting to free trade between the United States and our territory in Porto Rico, and those who are quibbling about the constitutional power of Congress over national territory, would better turn their attention to the history of the continental colonies and to the events of the past twenty years in the West Indies and in the Philippines. The inciting cause of revolution and of insurrection has been taxation. The school children know that the American Revolution was provoked because the Government in London taxed the colonies, now forming part of the United States, for its benefit and exploited them for the enrichment of the home country. The British had not yet learned that colonies can not be retained by any such plan. The modern colonial policy of intelligent nations is one which gives to the colonies and dependencies the greatest possible liberty and independence and which lays upon them no burden of taxation not necessary to their government. Great Britain follows such a policy, and that is why Canada and Australia remain loyal to the home country and why they are sending soldiers to fight her battles in South Africa now, where an attempt is making to extend the same liberties and privileges to the English-speaking people there.

Spain, which is not a modern nation, but rather a survival from mediævalism, consistently treated her colonies as the private game preserves of the mother country. No poachers were allowed. She raised tariff barriers between the United States and Cuba and Porto Rico so high that the Porto Ricans and the Cubans were forced to trade with Spain, and what they could not buy there they had to get here, and pay twice or three times as much for it as it cost the Americans. Yet Cuban and Porto Rican sugar and tobacco were sold largely in this market, in competition with the product of men who paid less than half as much for their flour and their meat as the West Indians paid. The islands in the Caribbean Sea belong in the commercial system of the United States. Spain attempted to force them from that system by discriminating tariff and shipping laws. It was rebellion against this crime against nature which caused the Cuban insurrection and which led the United States to interfere in the interests of humanity. And from this interference has come our possession of Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands.

Now, we regret to see that there are high protectionists so blind to the teachings of experience that they would have the United States repeat the fatal blunder of Spain in Porto Rico and in the Philippines. They are talking about the ruin that will be wrought on American tobacco growers and beet-sugar growers if the free-trade bill framed by the House Committee on Insular Affairs extending the tariff and revenue laws to Porto Rico shall be passed. If that bill or something like it is not passed, the people of the United States will be guilty of one of the gravest economic and political crimes of the century. We have taken Porto Rico from Spain, and by that act have deprived her of the benefit of the trade relations which she enjoyed with that country, and we have not opened our markets to her nor her markets to our food stuffs. To-day there is a wall around her; she is isolated; and her last state is worse than her first. It is too late now to consider whether a group of producers in the United States will benefit or suffer by free trade with Porto Rico.

If that question were not considered and decided before Porto Rico was taken, it must be regarded as decided now and decided in favor of the Porto Ricans. No man with a comprehension of the problem involved can for a moment advocate anything else than the freest trade relations between the United States and their territory in the West Indies. The establishment of such relations was a moral obligation that we assumed the moment we took the territory from Spain. And if we do not establish these relations, we have annexed a rabbit warren of insurrections justified and excused by the same unjust exploitation of territory for the benefit of the home country that excused and justified the rebellion against Spanish extortion in Cuba. A fatal mistake will be made if we allow the bigger problem of statesmanship to be obscured by consideration of petty questions of Federal revenue or by the demand of one or two interests for protection against competition with people living under the same flag with them.

I am quoting freely from editorials in the Brooklyn Eagle, which seems to me most sound on this Porto Rican problem.

In the popular mind the Porto Rican case is different from that of Cuba or the Philippines. It came under the protection of the Stars and Stripes more than willingly—gladly. We can not afford to forget that we sent an army under General Miles to conquer Porto Rico. That army went prepared to meet the fiercest resistance, not only from the soldiers of Spain, but from the inhabitants of the island. What was the fact? From the landing at the port of Ponce to the entrance into San Juan the resistance was nominal and the welcome was generous. General Miles and his armies were everywhere greeted as deliverers. When they entered San Juan the children, dressed in white, strewed flowers before the feet of our marching soldiers.

Suppose, when we were expanding so blithly in August, 1898, when the Porto Ricans were scattering flowers before our invading armies and shouting, "Vivan los Americans!" some cynic had said: What fools! These people have seen their best days. Spain has been their true benefactor; Spain has made them prosperous. Under American rule their industries will decay, their laborers will starve, their crops will rot on their wharves; the Americans will let them go to ruin, lest they bother them in their markets. What should we have said to that base libeler of this country?

Mr. Chairman, the present condition of Porto Rico would have been absolutely incredible and inconceivable to Americans of two years ago.

Porto Rico has become American territory. The President of the United States, the Secretary of War, and the Governor-General of the island, after careful study of the situation, were of one mind—that we should abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Porto Rico and give her products free access to our markets. Here was a remarkable concensus of opinion among the men who were in the best position to judge what was due to Porto Rico and what was due to ourselves, to our good faith, and to our sense of justice. It was hailed by the people of Porto Rico with delight as the measure of relief and help which they ardently desired and sorely needed. The Ways and Means Committee gave support to the proposition of the President and his advisers and brought in a bill for free trade with Porto Rico.

But, Mr. Chairman, suddenly a change came over the members of this committee—their free-trade bill is withdrawn and this bill introduced, placing the people of Porto Rico in the position of foreigners toward the great Republic under whose flag they so eagerly sought refuge. I do not dispute the legal right to enact this law. I believe that Porto Rico and the Philippines are Territories, in other words, property, of the United States; that Congress can do what it pleases to them, or with them, or for them, or against them, and that whatever it does will neither be constitutional nor unconstitutional, because the Constitution is not for Territories, and Territories are not under or within the protection and rights of the Constitution, unless or until Congress, by law, may choose to put them there.

Congress has not chosen to put them there, and probably will not, because that would place them in a condition of incipient statehood, which, when it materialized into statehood, would authorize for them representation in the House and in the Senate and participation in the election of President and Vice-President. The inhabitants of those territories are citizens of that Republic of which the name is "the United States," and in that respect are "citizens of the United States," but they do not have the rights of citizens of States, and will not have until the islands are made States, an event very unlikely to occur in a long while, if ever.

I oppose this bill because it will perpetrate a wrong; because it taxes these impoverished people unjustly, taxes their necessities, among them rice, the principal food of their poor, 25 per cent of its value. I oppose the bill because it is an unwarranted and unrighteous exercise of the power I concede to be vested in Congress, but which Congress can not exercise in this way with honor or credit to the American people.

Against Porto Rico we have closed the markets of Cuba. Those of Spain are also closed to her as a result of the war, and now this bill proposes to close her only remaining market—that of the United States.

To these oppressed people our President issued some few months ago a proclamation:

> We have come to bestow upon you the blessings and immunities of the liberal institutions of our Government.

Is this the beneficent rule we promised her under the Stars and Stripes? Is this the prosperity we held out as a relief from Spanish oppression? Are these export and import burdens the "immunities of our liberal institutions?"

In the light of recent events this Presidential proclamation has a hollow ring.

Dispatches from Porto Rico show that the condition of that island, which welcomed our troops so enthusiastically, is most deplorable. There is no money to plant new crops or to pay laborers, thousands of whom are on the point of starvation. The local press expresses the opinion that the conditions were better during the darkest days of the Spanish régime.

Imagine that, and try to put yourself in the place of the American citizen who is willing to have that shame remain upon the American flag because he thinks that if the starving Porto Ricans were allowed to sell their products freely in our markets, as the President has recommended, his profits might be diminished by their competition.

The President in his message favored free trade, which is only another name for good faith, with Porto Rico. That was to his honor, and it will remain so until he retracts it, especially, if not retracting it, he should reiterate it to the Congress of the United States.

We are now told the President favors this bill.

It is not dignified for a President of the United States, after pointing out for the information of Congress and the country the course demanded by "our plain duty," straightway, from terror inspired by the protected clique, to leave the people in doubt whether or not he continues to think so. It is not dignified in him to allow himself to be quoted, or to be quotable, on both sides of a question which, according to his own declaration, is a question of public morals as well as of public policy.

This bill is branded with meanness, with perfidy, with cruelty. It is un-American, foreign to the temperament of our people, repulsive to their sense of justice. Being unworthy of them, it will, and justly, be condemned by them.

Mr. Chairman, our honor as a nation demands that our faith pledged to Porto Rico be kept. Statehood we did not promise her. We can afford no admixture upon an even footing in our body politic of Porto Rican, Hawaiian, Cuban, or Philippine ignorance and superstition. We did promise Porto Rico the "blessings and immunities of the liberal institutions of our Government." First amongst these ranks justice. We can be just to ourselves only by being just to our dependents.

When our duty appears so clear, why has the Committee of Ways and Means gone back upon the recommendations of the President and of the Secretary of War and of the matured opinion of its own members, as embodied in the first bill for the relief of Porto Rico? What was the influence more powerful than that of the Administration which has induced it to bring in a bill which is not what the Porto Ricans asked for?

What can the opposition be to this demand of "our plain duty" and of our plain interest? What can it be but the fear that when the wall of the tariff is once taken down in one place the whole heterogeneous fabric is bound to collapse? But do the subsidy hunters and the pap hunters really imagine that, lest they should lose some part of their hold upon our commercial legislation, Congress will deny the just claims of the people of Porto Rico, who have already deserved so well and suffered so grievously at our hands, and that the people of the United States will sustain Congress? I think they mistake the people's mind. The fact is, our high protectionists have been napping. The President thought them safely tucked in and decided to go it alone; he sent his message to Congress without consulting them. Theirs was a rude awakening! While they slept the country had drifted into troubled waters.

Here was danger of bringing in from a weak, petty island a certain amount of tobacco and sugar and oranges free of duty. So they "organized" and sent a delegation to Washington to remonstrate with Mr. McKinley.

It is a matter of indifference to this favored coterie whether the islanders are to be citizens or subjects. The political status of Porto Rico is nothing to them. Taxation without representation, or with it, is quite immaterial from their point of view. What they will not put up with in any event is the admission of Porto Rican products to the United States free of duty. If they could only realize how small the island really is in productive area and in population, and how its industries are crippled by want of capital and organization and effective labor, they would laugh at their own apprehensions.

The theory that any of the products of Porto Rico can come into destructive competition with business interests in the United States is an exaggeration. Even were it true, a measure of consideration by our people for the interests of humanity and of morals, with a willingness to let business interests take their chances under conditions created for this country as a trustee of the world and of liberty in an epoch significant to freedom and to progress, would be a grateful change-off from a commercialism of spirit of which there can be something too much and from which this Administration has not been free.

Truly this protected clique are needlessly alarmed. Long ago they lost their heads; now their hearts are gone as well.

There seems to be something about the influences of protection which, beginning by robbing the beneficiary of his independence, ends by robbing him of self-respect. Protection at best is a demoralizing thing and tends to pauperize the manhood of those dependent on its favors; but in the past we have had at least the excuse that its evils fell on the heads of those who had the right to vote against it. In this case the injury and wrong are done to helpless people whom we are pretending to rescue from the rapacity of a mediæval power.

Now, the safety of the United States in the task that it has undertaken in the Pacific, as well as in the Caribbean, lies in the capacity and willingness of our Government to administer the affairs of the new possessions for the best possible interest of their present and future inhabitants. If we can not and will not do that, we shall fail ignobly and disastrously. It will be a moral failure, and therefore painful for those who are sensitive as to the honor of the country. But it will also be a material failure, and will bring us an endless series of troubles. It is as fully established as any truth of governmental experience can be that the only solid and trustworthy basis for the rule of dependencies is the substantial content of the people. With that steady advance in prosperity is possible. Without that there is no limit to the expense, difficulty, strife, and confusion that the governing power must encounter, with no compensation whatever. The duty as well as the necessity of scrupulous respect for the interests and rights of the dependent people is increased in direct ratio that they are politically limited. Every act of injustice, of greed, on the part of the governing power is a weapon with which to resist its authority and thwart its purposes.

We must administer our new dependencies so as to gain their confidence, their faith, and good will. Along these lines we have been put to the test in the past and have met with success. There is no barrier to success now if we keep in view correct principles.

The policy we should pursue toward our possessions is this: Give them an honest and intelligent form of government; as they progress extend the system of local government; teach them to govern themselves until finally they shall be as free as is one of our Territories. This policy should include every effort to teach progress and to produce prosperity. Schools, railroads, good roads, public institutions—all these things must come as rapidly as possible. We must hold them close to us commercially, but to make them an integral part of the United States at the present time, which is practically another way of calling them and treating them as States, is absurd. It may be that the time will never come when it will be desirable to make States of them. Awaiting such time, we should bind these islands to us with the closest ties, both of governmental and commercial relations.

For generations this is as much as they can expect; it is all we promised them, all they are fitted and prepared to receive. I can not lend myself to the idea that races so distinct from our own can ever be admitted to a closer relationship with us.

Ours is a Union of equal and sovereign States, containing a homogeneous population, belonging to a race trained for centuries in the arts of self-government. It was by the slow and tedious processes of evolution that there were developed in the minds of the Anglo-Saxon the science of freedom and the ability to assert and maintain independence.

Centuries must come and go before these childish foreign races that have come under our jurisdiction and protection can qualify themselves to meet the responsibilities of our form and system of popular government to be administered by themselves for themselves.

Until that day we bear the burden; we can not shift it. Over Porto Rico the control of the United States has been substituted for that of Spain. As yet it has not been contended seriously—and may grounds for such contention never exist—that this change is for the worse. If we be true to our institutions, true to ourselves, true to the principles of the fathers who laid the foundation of this glorious nation of ours, the absolute tyrannically exercised power under which our acquired territories have groaned during centuries of Spanish misrule will have departed from their islands with the scattered remnants of the armies of Spain. May it be our proud boast that where we found an oppressed, weeping, starving people, we sowed seeds of hope, freedom, happiness, and plenty.

To our guidance and protection have these people been transferred and intrusted. Our responsibilities to them are great; greater should be our determination to quickly open to them the channels of education, of religion, of benevolence, of investment, of sanitation, of enterprise and commerce, and this so unselfishly, so generously, that all the world may have additional proof of the sincerity of our profession that humanity and not gain was our inspiring spirit and genius when we deserted the plowshare for the sword. Excepting in blessing the Stars and Stripes should never wave over land or sea. The enactment of this Republican bill into law will be a breach of faith on the part of a powerful nation with the distracted people of a little island, a breach of faith the less pardonable because we are so strong and the island so helpless. Let us not fall into that error lest our flag loose its gift of benediction. Gentlemen of the majority on the other side of the House—

"The question with me is not whether you have a right to render your people miserable, but whether it is not your interest to make them happy." [Loud applause.]

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN W. MADDOX,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 23, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. MADDOX said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The Committee on Ways and Means—that is, a majority of them—after much investigation have come to the conclusion that the term "United States" as used in section 8 and Article I has reference only to the States that constitute the Federal Union, and does not include Territories. The section construed by the Ways and Means Committee is as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Now, in order to justify the tariff bill before the House providing for duties on goods interchanged between this country and Puerto Rico there must be some way to circumvent the Constitution; so the Ways and Means Committee have come to the conclusion that this section of the Constitution does not apply to the Territories; therefore the provision which requires all taxes, imposts, duties, etc., shall be uniform throughout the United States does not apply to the bill under consideration. They contend that Congress has plenary power over the Territories and that we have the power to pass one law for New Mexico, a different one for Oklahoma, and still a different one for Puerto Rico. But the question is, Shall we accept their construction of the Constitution or shall we look elsewhere for light on the subject? I am glad to say that identical question has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and this section of the Constitution construed. Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for that court in the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, in 5 Wheaton, 660, said:

The power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any part of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises shall be observed in the one than the other.

This decision has been cited and affirmed by that court again in a later case, and attention has been called to it on this floor, and there is no decision of the courts that seemingly conflicts with this ruling, yet, on the other hand, is indirectly sustained by numerous decisions. Then the question naturally arses, Is Puerto Rico a Territory of the United States or not? If so, then, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, the term "United States" as used in this section does apply to the Territories, and our majority members of the Ways and Means Committee must be mistaken.

It will be observed that Chief Justice Marshall says that the term "United States" as here used is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories, and it is not less necessary on the principles of our Constitution that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises shall be observed in one than the other. So, if this be true, how can we levy a duty on the products of Puerto Rico? If Puerto Rico is not a part of the United States territory, what is it? It has been ceded to us by Spain, our flag floats over it, our Government is supreme there, and the inhabitants acknowledge their allegiance to us; and if they are not of us, who are they and what right have we to legislate at all for them?

Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly clear to me as to our duty in this matter. We have sworn to support and defend the Constitution, and with a due regard for that oath no man can afford to vote for this bill. Puerto Rico is undoubtedly United States territory, and Chief Justice Marshall says that the Territories are a part of the United States, and that duties and imposts must be uniform applies to Territories the same as to States.

Then this bill is in the very teeth of the Constitution. But I desire to call attention to the report of the committee again. They say that the term "United States" as here used in the Constitution has reference only to the States that constitute the Federal Union and does not include Territories; and yet, after deliberating on that question for days, they report this bill now under consideration, and it will be observed that they provide that a duty of 25 per cent shall be levied on all goods imported into the United States from Puerto Rico and the same amount shall be collected on all goods exported from the United States into Puerto Rico. The word "Territory" does not appear in this bill. Now, if the gentlemen are correct in their construction of this section of the Constitution, what is to prevent the Territories of New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory from shipping their goods free of duty into Puerto Rico, and Puerto Rico into the Territories? You have said and continue to say that the term "United States" as here used does not include the Territories.

I challenge you to show how this bill can prevent free trade with the Territories when you provide a tariff only from and to the United States. You do not say the United States and Territories thereof, as required in the report you have presented to this House. You say that the United States does not include the Territories. Then I will inquire if you purposely left out the Territories, proposing to give them free trade with Puerto Rico? If you did not, then in framing this bill you should have said, under your reasoning, that all imports from the United States and the Territories thereof entering the ports of Puerto Rico must pay a duty, etc., and all imports from Puerto Rico entering into the ports of the United States and Territories thereof shall pay so and so, but you do not say that. Now, if you stand by your report and your construction of the Constitution, in order to have made your bill apply to the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma and the Indian Territory you were bound to refer to them as Territories, because you say that the United States as here used does not include Territories; therefore, following your contention, there is nothing in this bill to prevent free trade with the Territories.

But you say that the Dingley rate will apply to all other countries, and you can collect that duty from the Territories. My reply to that is that they are not of another country, for you say in your argument that the Territories, geographically speaking, are in the United States; therefore they are not from another country. But in my opinion you originally framed this bill to read "the United States and Territories thereof," but it occurred to you, no doubt, that it would not look well from your standpoint to have a Territory collecting export and import tax from itself and would be absolutely ridiculous to the world, but your logic leads you gentlemen into these incongruities; your foundation is false, your conclusions are false.

But, Mr. Chairman, to show that the gentlemen who are insisting on the proposition that the term "United States" as here used does not include the Territories is an entirely new theory and never brought forward by any other statesman in this country, we have only to refer to the numerous acts that are now of force in this country which apply to the Territories and States alike and are being enforced in both States and Territories, where you will find the United States only used in the verbiage of these laws. The word "Territory" is not used at all; yet no court, no lawyer, no statesman until now ever found out that the United States did not include the Territories. The internal-revenue acts, under which we are now collecting the war tax, is absolutely inoperative in the Territories and District of Columbia, if the contention of the majority on the Ways and Means Committee is correct. Yet the Government is collecting its revenue from the District and Territories with clocklike regularity. Yet the word "Territory," or "Territories," does not appear in these laws. If you are right, gentlemen, by what authority do you collect these taxes?

I would ask you, further, how many men have been tried and convicted under statutes in the Territories passed by Congress in which the word "Territory" does not appear. Yet if you are correct, these men were illegally convicted. There are hundreds of just such statutes that would be rendered inoperative in the Territories, and your construction of the Constitution, if correct, would produce untold confusion. But what does that amount to when you intend to override the Constitution and the laws of the land in order that you may find some pretext to justify the imperial policy upon which you have just started? But gentlemen on that side of the House first started out on the theory that they must lay this tariff on Puerto Rico or it would be taken as a precedent for future legislation with regard to the Philippines, but when called down on that by showing that the precedent was already set by giving free trade to Hawaii, then they shifted their sails, and now claim that they must raise a revenue in this way for the purpose of building roads, establishing schools, and to aid the poor Puerto Ricans. Gentlemen, this last plea is nothing but hypocritical cant of the most transparent type.

When General Miles landed in Puerto Rico, he issued this proclamation:

PROCLAMATION OF MAJOR-GENERAL MILES.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Ponce, Puerto Rico, July 28, 1898.

To the inhabitants of Puerto Rico:

In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity, its military forces have come to occupy the island of Puerto Rico.

They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose to seek the enemies of our country and yours and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistance. They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold. Hence the first effect of this occupation will be the immediate release from your former political relations and, it is hoped, a cheerful acceptance of the government of the United States. The chief object of the American military forces will be to overthrow the armed authority of Spain and to give to the people of your beautiful island the largest measure of liberty consistent with this military occupation.

We have not come to make war upon the people of a country that for centuries have been oppressed, but, on the contrary, to bring you protection, not only to yourselves, but to your property, to promote your prosperity, and bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government. It is not our purpose to interfere with any existing laws and customs that are wholesome and beneficial to your people so long as they conform to the rules of military administration of order and justice. This is not a war of devastation, but one to give to all within the control of its military and naval forces the advantages and blessings of enlightened civilization.

NELSON A. MILES,
Major-General, Commanding United States Army.

When these ringing words went out to the inhabitants, they thought he, as the representative of this great Republic, meant what he said, and they welcomed our forces with open arms and aided them to drive the Spaniards out of that island. They are here to-day, acting through their various committees, asking us to live up to our promises. They represent every condition on that island—bankers, merchants, farmers, and even the politicians are represented—and they with one accord decline to ask alms of this country. They have suffered many misfortunes since the American forces occupied their island, but they ask nothing but the rights of American citizens—free trade with this country and a civil form of government with authority to borrow money on their own assets—and they would take care of themselves.

The President, in his message to Congress, when we first assembled, said it was our plain duty to give them free trade; the Secretary of War recommended it; the provisional governor of that island recommended it; the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee drew up a bill to authorize and carry out these recommendations; but things have changed all at once. The chairman now offers a substitute for his own bill levying a tariff on the products of Puerto Rico, a complete about face. The whole country is astounded. Who caused this change? Who is it that can stand aside the President, the Secretary of War, the governor, and turn the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee topsy-turvy? Gentlemen have attempted to account for this by saying if we grant free trade with Puerto Rico it must be extended to the archipelago. Was not that fact just as true, if true at all, when the President made his recommendation, concurred in by all the officers under him who were charged with the duty of looking after Puerto Rican affairs?

You have set aside any such argument by contending that you are authorized under the Constitution to legislate for these Territories as you please; that you can make one law for New Mexico, another for Oklahoma. Why talk about precedent when you can do as you please? If precedents are to control, then all the precedents are one way so far as our Territories in the geographical part of the United States are concerned, as you would say, but you have set the precedent by giving Hawaii free trade also; why do you not follow your precedent? When you are driven from this position, you say that you must raise revenue to support the island. Anyone who knows anything about the exports and imports of this island must know that this bill will not raise one-third of the amount necessary to be expended there, and you know as well and better than anyone else that that plea is but a mere subterfuge. Everything went well for these people until the sugar trust, tobacco trust, and other organizations who furnish campaign funds for the Republican party put in their appearance; then came the change.

Who is a President of this great Republic, a Cabinet officer, a governor, a chairman of the greatest committee of this House, when one of these vampires on the body politic calls a halt on legislation? Kings, emperors, and potentates never had the power in any age that enthroned wealth exercises in the Republican party. The Constitution of a free people must be overthrown at its behest. The highest and most exalted officers must stultify themselves at its command. These very facts should and doubtless will convince the country that if the Republic is to be maintained and our free institutions preserved, the Republican party must be retired from power.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have quoted from decisions of the Supreme Court rendered by men who have long since passed off the stage of action. They have quoted from dead statesmen. I send to the desk a letter from a living one which I desire read.

QUITMAN, GA., February 17, 1900.

Hon. JOHN W. MADDOX, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 12, in which you do me the honor to ask my views of the bill "to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico" (H. R. 8245), of which you send me a copy together with the report of the Committee on Ways and Means recommending its passage.

This bill proposes to levy upon all articles imported into the island from countries other than the United States the same duties that are required by law to be collected upon articles imported into the United States from foreign countries. As these duties were desired for the protection of manufactures as well as for revenue, and Puerto Rico being an agricultural country, the island under this provision of the bill would feel only the burdens of the tariff and none of its beneficence, so called. It is true that sugar and cigars are made in Puerto Rico, and fruits are from there; but nobody, I presume, would ever wish to import these articles into the island, for obvious reasons.

But this infliction, burdensome and daring as it will be to a people unfamiliar with its terms, to the making of which they had no part—still it might have been expected as an incident of annexation, or as the fate of war.

Being thus in large part cut off from their accustomed trade with foreign countries, this bill also proposes to levy 25 per cent of these tariff duties upon articles carried from the United States to the island, and from the island to the United States. In other words the inhabitants of Puerto Rico, by this bill, would have to pay what we pay under the general tariff, and in addition 25 per cent on their trade with us. By the majority of the committee this project is justified on the pretext that Puerto Rico and its people merely belong to us and form no part of us. The contention is that we are sovereign, and the Puerto Ricans are our subjects and vassals. This revolutionary scheme of government is based on a new theory of the Constitution, while the Constitution provides that "all duties, imports and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," it is insisted that the phrase "United States" has reference only to the States that compose the Federal Union, and does not include Territories.

To this startling view it ought to be sufficient to say that Chief Justice Marshall and Chief Justice Taney and their associates on the Supreme Bench established a different doctrine. The cases are familiar. It ought also to weigh against this new and dangerous assumption that all the acts of Congress proceed upon the contrary hypothesis. If in all cases in which our customs and revenue laws and penal statutes refer to the United States without more, the Territories are not included, this construction would result in very surprising confusion. As one illustration among a thousand of like character, let it be remembered that the first section of the act, commonly called the war-revenue act of 1898, the tax of $2 is imposed on all beer, ale, porter, and other similar fermented liquors brewed, manufactured, and sold or stored in warehouses, or removed for consumption or sale within the United States. Will it be contended that Congress meant to exclude the Territories, and that beer should be taxed as formerly only $1 in the Territories? It is needless to multiply these citations. I can not think that this absurd effort to stultify itself will be sanctioned by Congress.

What good reason can be given for overturning the judicial and Congressional precedents of a hundred years? It is conceded in the report of the majority of the committee that the free importation of Puerto Rican sugar and tobacco would not affect prices of these articles in the great volume of our trade; but it is said ultimately that it is the purpose of this bill to set a precedent against free trade with Cuba and the Philippine Islands. If uniformity of taxation is not desirable between the States and Territories, or maintainable as a constitutional requirement, why should uniformity be necessary in taxes and excises imposed on the Territories? The Hawaiian Islands already furnish an example of a Territory not subject to such an imposition.

Indeed, precedents seem to have very little weight in this new contention. If a Territory is outside of the Constitution, as claimed, then each might be treated according to its own circumstances. There is nothing in the condition of the people of this island to invite this oppressive exaction. They have lost their trade with the mother country and have been driven from their profitable trade with Habana. They did not resist our armies. The storm of last August destroyed the accumulation of years. Last year after the storm we were called upon to send contributions, through Government agencies, to prevent the people from starving. Shall we at the beginning of this year lay taxes upon their meat and bread? And to do this inhuman thing we must disregard the recommendations of the President, the well-considered views of the Secretary of War, and of all the official persons whom the President and Secretary have charged with responsibility in the island. Such an edict by Congress would be akin to the reconcentrado policy of General Weyler.

Spain had promised these people autonomy: they already had deputies to represent them in the Spanish Cortes. I would, of course, select the intelligent class of the island and give them a form of home government with power to propose their own taxes, and I would give them a Delegate in Congress, to be heard as their representative whenever taxation is there proposed. I would also try to impress them with that other fundamental American doctrine that they are to be governed by their own consent as long as they remain a part of this great Republic.

I have written very hastily and imperfectly, but you are at liberty to use this letter as you please.

With great respect, I am,

Very truly, yours,

HENRY G. TURNER.

The Puerto Rico Tariff.

With a due regard for the habits, customs, conditions, and characters of the new peoples and possessions placed in our charge, this nation will legislate for them in justice, humanity, and wisdom.

OF

HON. W. L. JONES,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Much has been said of the bill under consideration. It has been denounced as an act of tyranny, oppression, outrage, perfidy, and breach of faith. Those who have denounced it, however, have been very careful not to call the attention of the people to its terms. It is easy to accuse, denounce, and condemn. It would seem, however, that the American people would begin to look with suspicion upon those who are always accusing, condemning, and denouncing.

When our people stop to think, they will feel that no set of men, no matter to what party they belong, will willfully propose an iniquitous measure. The men of one party are just as honest, just as humane, just as devoted to liberty and justice as those of any other party. Every fair-minded man will agree in this. Let us, then, consider the bill. In doing so, it is well to know something of the people for whom we are called to legislate. We should know something of their conditions and wants, immediate and future.

Puerto Rico is about 3,600 square miles in area, and has from 800,000 to 1,000,000 people. The people are merchants, planters, and laborers, or peons. The latter class includes the great majority of the people. The merchants and planters are the well-to-do classes. Many of them, however, are woefully ignorant. Only about 12 per cent of the people can read and write, and about 5 per cent can write. The great mass of the people are poor, ignorant, and simple. They live in huts of the poorest character, eat but little, wear but little, and receive but little for their labor. From 15 to 30 cents per day is their wages.

Captain Macomb, in his report as to the conditions of the inhabitants of the island, says:

> The ignorance of the laboring classes is beyond American comprehension. Reading and writing are unknown to them. Their food is less nourishing than that of convicts in our most severe penitentiaries—food that would sustain life in an idle person, but which means anæmia and slow starvation to the workingman, whose tissues require daily renewal.
> The wages of the "peon," the farm laborer, is from 2 to 4 reals—that is, from 15 to 30 cents, American money—per working day. These peons are usually married and have families, sometimes more than one wife. I say "married," but the legal ceremony has in many cases been omitted, from the entire lack of means with which to pay the charges of the priest and the Government.
> They live in huts made of sticks and poles covered with thatches of palm leaves. A family of a dozen may be huddled together in one room, often with only a dirt floor. They have little food worthy of the name, and only the most scanty of clothing, while children of less than 7 or 8 years of age are often entirely naked. A few may own a machete or a hoe, but more have no worldly possessions whatever. Their food is fruit, and if they are wage-earners, a little rice and codfish in addition.

The quoted remarks of James Anthony Froude, in General Davis's report, apply with full force to these people:

> Morals in the technical sense they have none, but they can not be said to sin, because they have no knowledge of law, and therefore they can commit no breach of law. They are naked and are not ashamed. They are married, but not parsoned. The women prefer the looser tie, that they may be able to lose the man if he treats her unkindly, yet they are not licentious. * * * The system is strange, but it answers. * * * There is evil, but there is not the demoralizing effect of evil. They sin, but they sin only as animals, without shame, because there is no sense of doing wrong. They eat the forbidden fruit, but it brings with it no knowledge of the difference between good and evil. * * * They are innocently happy in the unconsciousness of the obligations of morality. They eat, drink, sleep, and smoke, and do the least in the way of work they can. They have no ideas of duty, and therefore are not made uneasy by neglecting it. (See General Davis's report, pages 17 and 18.)

This is what Seaborn G. Chiles, first lieutenant, Eleventh Infantry, commanding at Aguadilla, says in his report of September 20, 1899:

> The city employees were paid at irregular intervals, often going for months without a cent other than what they were able to obtain on duebills. It was impossible for the municipal government to be at all satisfactory or just, owing to the great rivalry between the two political parties. Those in power favored only their friends, while everything possible was done to injure their political enemies. On the other hand, the defeated party did all it could to annoy and give trouble to those in power. This state of affairs is now continually giving trouble, and will continue to do so until the present political parties die out altogether. Another great abuse of this power was the system by which a favored person could imprison his personal enemies on trumped-up charges. When the Americans took charge of the island all the jails were found crowded with prisoners, some of whom had been confined for great lengths of time, with only the most trivial charges against them. They had never been given any kind of a trial, and from all indications there appeared to be no prospect of their ever being brought to trial. There were a number of cases where men had been confined for many months, when even if they had been convicted of the charges against them the limit of the punishment was only a few days' confinement.
> The result of all this on the people has been to make them unambitious, deceitful, and dishonest. A more helpless and worthless set of people it is hard to imagine. In my opinion they are far inferior to our Southern negroes, and but little, if any, better than our Indians. They certainly have all their vices, with none of their virtues.
> After the hurricane of August 8, instead of going to work and trying to help themselves, they made no effort whatever to do anything, but simply sat down and speculated on how much the Government was going to do for them. A great many of them, for fear they would not receive the full benefit of the Government's charity, made no attempt to repair their houses, but continued to live in them as they were left by the storm. They also look upon the help they are receiving as their right and as a matter of course, and they are totally devoid of anything approaching gratitude. They even go so far as to complain of the kind of food they are getting, and demand, and even expect to get, what they wish. The people themselves, and even those in authority—the local boards of charity and alcaldes—thought it a great hardship when the able bodied men were required to work for what rations they received, notwithstanding the fact that the work is being done on the towns and they are the ones who are receiving the benefit of it. The sudden change from the most grinding oppression to absolute freedom has been too much for them, and they expect entirely too much.
> I merely mention this to give some idea of the character and disposition of the people. To make any material changes in the present government is, I think, a hopeless task. They are certainly not capable of self-government, and, in my opinion, it is a question of many years before they will be. Only by the most liberal system of education applied to the coming generation, with a thorough introduction of American ideas, can we hope for any beneficial results. The people naturally are a very restless and turbulent race, always ready and eager to engage in any plunder and excitement that may be proposed by anyone who for the moment has succeeded in catching their ears.

One of the worst misfortunes the Americans had to deal with, immediately after taking possession of the island, was the plunder and burning all over the country by these people, who seemed to have no object whatever in doing this, but simply did it on account of the unsettled condition of affairs at the time. They are very easily led by anyone who is able to attract their attention, and the person who has succeeded in doing this can get them to believe anything he wishes to tell them, and can do with them whatever he pleases. They have no ideas or opinions of their own, and have never been taught to think for themselves. It has been said that they will do everything in their power to elevate a popular idol to the highest position, and once he has reached that position will do everything possible to pull him down again. It is all due to their restlessness and desire for change.

The mode of life among the lower classes is very low indeed, being not a great deal better than savages, and corresponding in many respects to our Indians. Their houses are made of anything they can get to piece together—principally palm leaves—and it is a very common sight to see six or eight persons, or even more, living in a little hut hardly large enough for two. There can be no privacy in such an arrangement, and, consequently, the scale of morality is very low. It is another common sight to see any number of children, some 8 or 9 years old, running naked on the streets. But the most noticeable of all was the total lack of any sanitary arrangements whatever. In anything that was done this seems never to have been considered at all. When the Americans took possession the accumulation of filth and dirt in the towns was simply beyond description, and the only wonder is that disease and epidemics were so few. (See report of General Davis, pages 332 and 333.)

These are the people for whom we must legislate. Are they citizens now? If so, by what act have they become such? Does the flying of the flag there make them such? I think not. The flag floats over the Yakima Indian Reservation, near my home. There are from 1,200 to 2,000 Indians there. Are they citizens? They are not treated as such. They are not citizens; they will not be citizens, either, until this Government sees fit to clothe them with this priceless privilege. Do you believe the people above-described should at once be made citizens of this great Republic? They are but little better, if any, than the Indians. Do you think they should have the same privileges as yourself? Do you think the same law that governs you would be sufficient for them? I do not. And I believe that we have the right and power to govern these people, not only in a way for our own good, but also for theirs. These statements have been confirmed by further reading and investigation. The more I read the more I become convinced that it is not so much American citizenship that they want as it is a helping hand, elevating examples, and guiding, directing, encouraging laws. They need the help of a father, and not the toga of citizenship.

It is said that this bill is unconstitutional. Who always raise this objection? The Democrats! Is any new legislation proposed they say "it is unconstitutional." From the very foundation of our Government we have always had a party under some name or another opposing legislation because of its unconstitutionality. It is quite safe to conclude that when the Democrats allege a bill to be unconstitutional the Supreme Court will decide the other way. Why do they say this bill is unconstitutional? Because they claim that this island is a part of the United States and the people there all citizens, just as much as you or I, and therefore no tariff duties can be imposed upon their products. How did this island become a part of the United States? Through the war with Spain the island was ceded to our country. Does this make it a part of the United States in the sense that Washington is a part thereof? I think not. This island is the property of the United States; it belongs to the United States just as a military site or a public building belongs to the United States.

This country is a nation itself, an entity above and beyond its component parts. As an individual nation it is supreme—imperial, if you please. In its relations to and with other nations it is controlled only by international laws, and its own sense of right is reflected by its constituent parts. In its relation to the individuals that compose it, it is limited by the restrictions that those individuals have themselves imposed. It can own property, sell and dispose of it without restraint. This island belongs to the United States, but has not yet been taken into it, and until this is done the United States can control it as it sees fit. If this be not so, then this country is not a nation; it is not a sovereign, and that great instrument, the Constitution, instead of being the palladium of our liberties, is our dealiest enemy. We dare not resent an insult, because the fruits of victory may be the seeds of death.

No; as a nation, we are supreme. We can control this island as we see fit, and we can take these people in as citizens whenever we elect to do so. That we will do this when they are fit to become citizens I have no doubt. We are a just people; we will continue to be so. We can safely trust ourselves to care for these people. We will assist them, direct them, educate them, and, when worthy, citizenize them. I care not to argue the constitutionality of this measure; I have no doubt of its constitutionality.

But they say, "Wherever the flag goes the Constitution goes, and all over whom the flag floats are citizens." Is this so? As I have said before, the flag floats over the Yakima Indian Reservation, near my home, containing from 1,200 to 2,000 Indians. Are they citizens? No! At least we do not treat them as such. If this contention is correct, then they are entitled to citizenship; are citizens now and have been for years and years, and our nation has been guilty of a most grievous crime against them. No one contends, however, that they are citizens. If they are not citizens and we are not willing to give them citizenship, why should we give citizenship to those in Puerto Rico who are but little if any better than our Indians? We must face these conditions as we find them and not as we would have them. Law good for a child may not be good for a man.

It is objected to this measure that it is unjust, inhuman, and oppressive. Is this so? I think not. I believe that a simple inspection of the bill itself will show that this is not the case.

The following is the bill as it was passed by the House of Representatives, and I ask everyone who reads this bill to read it carefully:

An act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Whereas the people of Puerto Rico have been deprived of markets for a large portion of their products, and have lost property and crops by severe and unusual storms, whereby they are impoverished and are unable to pay internal revenue and direct taxes; and

Whereas temporary revenue is necessary for their schools, their roads, and their internal improvements, and the administration of their government: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of this act shall apply to the island of Puerto Rico and to the adjacent islands and waters of the islands lying east of the seventy-fourth meridian of longitude west of Greenwich, which was ceded to the United States by the Government of Spain by treaty concluded April 11, 1899; and the name Puerto Rico, as used in this act, shall be held to include not only the island of that name, but all the adjacent islands, as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act the same tariffs, customs, and duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported into Puerto Rico from ports other than those of the United States which are required by law to be collected upon articles imported into the United States from foreign countries.

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act all merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico and coming into Puerto Rico from the United States shall be entered at the several ports of entry upon payment of 15 per cent of the duties which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries; and in addition thereto upon articles of merchandise of Puerto Rican manufacture coming into the United States, and withdrawn for consumption or sale upon the payment of a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps to be purchased and provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and to be procured from the collector of internal revenue at or most convenient to the port of entry of said merchandise in the United States, and to be affixed under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and on all articles of merchandise of United States manufacture coming into Puerto Rico, in addition to the duty above provided, upon payment of a tax equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax imposed in Puerto Rico upon the like articles of Puerto Rican manufacture.

SEC. 4. That the duties collected in Puerto Rico in pursuance of this act, less the cost of collecting the same, and the gross amount of all collections of duties and taxes in the United States upon articles of merchandise coming from Puerto Rico, shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury, but shall be held as a separate fund, and shall be placed at the disposal of the President, to be used for the government and benefit of Puerto Rico until otherwise provided by law.

SEC. 5. This act shall be taken and held to be provisional in its purposes and intended to meet a pressing present need for revenue for the island of Puerto Rico, and shall not continue in force after the 1st day of March, 1902.

Is there any injustice in this bill? Is it not by its very terms a most generous measure? It levies duties upon articles imported from Puerto Rico into this country and upon articles taken from this country to Puerto Rico; but what becomes of those duties? Do they go into our Treasury for our benefit? No! Every cent that is collected over and above the cost of collection is used for the benefit of the people of Puerto Rico. Is there any injustice in that? Is this an outrage upon the Puerto Ricans? If so, in what way?

In framing this bill the Republican party had to take into consideration the condition of the people of Puerto Rico. We were confronted with new conditions. We must have new legislation. It must be suited to the people, their needs and conditions, mental, physical, and financial. The Republican party must bear the responsibility. We must propose and enact the legislation. The Democrats will do nothing but criticise and oppose. This they have always done. It is easy to do. We may make mistakes, but we will do something. They will do nothing. We have proposed this legislation, we will enact it, and we will justify it.

This legislation is for the benefit of the Puerto Ricans. In what condition are they? When the war with Spain closed their products were shut out of Spain and Cuba. Our tariff laws have been continued in force against them. They have had no markets for their products. On August 8, 1899, a terrible hurricane swept over the island. It destroyed their coffee crop and did an immense amount of damage to their other property. The loss of their markets and this damage to the crops have caused great suffering and distress throughout the island. Without markets, with houses demolished, and crops destroyed, poverty and distress stalk through the island, and the misery and desolation is simply indescribable. What do they need? They need markets and revenues. Markets for their products will bring prosperity to the home. They will furnish labor for the idle. With this will come food to the starving and clothing for the naked. With revenues will come a civil government, roads will be repaired, and schoolhouses will be constructed.

Thus the objects of this bill are twofold—first, to provide revenue, and, second, to provide a market. A revenue to defray the expenses of the government of Puerto Rico, to construct roads, to build schoolhouses, and other necessary improvements, and a market for their products, so as to bring prosperity to the inhabitants of the island.

How can these changes be best accomplished? That is the question that this legislation was enacted to answer.

Those who oppose the bill do so mostly because the President, the Secretary of War, and General Davis all recommended free trade with the island. No one has a higher regard for their opinions than I have. They, however, are not infallible. Their judgment is not unerring. It is not unusual for Congress to go contrary to a President's desires. He may be sometimes right and they wrong. They may be sometimes right and he wrong. How seldom do the Democrats think him right. That is one sign that he may be wrong.

Let us see just what General Davis did recommend. He did not recommend free trade alone. He realized that in addition to markets for their products they must have revenues. On page 9 of his report of September 5, 1899, he says:

> Free trade with the United States would, however, deplete the revenues, and if such a measure should be applied, probably all the custom-house collections would of necessity inure to the United States Treasury. Then the island would have no source of income save internal taxation, and from this very little could be expected until the industrial recuperation became general. Deficits would ensue for two or three years.
> It is not easy to state more than approximately the probable cost of the civil government, but unless public works on present scale were suspended and school expenditures largely curtailed the total would not fall below $1,750,000.

Again he says:

> But assuming free trade with the United States and all customs receipts dropped from the insular treasury, the situation would be something like this, reliance being placed solely on internal revenue:

	Annual expenses.	Annual revenues.	Deficit.
1900	$1,750,000	$500,000	$1,250,000
1901	1,750,000	1,000,000	750,000
1902	1,750,000	1,500,000	250,000
1903	1,750,000	1,750,000
Total	7,000,000	4,750,000	2,250,000

> Total deficit for three years, $2,250,000.

And now this is his other suggestion in addition to free trade, and I beg you to note it carefully:

> Therefore it is that the island would be obliged to borrow to carry on the functions of government until such time as the income from internal revenue should equal the outgo.

Money would have to be borrowed! Think of Democrats advocating the borrowing of money! This has been their nightmare for years, and yet they want this island that has not a dollar of indebtedness to start out at once to borrowing.

With free trade there would be deficits. That is truly Democratic, and may be the reason why they want it so badly. They thrive on deficits. The Republicans usually guard against these, however, and they have done just what General Davis thought would be done. A "scheme has been worked out for bridging over this period" of deficits which would exist under free trade with the island. We do not want this island to borrow money, but we do want it to have markets and revenues. We want individual property and roads repaired and schools built and other internal improvements that are so badly needed.

How could this be done best? By free trade and borrowing money, by free trade and high internal-revenue taxation, or by a system of indirect taxation with practical free trade? Borrowing would not be thought of for a moment, even though recommended by General Davis. In the present condition of the people internal revenue would be most offensive and oppressive. We, in our prosperity, do not like the internal or "infernal" (as it is sometimes called) taxation. Hardly a day passes that I do not receive a resolution or memorial or request asking for the removal of some of our internal taxes. We do not like them. They hit everyone, rich and poor, and it has only been a short time since our Democratic friends were talking themselves hoarse about the iniquities of our internal taxes, and now they want this system used against the poor Puerto Ricans. How long since they were condemning them in their platforms as war taxes and demanding their repeal? They forget the past in their haste to make party capital for the present.

This bill accomplishes both objects. It puts the rate of duty so low as to make practically free trade between the island and ourselves. At the same time it raises a fair amount of revenue that can be used in the needed improvements on the island. This revenue is paid by those who can afford to pay it. This is one beauty of this system. The men who have products to export to this country can afford to pay a slight duty.

Who are they?

Not the laborers, not the small farmers, but the merchants who have taken these products in payment of debts. I say, let these men pay the taxes instead of the poor and starving. That is what this bill requires. It is practically free trade. The tariff is so low that it gives them a great advantage over others. Remember, the tariff is not a 15 per cent tariff, but is 15 per cent of the present tariff. Their principal products are tobacco and sugar, upon which a duty is paid.

We import great quantities of each—far more than we produce. In 1888 we imported 2,700,284,282 pounds of sugar and in 1897 4,918,905,733 pounds. From Puerto Rico in 1888 we imported 115,653,809 pounds of sugar and in 1897, 86,607,317 pounds. So that after buying all of Puerto Rico's product we must still buy a much greater quantity from the rest of the world. If, for example, the duty on sugar under the Dingley law is $1.60 per hundred pounds, under this bill the Puerto Rican will have to pay a duty of 24 cents per hundred, while the German importer will have to pay $1.60. With such an advantage, why can not the Puerto Ricans more than compete with the rest of the world? Why does not this give him our market to the extent of his product and leave him almost all the profit on his products? I confess that I am so stupid that I can not see why this is not practically free trade.

We are told that it is a breach of faith. And why? Because General Miles told these people that they would have all the immunities of American citizens. Did that mean that they would be free from taxation? Did that mean they would not have to contribute toward improving the island? Surely not. But that is all they are required to do by this act.

We are told that the act is unjust to the Puerto Ricans. In God's name, how? The well-to-do pay the tax, and the whole amount, save collection charges, goes back to them to defray the expenses of the government and for necessary improvements. If this be unjust, what is our treatment of the people of Alaska? They are taxed as the Democrats would tax Puerto Rico. Everybody but the barber and preacher is taxed for engaging in honest work, and the money is paid into the National Treasury, and but little of it ever goes back to them. There is no weeping for them. No indignation is aroused for them. No thunderbolts of wrath are hurled at the truly "infernal" law under which they live. If this act is unjust, what term shall be applied to the Alaskan law?

But they say it is for the benefit of the sugar trust and the tobacco trust. No legislation can be enacted now but there is an octopus in it or to it. They are floating around here as thick as mosquitoes about a swamp on a summer evening. Our Democratic friends eat them raw, fried, on the half shell, and every other way three and four times a day. They see them by night and by day, waking and sleeping.

Is this act for the benefit of the trusts?

The importation of sugar and tobacco from Puerto Rico will not affect the price of either in this country, because the demand is much greater than they can supply. If the trusts own the sugar and tobacco, they will sell it for the same after the passage of this law as before. If there were free trade, all the tariff would be clear gain. If some tariff is left on, it is a clear loss over free trade, so that our Democratic friends are like the thief who hollowed "Stop thief!" While they "chew up" the trusts in their wrath, they advocate a policy most profitable to the trusts. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

There are about 3,000,000 pounds of sugar and thousands of pounds of tobacco in Puerto Rico waiting to come to the United States with free trade. Who owns this? Not the poor, starving people, but the wealthier class. Do you not think it a good plan to make them pay a little toward good government? Do you not think it a good idea to clip the toes of this octopus just a little bit? I would not be surprised if you do not think the tariff should be higher than it is. I will say frankly that the more I learn of the character, condition, and needs of these people the more I am convinced of the justice and wisdom of this measure.

Our Government will be just what our people make it. As long as we are a just, humane, and liberty-loving people, so long will our Government be just, humane, and dedicated to the principles of freedom. We Republicans are just as humane as you Democrats. We love liberty just as much as you do. Our history has been just as true to freedom and liberty as yours. There is no more danger of our going astray than there is that you will go astray. These fears, croakings, and evil forebodings have been made ever since our Government was founded, and, I suppose, will continue as long as we have two parties. You ease your minds in this way. It makes you feel better, I suppose. It was so in Washington's time. You called him a despot; you said that he, who had elevated liberty, was going to strike her down. Our nation was to become a despotism. But it did not; nor will it now. We will go right along treating our new territories with all the justice and humanity for which we are noted.

Two-thirds of your anxiety is for political effect. You are endeavoring to strike some popular cord. You are trying to draw the people off after "strange gods." You do not care for the Puerto Ricans nearly so much as you do for your party. Were we to take all the money we have already collected and turn it over to them you would oppose it.

You can not deceive the people more than once. You deceived many in 1896, but they will be on their guard now. They know what justice is and they know what injustice is. When they brush aside your denunciations and see the purposes and objects of this bill, they will see its superlative justice and will be amazed at your mendacity. I will be much surprised if they are not indignant at your audacious attempts to deceive them and the nearness that you came to success.

With a due regard for the habits, customs, conditions, and character of the new peoples and possessions placed in our charge, this nation will legislate for them in justice, humanity, and wisdom.

Aldrich vs. Robbins.

SPEECH

HON. GASTON A. ROBBINS,

OF ALABAMA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 6, 1900.

The House having under consideration the contested-election case of William F. Aldrich against Gaston A. Robbins, from the Fourth district of Alabama—

Mr. ROBBINS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not expect to take part in this debate until the message came that Judge FOX, a member of the committee in charge of the case, could not be present. This unfortunate circumstance forces me into the argument; and I undertake to speak in plain words upon the merits of the case, and in behalf of the people whom I have the honor to represent.

Moreover, I undertake to confine my remarks to the law and the facts of this particular case. It is admitted that the House is not bound by its decisions in former cases; but I contend that this is a judicial proceeding, requiring that the statutes of the United States relating to contested-election cases be enforced; that the unbroken line of decisions of this House be reaffirmed; and that the established rules of evidence be applied. Strike from the record all illegal, irrelevant, and immaterial testimony. Let the decision rest upon the evidence of record in the case under consideration. Find who received a majority of the votes cast, and as impartial and nonpartisan judges declare the result. Without an election by the people I do not want a seat in Congress.

Sirs, you are a court by virtue of that clause of the Constitution which declares that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members"—a court of original and final jurisdiction over both the law and facts. Each member acting judicially must find the facts and decide the law, and by vote of the majority a verdict is rendered.

The main statutes applicable to such cases are, Revised Statutes, section 105:

Whenever any person intends to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officers or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing to the member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same, and in such notice shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest.

And section 121:

The testimony to be taken by either party to the contest shall be confined to the proof or disproof of the facts alleged or denied in the notice and answer.

The decisions of the House relating to the notice of contest uniformly hold that the allegations contained in the notice must specify the number of votes cast, for whom polled, where and when polled. It must appear from the face of the notice that the contestant was elected, and the facts must be stated in such a way, if admitted by the contestee, it would appear, not as a matter of argument, but as a matter of fact, that the contestant received a majority of the votes cast. (Paine on Elections, section 824; McCrary's Law of Elections; Brightly's Leading Cases, section 334; Mann vs. Cassiday; 1 Brewster, 11; Thobe vs. Carlisle, Mobley's Digest, 525.)

Examine the notice of contest in this case, and test the allegations which it contains by the statutes and these decisions. As to the contested precincts, the averment is that the contestant received "more" votes and the contestee "less" votes than were allowed; and the notice nowhere states the number of votes received by each candidate at the several precincts, or the total number of votes received by each candidate, and does not state that the contestant received a majority of the votes cast. Like the plaintiff who goes into court with a summons and complaint, alleging that the defendant is indebted to him, and fails to state the amount of the alleged indebtedness.

By enforcing these statutes and applying the decisions you will obstruct the dishonest contestant in beginning such proceedings, and discourage frivolous and farcical contests. Proceeding further with an analysis of the notice in this case, I call attention to the allegations made by the contestant as to River and Pine Flat precincts. Respecting the election in each of these precincts his charges are repeated in the same words, to wit:

There was no election held on the 8th day of November, 1898. I claim and charge that this failure and omission to hold an election was with the fraudulent intent on the part of the officers appointed to hold said election, who were your partisan friends, allies, and supporters, to deprive the qualified electors of said precincts of an opportunity to cast their ballots at said election; and I further charge and claim that I was, by said fraudulent action on the part of your said partisan officers of said election, deprived of a majority of not less than 273 votes at River precinct, and of a majority of not less than 91 votes at Pine Flat precinct.

Serious charge, indeed, if true, and vilely wicked, if false. Examine the election law of Alabama, and the testimony offered by both the contestant and the contestee, and see whether or not these charges were honestly and truthfully made:

Code of Alabama, section 1591: If there should be no inspector or returning officer present by the hour of 8, at any polling place, then any three qualified electors who are entitled by law to vote at that polling place in the election, then to be held, may open the polls and act as inspectors during the election.

The charge is that the fraudulent conduct on the part of those appointed as officers of the election, in omitting to hold an election, deprived him of a majority of not less than 273 votes in River, and of a majority of not less than 91 votes in Pine Flat precinct; and the contestant comes before this House, as may be seen by referring to contestant's brief, pages 55 and 56, and claims a majority of 273 votes in River, and a majority of 91 votes in Pine Flat precinct. Are the charges sustained by the testimony? Where in the record is the proof? Turn to the testimony respecting these charges; and first, to the testimony introduced by the contestant himself. G. B. Dean (Record, page 893), contestant's campaign manager, appears as a witness in behalf of the contestant and says:

On one of my trips to Dallas County the week before the election I was informed that there were some cases of smallpox in River, Pine Flat, and some other adjoining beats. Thinking it possible that an election might not be held in Pine Flat and River beats, where I had instructed the full strength of the vote to be cast, I issued an order for the Republican vote to be cast in Cahaba beat, where I had previously ordered it suppressed.

This testimony was brought out in the time allowed for taking rebuttal testimony only, and after the contestee had introduced the quarantine proclamation about smallpox in these precincts. This witness is the same person who served the notice of contest, and who, together with the contestant, served the amended notice upon the contestee. Both the original and the amended notice are signed by the contestant in his own handwriting.

Next turn to the testimony offered by the contestee respecting these charges. Dr. B. B. Rogan (Record, page 700) testifies that smallpox prevailed in the fall of 1898 in River and Pine Flat precincts; he was secretary of the board of health of Dallas County, and attaches to his testimony as Exhibit A (Record, page 701) the quarantine proclamation of the board of health, which is in the following words:

Whereas there has been for several months an outbreak of smallpox in the southern portion of the county:

Resolved, That the city of Selma quarantine against all persons in River, Pine Flat, and King's beats who shall not show evidence of successful vaccination,

JOHN A. MCKINNON, M. D.,
President.

B. B. ROGAN, M. D.,
Secretary pro tempore.

Mr. MANN. If it will not interrupt the gentleman from Alabama, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. What is the date of that quarantine?

Mr. ROBBINS. That quarantine proclamation is dated about the 1st of December, 1898. Hear it again:

Whereas there has been for several months an outbreak of smallpox.

I am glad the gentleman from Illinois called my attention to the date. Turn to the testimony of Will Gordon, on page 702 of the record. He testifies that he lived in Pine Flat precinct, and that smallpox was raging there at the time of the election, and had been for fourteen months, "and they had stopped the churches up."

The statute requires that the testimony shall be confined to the proof or disproof of the facts alleged or denied. But this law does not contemplate that the contestant shall make an allegation and disprove it himself. Answer, is it honest to make such charges against honorable men, and after the quarantine proclamation is offered in evidence say: "The week before the election I was informed that there were some cases of smallpox in River, Pine Flat, and some other adjoining beats. Thinking it possible that an election might not be held in Pine Flat and River beats, where I had instructed the full strength of the vote to be cast, I issued an order for the Republican vote to be cast in Cahaba beat, where I had previously ordered it suppressed?"

This analysis of the allegations contained in the notice of contest is made for the purpose of demonstrating the falsity and dishonesty of the charges made by the contestant. I do the majority of the committee the justice to say that they do not allow either party any votes from these precincts.

The contestant alleges that he did not have full representation at the polls in the appointment of the officers of the election, and I proceed to discuss this charge under the law and facts.

Code of Alabama, section 1588: The judge of probate, sheriff, clerk of the circuit court, or any two of them must, at least thirty days before the holding of any election in their county, appoint three inspectors for each place of voting, two of whom shall be members of opposing political parties, if practicable, and one returning officer for each precinct; and it shall be the duty of the sheriff to notify such inspectors and returning officers of their appointment.

SEC. 1594. Upon opening the polls the inspectors must appoint two or more markers or assistants for illiterate and disabled electors, one from each of the opposing political parties who may have candidates to be voted for at the election, and each of whom must be a discreet person, able to read and write, and the inspectors, or any two of them, shall, in like manner from time to time as often as may be necessary to give every illiterate elector and every physically disabled elector an opportunity to vote, appoint a marker who must be selected as provided for in the selection of the first two.

SEC. 1595. Clerks and markers must be appointed from a list of persons, not less than six nor more than ten in any one precinct, who may be suggested for that purpose by the duly constituted authorities, respectively, of the opposing political parties having candidates to be voted for at the election, and the opposing political parties shall each have the right to suggest a list of names, not less than six or more than ten in each precinct, to act as clerks and markers. If no lists are furnished, the inspector shall appoint clerks and markers from opposing political parties.

The contestant proceeded under a misapprehension of the law in serving the appointing board with a list of persons to be appointed as inspectors. He makes an effort to apply the law relating to the appointment of clerks and markers to the appointment of inspectors. There is no provision of law providing for such proceeding. The act of appointing inspectors of an election is a judicial one and not a ministerial act. It is the duty of the appointing board to know from their own knowledge, or by proof brought before them, that the persons appointed inspectors possess the statutory qualifications. (Taylor vs. Kolb, 100 Alabama Supreme Court Reports, page 603; United States vs. Paxton, 40 Federal Reporter, page 136; United States vs. Chairs, 40 Federal Reporter, page 820.)

The statute is perfectly clear as to the right of each candidate, or the constituted authorities of each political party, to suggest a list of names of not less than six nor more than ten persons to be appointed as clerks and markers. The testimony shows that the controversy was not about the appointment of clerks and markers. These were appointed for each candidate wherever a list was presented in due form.

Mention is only made about the appointment of a clerk from the contestant's list for the City precinct; and the testimony of Inspector R. D. Walker fully describes the circumstances of the appointment of clerks and markers for the city of Selma precinct. He testifies that at the time the list was presented to the inspectors a request was made for the appointment of O. O. Moore as marker; that nothing was said about the appointment of a clerk; that other persons whose names were on the list presented by the supporters of the contestant were not present, and that the opening of the polls was delayed until a clerk could be sent for in the business part of the city.

Again, referring to the notice of contest and the contestant's charge that he was not allowed representation in the appointment of inspectors, he alleges that out of 31 precincts in Dallas County he was denied representation in 15 precincts.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly; anything you wish to ask.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHATTUC). Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do.

Mr. MANN. My statement was that there were 11.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was not speaking of the statement that was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his argument.

Mr. MANN. I misunderstood you, then.

Mr. ROBBINS. I was analyzing the notice of contest and calling attention to its falsity. Its allegation is, as appears in the record, that the contestant did not have representation in 15 precincts of Dallas County. The list of persons suggested by the contestant for appointment as inspectors is in evidence, and also a list of those who were appointed by the board. By comparing the names on these lists it will be seen that the identical persons suggested by the contestant were appointed in 20 out of 31 precincts. As to the precincts where the board did not appoint the persons suggested, I read the testimony of two members of the appointing board.

Judge P. G. Wood testifies as follows:

Q. When the appointing board met how were the inspectors appointed?

A. Mr. Lumpkin, the sheriff, Mr. Milhous, the clerk, and myself met up in the court-room of Dallas County, and appointed three inspectors and a returning officer for each precinct in the county. The names of these inspectors and returning officers were taken for the most part from the lists—the list put in evidence—and the Democrats also had a list in. Some were selected from each list, and possibly some from neither.

Q. How was the list or record of those who were appointed inspectors for the various precincts by the board made out, and to whom then delivered?

A. Before the meeting of the board a blank list of the several precincts in the county was made by Mr. Milhous, I think, on which was a column for inspectors and a column for returning officers. The appointing began at beat No. 1. The inspectors and returning officer of that precinct were appointed, and then these officers for precinct No. 2, and so on through all the precincts. When an inspector or returning officer was agreed upon by the board for any precinct, Mr. Milhous wrote the same on the said paper—the paper so prepared in blank. When the appointments were concluded, said paper was signed by the sheriff, clerk, and probate judge, and the same was taken possession of, according to my recollection, by the sheriff. I and the clerk officially had nothing further to do with it, as the duty of notifying and summoning was put by law upon the sheriff; and I think, therefore, that the sheriff kept the said paper.

Sheriff J. H. Lumpkin testifies as follows:

Q. Were you present at a meeting of the board when the inspectors were appointed to hold the election for November, 1896?

A. I was present.

Q. Who was present at that meeting?

A. The probate judge, circuit clerk, and myself.

Q. Was there or not a list made up that day of three inspectors and returning officer for each precinct in Dallas County to hold the election for Congressman in November?

A. There was; also a deputy sheriff for each precinct.

Q. To whom was that original list given by the board?

A. To myself.

Q. Have you it?

A. I have.

Q. What was served on them?

A. The notice of their appointments as inspectors, returning officers, and deputy sheriffs. A printed form was served on each one of them separately.

Q. At what time were these notices served?

A. Soon after the board made out a list of the appointments. It was within the time appointed by law.

Q. Did or not you notify each one of the persons appointed of their appointment?

A. I had it done by deputies.

Q. How was it done?

A. I make out regular slips for that purpose; I made them out myself.

Q. How were they notified of it?

A. Served on them by deputy.

Q. What was served on them?

A. The notice of their appointments as inspectors, returning officers, and deputy sheriffs. A printed form was served on each one of them separately.

Q. At what time were these notices served?

A. Soon after the board made out a list of the appointments. It was within the time appointed by law.

Q. How long before election were they given notice of their appointment?

A. About two or three weeks.

Q. Was or not any list of names furnished the appointing board from which they were requested to appoint inspectors by the different parties?

A. I don't know that it was furnished the board, but I think each member of the board had a list furnished him separately.

Q. Did or not anyone representing Mr. Aldrich furnish you with a list, requesting the appointment of certain persons as inspectors?

A. They did.

Q. Who was it gave you the list?

A. George R. Mason.

Q. Were or not any number of inspectors appointed by the board from the list furnished by George R. Mason?

A. There were.

Q. If you remember, state about how many were appointed from that list.

A. Somewhere between 18 and 22.

Q. Did you or not have any conversation with Mr. George R. Mason after he gave you the list in reference to not appointing certain persons who were requested on that list?

A. I did.

Q. State what he said to you.

A. One of the appointments was a city appointment—J. E. Golson. He said he would not serve. I had this list several days before the board met, and I notified him Golson said he would not serve and asked him to name some man in his place that he wanted in the city. I also tried to get him to take the place. He positively declined, and said that if Golson would not serve he had nobody to recommend.

Q. Then the board met and appointed Golson?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have any other conversation with Mr. Mason before the board met about appointing inspectors?

A. I did.

Q. State what was said in that conversation.

A. It was about a negro, Smith, in Valley Creek.

Q. State what was said.

A. I told him Smith had been a fractious person about the polls in other elections, and asked him to name some other person; that he was a disagreeable negro.

Q. What did he say?

A. I went on to tell him that in a previous election he had sworn to a great many falsehoods, and asked him to name some other party in his place.

Q. What did he say?

A. To the best of my recollection, that he would try to furnish me some name for Valley Creek.

Q. Did he ever do it?

A. I don't think he did. Then we had a conversation about Dr. Tom Sellers, in Brown's.

Q. State the substance of that conversation.

A. I notified him that Mr. Sellers said he would not serve. He said that he would see him and let me know before the board met. He said that after his conversation with Sellers he had agreed to serve. I believe there was something said by a fellow in Lexington beat. I suggested to him to name some one in the place of J. Gilbert Johnson, on the grounds that there was a good deal of feeling in that beat against him. I don't remember what his reply to me was about Gilbert Johnson.

Q. Do you or not know Jordan Hatcher, of Orrville beat?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you or not know J. H. Brown, of River beat?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you or not know Wesley Williams, of Portland beat?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you or not know Samuel D. Mitchell, of Cahaba beat?
A. I do not.
Q. Do you or not know J. S. Jones, of Carlowville beat?
A. I do not.
Q. Did or not, of your knowledge, the other members of the board know them?
A. Not of my own knowledge.
Q. Was or not every man requested by Mr. Aldrich to be appointed inspector, appointed unless there was objections to them?
A. Yes.

I submit this testimony, and you here have a full account of the proceedings of the appointing board in making these appointments. After this testimony was introduced by the contestee as to the appointment of inspectors, the contestant offered no testimony in rebuttal; and after the sheriff said that he did not know some of the persons asked for by the contestant he introduced no testimony establishing the identity or residence of those who were not appointed, or that they possessed the statutory qualifications.

The contestant says that he addressed a letter to the judge of probate and requested that he be furnished a list of the persons who had been appointed inspectors. Judge Wood testifies that the list of appointees was turned over to the sheriff, and Sheriff Lumpkin testifies that he took charge of the list and had the inspectors served with notice of their appointment. This information was furnished to G. R. Mason, contestant's manager for Dallas County, as is shown by the conversation between the sheriff and Mason. Moreover, there are several letters in evidence written by Mason, dated in October before the election, in which he gives the names of some of the persons who had been appointed as inspectors.

In this campaign the contestant adopted the policy of requesting the colored voters in Dallas County to remain away from the polls. Letters were written and messages sent to the supporters of the contestant requesting them not to vote in Dallas County.

I read one of these letters:

SELMA, ALA., October 25, 1898.

MY DEAR SIR: You suggested Jim Richardson as a suitable man to represent Mr. Aldrich's interest in election, and he has been appointed inspector. Please say to Jim it is the desire of Mr. Aldrich that the colored people should not vote in this election in his precinct, and request him to so notify them. He has utmost confidence in Jim's ability to keep them from polls.

Mr. Robbins does not expect the colored people to vote for him, and he ought not object to having them remain from polls. Tell Jim Mr. Aldrich will remember him in future for his services in this election. He has an opportunity now to show his loyalty to the party. Tell him to come to Selma Saturday; I think Mr. A. will be here.

You know if negroes are allowed to vote, nine out of ten will vote the Republican ticket, and if Mr. Aldrich is willing to risk his chances with white voters Mr. Robbins ought to.

Please attend to this matter, and oblige,
Yours, truly, G. R. MASON.

Col. A. J. MARTIN, Martin Station, Ala.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course I will.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Was there any answer given by Mr. Richardson to the letter in evidence?

Mr. ROBBINS. This letter was written by G. R. Mason and addressed to Col. A. J. Martin, who was to communicate its contents to Jim Richardson. I have read the letter as it appears in evidence, and I hope the gentleman from Illinois will investigate for himself the main points, at least, of the case.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. Is it admitted by the majority that Mr. Richardson is a friend of the contestant?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir. He acted as an inspector at Martin's precinct. He was appointed as such upon the request of the contestant. He appears as a witness and testifies that he voted for the contestant and that the election was honestly held. After these letters were introduced in evidence by the contestee the contestant offered, in the time allowed for taking testimony in rebuttal only, the testimony of G. B. Dean as to the orders that he issued to the supporters of the contestant.

Dean testified that he ordered them to vote in 11 precincts, and not to vote in the remaining 20 precincts. But, in fact it, was generally understood in all the precincts of Dallas County that the supporters of the contestant were not to vote. William T. Cook testified that Mason came to his place and stated that he was going through certain precincts for the purpose of instructing contestant's supporters not to vote; Cæsar Foster, one of contestant's managers, testified that he sent such instructions to certain precincts in the southern portion of the county; and several other witnesses testified that the request for his supporters not to vote was common knowledge in the precincts of their residence.

A table of the census of 1890 of the six counties composing the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama is copied in the report submitted by the majority, and attention is there directed to the relative voting strength of the white and colored population residing nine years ago in Dallas County. This is the basis of an attack against the correctness of the official returns, and is also made the basis of a claim that the contestant received or would have received, under other conditions, the votes of the colored electors.

This anomalous position and inconsistent claim are answered by the evidence, admitted to be true, that the contestant requested the colored voters to remain away from the polls, and by the testimony of several hundred colored voters who voluntarily appeared as witnesses and testified that they voted for the contestee. The report submitted by the majority and the report submitted by the minority of the committee agree in finding that the official returns are correct throughout the district, excepting ten precincts in Dallas County; therefore further discussion may be confined to these ten contested precincts.

Cahaba.—According to the findings of the majority of the committee the official returns from this precinct are rejected, and 163 votes are counted for Aldrich and 8 votes for Robbins. This is an error, and the majority must have overlooked or ignored the correction of the testimony upon which it is based. P. Ulmer alone testifies to these figures, which are accepted by the majority. On page 161 of the record he says: "I was ticket marker on the day of election, and marked 123 tickets for Mr. Aldrich, and my recollection is that 40 or 50 colored men voted there that day who marked their own tickets." P. Ulmer was recalled as a witness, and on page 742 of the record he says:

Q. Were you examined at Stanton by the contestant?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What, if any, official position did you hold at Cahaba last November?
A. Marker.
Q. Do you or not remember how many tickets you marked that day for Mr. Aldrich?
A. I don't know how many there were.
Q. Did you or not keep any memorandum that day?
A. I did not.
Q. How many tickets did you testify to marking for Mr. Aldrich when at Stanton?
A. I think it was 122 or 123.
Q. Why did you say then that you marked 123 for Aldrich?
(Counsel for contestant objects to this question and moves to exclude the answer, for it calls for the reason of the witness and not the facts.)
A. Green ask me how many there were, and I told him I did not know; that I had gotten up a list after the contest and had left the list at home.
Q. Was that Green Kornegie that you speak of?
A. It is.
Q. What did Green then say to you, if anything?
A. He ask me did I have any idea how many there were, and I told him some hundred odd, and he then said, "You can just say 123."
Q. Did you or not keep account on the day of the election how many you marked?
A. I did not; I did not have time.
Q. When did you get up that list you mentioned?
A. About two weeks after the election.
Q. Was it from that list that you got up that you based your estimate upon?
A. Yes, sir.

This count is obtained by adding 123, the number of tickets that Ulmer first said he marked for Mr. Aldrich, and 40, the number of colored men whom he thought could mark their own tickets, and the 8 votes for Robbins, making the total number of votes 171. The official poll list is found on page 252 of the record, and contains the names of 182 electors who voted at Cahaba for a member of Congress. The official returns, Aldrich 54 and Robbins 127, are sustained by the testimony of other witnesses, including the officers of the election. Deduct the figures which are withdrawn by Ulmer, reinstate the official count of the votes cast at Cahaba precinct, and grant all other findings of the majority, for the sake of this calculation, and the result is a majority for the contestee in the district.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. In this last computation that you make, do you allow to the contestant all the votes counted for him by the majority of the committee?

Mr. ROBBINS. All, excepting Cahaba precinct.

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. And you arrive at a majority for the contestee by amending the returns in that one precinct?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir; and unless that is done the count of the votes of Cahaba precinct will rest upon the testimony of Ulmer, which he has withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. Allow me a moment, if you please. The official return, as I remember, from this precinct—I will give the figures in a moment.

Mr. MANN. I will assist the gentleman. The return was, for Aldrich 54, for Robbins 127.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am obliged to the gentleman. I want to be accurate, and I would have found the figures in a moment. The return is, for Aldrich 54, for Robbins 127. The majority of the committee, upon the testimony of P. Ulmer, changes the return so as to give Aldrich 163 and Robbins 8. Now, if the testimony of this witness is discarded and the return permitted to stand, the result must be 22 in favor of the contestee.

Valley Creek.—The officers of the election appear as witnesses and sustain the correctness of the official count and the truthfulness of the returns. Among them was an inspector who the contestant introduced as a witness, but only asked him for whom he voted. On cross-examination the contestee asked him to state all the facts relating to the election in this precinct, and his answers corroborate the returns. But the contestant is unwilling to be bound by the testimony given by his own witness. He introduced 116 witnesses from this precinct who testify that they voted for the contestant, and the official returns are for Aldrich 44 and for Robbins 158.

I call special attention to the method by which this testimony was obtained. The contestant employed men to see the electors whose names appeared on the poll list as voting, and those who would testify that they voted for Aldrich were given railroad tickets to Stanton, where a commissioner was taking testimony for the contestant. On the train en route for Stanton a negro was seen distributing cards to the negro witnesses by Rev. J. W. Shoaf and T. D. Kemp, intelligent white gentlemen and highly esteemed in the community where they reside. Mr. Kemp secured one of these cards, and here it is in evidence [pointing to record of original testimony] identified and made an exhibit to Mr. Kemp's testimony (Record, page 318).

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman kindly state what was on those cards?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will gladly read the card.

Instruction card for voters.

OFFICAL BALLOT.

Federal election Tuesday, November 8, 1898.

Make a cross mark (X) before the name of candidate of your choice, as below.

For Representative in the 56th Congress of the United States from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama:

(Vote for one.)

× WILLIAM F. ALDRICH.

GASTON A. ROBBINS.

And I also read the official ballot, of which the card is an imitation:

Official ballot, election November 8, 1898.

Make a cross mark (X) before the name of the candidate of your choice.

Vote for one	For member of the Fifty-sixth Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama:
	W. F. ALDRICH.
	GASTON A. ROBBINS.

These witnesses were placed on the stand and asked: "For whom did you vote?" "How did you vote?" They all answered, "I voted for Aldrich;" and in the words of the instruction card, "Make a cross mark (x) before the name of candidate of your choice as below." Of these witnesses 51 could not read and write. Sirs, can you believe their testimony after the disclosure of the process by which they were instructed how to mark tickets three months after the election and testimony drilled into them on the morning of the day of their examination as witnesses in the case? In his rebuttal testimony the contestant does not offer a word in explanation.

Orrville.—The vote at this precinct is entirely rejected by the report of the majority. The contestant requested the appointment of Jordan Hatcher, an unknown person, as an inspector, and issued orders for his supporters to remain away from the polls. Only one witness, Andrew King, is offered to impeach the returns. He testified that he marked the tickets of 10 voters for Aldrich and gave the names of the persons whose ballots he marked; and later he reappeared as a witness and testified that $7 per day for three days' attendance as a witness induced him to swear that he marked 10 ballots for Aldrich.

Afterwards the contestee introduced seven of the persons named by Andrew King, and three of them testified that they voted for Aldrich and four testified that they voted for Robbins, and the other three names do not appear on the poll list as voting at all. The report of the majority refers to previous elections and proceeds to disfranchise every elector who voted. In Valley Creek precinct the votes proven aliunde are counted by the majority; but in Orrville precinct, where the contestee received a large majority, the aliunde vote is rejected.

If this method is approved, the contestant may direct that votes be counted in the precincts where he has a majority and rejected in precincts where the contestee has a majority.

Lexington.—As to the election in this precinct, the contestant offered one witness who testified that he remained around the polls all day, and that about 50 men came to the polls. He also gave his opinion about existing conditions and the voting strength of the political parties.

But the supporters of the contestant were instructed not to vote at this precinct. The official returns are 3 for Aldrich and 54 for Robbins. So it appears that the testimony of contestant's only witness corroborates the official returns as to the number of votes cast; and the inspector, who voted for Aldrich, testifies that the returns are correct. The majority refer to previous elections in this precinct and reject all the votes cast in this precinct and decline to count the votes proven aliunde.

Burnsville.—At this precinct, after the polls were closed, a dispute arose as to whose duty it was under the law to count the ballots, which ended in an agreement that the ballot box should be intrusted over night to A. Thompson, an inspector appointed upon the request of the contestant. Next morning Thompson produced the ballot box, which had been left with him unlocked, and in the presence of all the officers of the election the ballots were counted—44 for Aldrich and 83 for Robbins—and accordingly the returns were made up and signed by all the inspectors, including Thompson.

Three months afterwards Thompson appeared as a witness, and testified that he counted the ballots in this box at 3 o'clock during the night after the election, while the box was in his keeping, and that he counted 113 for Aldrich and 22 for Robbins. The contestee introduced as witnesses J. H. Burns and J. S. Campbell, inspectors; J. S. Dilburn, clerk; and Jack Robinson, who was a marker appointed from a list suggested by the contestant, each of whom testified that they were present; that the votes were correctly counted; that in the presence of each other the returns were signed by all the inspectors; and that Thompson made no remark about having counted the ballots during the night while they were in his charge; that he did not object to signing the returns, and that he said nothing indicating that the ballots had not been correctly counted and returned.

The majority of the committee accept the count made by Thompson in his dream, and the minority reject the returns because the ballot box was left, unlocked and unguarded, in his custody, and the ballots not counted until the next day after the election.

Union.—The returns from this precinct are attacked by the testimony of Jackson Waugh alone. He testifies that he marked about 90 tickets for Aldrich, and that according to his judgment there were about 40 who marked their own tickets. His testimony is contradicted by J. A. Carson and J. F. Orr, inspectors; C. D. Harrison, marker, and William Smith, the Republican clerk, and each testified that the ballots were correctly counted and truthfully returned.

The contestee called as witnesses 10 of the voters whose tickets Jackson Waugh said he had marked for Aldrich, and each testified that he voted for Robbins. Furthermore, several witnesses testified that they would not believe Jackson Waugh on oath. In the time allowed the contestant to take rebuttal testimony he did not introduce a single witness to establish Jackson Waugh's character for truth and veracity, or contradict the testimony of those who had impeached the character of Jackson Waugh, his only witness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SHATTUC in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I will yield such additional time to the gentleman from Alabama as he may desire to conclude his remarks.

Mr. ROBBINS. I will consume no more time than is necessary to present the law and evidence.

Pence's.—An attack is made upon the integrity of the official returns from this precinct by two witnesses, J. C. Coleman and Charlie Brown, who testify that they live in the precinct; that they did not vote at this election, and that the names of several persons appear on the poll list who are unknown to them as residents of Pence's precinct. Upon this testimony the majority reject the official returns.

The contestee took testimony at the voting place in Pence's precinct, and there, in the presence of their neighbors, J. C. Coleman and Charles H. Brown, who were not the same persons appearing under the same names at Stanton as witnesses for contestant, testified that they were present in person at the election in Pence's precinct and voted. In the ten days allowed for taking rebuttal testimony the contestant had an opportunity to identify his witnesses "J. C. Coleman" and "Charlie Brown;" but he offered no explanation about suborning witnesses.

Marion Junction.—The official returns from this precinct are sustained by the testimony of all of the inspectors, who testify that the returns are correct. In this precinct the supporters of contestant were instructed not to vote, and not one of his supporters appeared at the polls or offered to vote for him. The report of the majority rejects the entire poll of this precinct and does not count the votes proven aliunde.

King's.—In this precinct the contestant's supporters were ordered to remain away from the polls, and the report of the majority rejects all the votes cast in King's precinct. To discredit the returns from this precinct the contestant offered the testimony of witnesses whose names are similar to names appearing on the poll list, and who testify that they did not vote. The value of this kind of testimony may be determined by referring to an unbroken line of authorities. In Letcher vs. Moore (Clark & Hall, page 479) the rule is stated:

> That while this kind of evidence is admissible for what it is worth, it is manifest that its value must depend upon circumstances. If the district or territory within which the voter must reside is large or very populous and the witness has not an intimate and extensive acquaintance with the inhabitants, the evidence will be of little value, and standing alone will avail nothing.

The mere statement of a witness that a voter was or was not a resident, without giving facts to justify his opinion, is not sufficient to throw out such vote. (Paine on Elections, section 761; McCrary on Elections, section 756; Gooding vs. Wilson, Smith Digest, page 79.) This kind of testimony is not sufficient to cast suspicion on the returns; they must be proven fraudulent, and nothing but the most credible, positive, and unequivocal evidence should be permitted to destroy the credit of the official returns. (American and English Encyclopedia of Law, volume 6, pages 354, 356, and notes 2 and 3; Judson vs. Hill, 50 New Hampshire, 140; Dodge vs. Brooks, 2 Congressional Election Cases, page 81).

City.—The official returns of this precinct are in evidence, signed by all the inspectors—J. L. Clay, R. W. Walker, and J. E. Golson. Both Clay and Walker appear as witnesses, and give testimony sustaining the returns. Golson was appointed inspector at the request of the contestant. The majority of the committee find that the official vote is correct in other precincts where representation was allowed to the contestant as requested.

Apply this rule adopted by the majority to the City precinct, where the official returns are sustained by all the inspectors, including Golson, who served as the representative of the contestant, not that they are true, but for the purpose of this calculation only; admit all other findings of the majority and reinstate the official returns of the City precinct, and the result in the district is a majority of 200 for the contestee.

The majority of the committee refer to a number of voters whose names appear on the poll list and allege that they were not registered. By comparing the poll list with the registration list it will be seen that errors were made in the spelling of names and writing the initials of persons on these lists. To illustrate, I call attention to a few discrepancies. John B. Erwin, jr., was registered, and Jno. B. Irwin voted. P. C. Keipp was registered, and E. C. Keipp voted. Rich. Suther was registered, and Richard Suther voted. Pettus I. Golding was registered, and Ike Golding voted. Horace Griffin was registered, and H. S. Griffin voted. J. M. Etheridge was registered, and J. M. Eskeridge voted.

Errors of this kind have never been considered in any judicial or legislative inquiry as evidence of fraud at all tending to affect the validity of the election or integrity of the official returns. The hurry, bustle, and noise around the polls when the election is taking place make such discrepancies a matter of course, and their entire absence would be a more suspicious circumstance than their presence. There is no authority for rejecting the poll because the names of unregistered voters appear on the poll list. On the contrary, the decisions of the courts and House of Representatives uniformally hold that the vote of a precinct will not be rejected on account of unregistered voters. (Paine on Elections, sections 362, 363; McCrary on Elections, page 445; Clark vs. Robinson, 88 Ill., page 498; Dale vs. Irwin, 78 Ill., 170; Fenley vs. Walls, Smith Contested-Election Cases, page 367.)

Sirs, enough has been said to give an understanding, if that is desired, of the law and evidence of the case. On one side ignorant negroes, without character or respectability, appear as witnesses. On the other intelligent white men, of high character and morality, appear as witnesses, and since an attack is made upon the integrity of the official returns by the testimony of the former, and sustained by the testimony of the latter, I claim that the truth is that contestee was elected by 1,230 majority.

Briefly, I must refer to the aliunde evidence offered in this case. The original plan adopted by the contestant in attempting to prove a case was to call the individual voters whose names appear on the poll list of all the precincts in Dallas County against the official returns of which he had made charges in his notice of contest. Of this character of testimony the contestant offered 324 witnesses, and each testified that he voted for Aldrich. In answer the contestee introduced 1,331 witnesses from the contested precincts, and each testified that he voted for Robbins.

Now, make a calculation based upon the aliunde proof, if the official returns are to be ignored, and the result in the district is as follows: Vote for Aldrich in uncontested precincts, 5,293; add the number of witnesses testifying or vote proven aliunde, 324; total for Aldrich, 5,617. Vote for Robbins in uncontested precincts, 4,477; add number of witnesses testifying or vote proven aliunde, 1,331; total for Robbins, 5,708, and 191 majority.

Mr. LATIMER. Will it interfere with the gentleman's argument to ask a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. No, sir.

Mr. LATIMER. If I understand the gentleman, he says that in Dallas County, where there is a charge of fraud, at all the polling places where fraud has been charged if you leave out the boxes and take the witnesses that were called he has a majority in Dallas County and in the district.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have. That is what I stated.

Mr. LATIMER. And what is your majority?

Mr. ROBBINS. One hundred and ninety-one votes, if the count is made on that basis.

Mr. LATIMER. Now, if I understand the contention, there are six counties in the district represented by the gentleman, and that there are five in which there is no contest.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; that is right.

Mr. LATIMER. There is only one county where fraud has been charged, and in that county you claim if all the boxes in the county are thrown out, and take the witnesses who swore as to how they voted, that you have a majority of 191 in the district.

Mr. ROBBINS. You have correctly stated the last proposition that I made. The rule relating to the vote proven aliunde is correctly stated in Mann vs. Cassidy (1 Brewster, Pennsylvania Reports) that when the official poll is rejected and the integrity of the returns destroyed, due and adequate proof must be demanded of each vote relied upon, and the true vote may be proven by calling the electors whose names are on the poll list. (American and English Encyclopedia of Law, pages 356, 357; Paine on Elections, section 596, page 502; Bisbee vs. Finley, 2 Ellsworth, page 172; Ried vs. Julian, 2 Bartlett, 822; Washburn vs. Voorhees, 2 Bartlett, 54.)

If the official returns are accepted from the precincts about which the majority and the minority of the committee agree, and the vote proven aliunde from the ten precincts about which they disagree, be added, the result in the district is as follows:

Vote for Aldrich agreed upon by majority and minority reports	5,380
Vote for Aldrich proven aliunde from ten contested precincts	303
Total for Aldrich	5,683
Vote for Robbins agreed upon by majority and minority reports	5,143
Vote for Robbins proven aliunde	929
Total for Robbins	6,072

A majority of 389 for Robbins.

Under a government like ours the highest duty of a Representative in Congress is to protect the people in their right to elect their Representatives. Here and now this right is directly involved. Sirs, will you not guard your own record in a contest like this? In the future whose title to a seat in this House would be secure should you establish this precedent? My people look to you as lawmakers of high standing, sitting in a judicial capacity, and only ask for justice and that you render your decision according to the law and the facts.

The gentleman from Illinois, who opened this debate, taunted me with favoring self-government. His statement is true; and if it will strengthen his position, he may add a word thereto, for I admit that I am and always will be in favor of local self-government. Along the line of his remarks I also admit that I am in favor of Caucasian rule; and if I did not believe that I received a majority of all the votes cast, and also a majority of the white votes of the district, you would have had my resignation to deal with instead of these proceedings.

If it were my place to give testimony, I could speak volumes about the right of suffrage and the "white man's burden" in the South. But these remarks are reserved for a future occasion. I have made an effort to confine my argument to the law and facts of this particular case. However, be assured that I will not go to Africa for votes or to Hindostan for religion. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Justice to Puerto Rico is Safety for the United States.

HON. DAVID A. DE ARMOND,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 27, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. DE ARMOND said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I do not arise to address the committee in the belief that I can really add anything material to the discussion on the pending bill. I believe that those who speak at this late stage of the debate are likely, if they argue the question under consideration, to merely repeat in their own way arguments already made. Certainly, without very careful, not to say exhaustive, investigation it would hardly be possible for anyone to add anything to the sum of those arguments; and yet the issue is so fundamental and so far-reaching, the results may be so great for the weal or the woe not only of the people of the little island of Puerto Rico but of the people of the great United States, that those who realize its importance need not apologize for addressing themselves to it.

The question of how the Puerto Ricans shall be dealt with—if that were the only question, the question of justice to them, of right in dealing with a people related to us as they are—is large enough to command the best attention of the Congress, that it may be decided as it should be decided. But that question is small and inconsequential in comparison with the mighty question which affects the people of this Republic and, it might not be exaggeration to say, free institutions and the philosophy of free government the wide world over.

The Puerto Ricans came to us in a way that would suggest fair treatment for them, as proper recipients of everything that it is in the power of this Government, without depriving our own people of anything to which they are entitled, to grant them. When our armies invaded that island they found the Puerto Ricans friendly and not hostile; welcoming us; not trying to repel us. We met with no opposition from the people of that island. The expectations of these people are not unnatural and ought not to be disappointed. They expected, and had a right to expect, that they would be treated by the great American Republic justly; they believed that their fortunes were cast in with ours, and that whatever of liberty and equality of right we have under our Constitution and laws would be theirs also.

Not only that, but by the visitations of Providence their island was swept by extraordinary storms, and their property destroyed. Their relations with the mother country, cruel as it was (better relations than they now sustain to this country), were dissolved. Their markets are gone. They are at the point of starvation.

Our navigation laws have been extended to the little island, so that its inhabitants can not ship their products to this country upon the best terms attainable. They can not employ the "tramp" vessel at a low rate, but must take the American ship at a high rate. Already they are the victims of the owners of the American coasting marine.

The President, in his annual message of last December, urged upon Congress, as a "plain duty," the passage of a law for absolute free trade between Puerto Rico and the United States, as between the States, and between States and Territories. There was no hint of a purpose to hold Puerto Rico in vassalage; it had become part of our territory, and the President thought our duty plain to hasten to make the tariff law apply to Puerto Rico as to Oklahoma.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the leader of the Republican side of the House, introduced a bill to carry out that policy. Later, suddenly, and without warning, that policy was abandoned. The McKinley tariff, in fractions, is to oppress both American and Puerto Rican, and Puerto Rico is to be governed as a province.

We have not far to go and it is not difficult to determine what influences really prompted and brought about that rapid and great change upon the part of the Republican leaders. There was a time when the Republican party and those who formed it, when they chose to disregard the Constitution, impelled by their consciences, as they claimed to set it aside, proclaimed that there was something higher and better than the Constitution, appealing to what they called the "higher law." We are brought now in this day and generation, at this very hour, to behold others who claim to be disciples of the creators of the Republican party and the exemplars of its virtues following, not the "higher law," but falling back upon and following the lower law of greed, the lowest and meanest law that controls human action.

The Constitution is about to be set aside, so far as these gentlemen have power to set it aside, not in order that they may do something philanthropic, something for the relief of any section of mankind, something to elevate any race found in hard straits, but to establish partial if not complete slavery; in the interest of wrong, clear and palpable; wrong not to be apologized for, not to be accentuated. This has been brought about, as certainly must be evident to all who choose to consider it, by the influence of a few mighty agencies in this country. It is suggested that the tobacco interests in Connecticut and the sugar interests so potent at certain times of their own choosing, have effected this change of front. And what may become of the hundreds and thousands of poor Puerto Ricans, what their fate may be, how their hardships may be multiplied, how the gloom of despair may be brought down upon them thicker and heavier—these considerations are matters of no concern, provided always, however, that the powerful interests which control a powerful party gain by this legislation.

What difference that the Constitution and its interpretations of a hundred years by the master minds of our country stand in the way? What difference that, according to the message of the President and the mighty chorus of the other leading Republicans, complete free trade should exist between this country and Puerto Rico? A few agents of a few mighty monopolies need only, in their own good time and in their own effective way, appeal to those who are in control in this House and in the Government of this country, and straightway all this fine talk is thrown to the wind, and legislation is pitched, not upon the supposed high plane of some "higher law," but, as I said before, upon the low plane of greed, the meanest law that controls or directs human action.

I shall not quote from the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court, since others who have spoken have, by referring to and quoting from the law books, enabled the House and the country to enjoy the benefit to be derived from a study of these authorities.

The first proposition necessary for the proponents of this tariff bill to maintain, providing they choose to rely upon reason and authority, and not to proclaim, as perhaps they will do later on, that they will recklessly follow their predetermined programme in disregard of the Constitution—the first proposition for them to maintain is that Congress can legislate outside and independent of the Constitution. If that be not true, all the remainder of their arguments, all their deductions upon constitutional or other grounds in support of the legislation here proposed, must fall and fail miserably. Can Congress legislate beyond the Constitution, outside of the Constitution, independent of the Constitution? If so, then the question of expediency alone remains.

There is a great deal said about "extending the Constitution to the Territories," and some gentlemen have amused themselves in the apparent belief that they were witty or humorous by talking about "the transmigration of the Constitution," "the skipping and jumping of the Constitution." Those gentlemen on the other side who have argued this matter seriously have, it seems to me, fallen into error; those who have disposed of it flippantly have merely illustrated what they illustrate time and again—their real disregard of the Constitution. It was left for the ablest men on the other side, in arguing for the passage of this Puerto Rican tariff bill, to declare that they have no particular regard for written constitutions; that the flag covers it all; that the flag answers in place of the Constitution; that it does not make very much difference anyway about constitutions or adherence to them.

Why this indifference about our written Constitution? The written Constitution which we have is the ripe fruit, the residuum, the prize, of seven years of dreadful warfare in the Revolution. It is the culmination, the gathering together, of the fruits of that conflict for the liberties of the people of this Republic; the crystallization of the Declaration of Independence; the charter of American liberty; the guide for American statesmanship. It is a restraint upon those who govern for the American people. But the wisdom of the fathers is to be thrown to the winds, the experience of a century of national life must be disregarded, correct principles are to be discarded, the traditions of our people departed from, our whole course as a nation reversed—all this that the way may be clear for the proposed Puerto Rican tariff.

Sir, a written Constitution such as we have is not to be sneered out of existence. On the contrary, it deserves the veneration and support of all who love liberty or desire that the Republic shall continue its mightiest exemplar, and that our career shall be onward and upward to a higher civilization, to greater conquests of freedom, instead of down, down to the pit into which all peoples who have forgotten the correct principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States have ultimately fallen.

Written constitutions, it appears, are not of much account, providing the flag is "there." And the principles of liberty have grown up, these gentlemen tell us, as the product of the civilization of ages; and these principles of liberty will be enough for the Filipinos, enough for the Puerto Ricans, enough for us. Wherefore trouble ourselves about a written constitution? Why be hampered by its prohibitions? Why be restrained by its spirit? Why accept instructions from its philosophy and from the experiences of our people under it? Oh, the flag is made to typify a great many things, varying as these gentlemen dispose of the flag and have uses for it!

The American flag is worthy of the veneration of American citizens and the representatives of the American Republic, only when it symbolizes the principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence and preserved in the Constitution. If the sad day ever shall come when it is to float, in token of lasting dominion, over conquered provinces, when it is to be the emblem of an empire in essence whatever it may be in name—if that day ever shall come, then the American flag will no longer represent the history, the glory, the aspirations of American freemen, or commend itself, as it did in the years of the past and does now, to liberty-loving men not only in this land but throughout the wide world. [Applause.]

Can Congress legislate outside of the Constitution? Some gentlemen talk as though Congress legislating for the Territories were transported across the States, and in the case of the Philippines and Puerto Rico, across the ocean. The fact, however, is that Congress, upon whatever it may legislate and however it may legislate, sits here under the Dome of the old Capitol—one branch in this Hall and the other branch in the Hall just over the way. They must be talking about the Congress here in the American Capitol; the Congress which sits here and acts upon one subject with the same warrant of authority and the same power, restrained by the same limitations, from the same source, as upon another—the Constitution over all—all the time.

I am willing to rest my argument and the whole case upon the single proposition that Congress has no power to legislate outside the Constitution. Indeed, I believe the whole contention must terminate with the settlement of the correctness of this proposition.

Every one must admit that, in general, Congressional action is subject to the control of the Constitution. That being so, an exception must be found, or the conclusion is inevitable and irresistible that all Congressional action must be within constitutional limits and subject to constitutional control. Now, who can point to the exception? It is not to be found in the Constitution. Where, then, is it to be found? Whence is it to be derived?

The Constitution created the Congress. It is absurd to contend—and still more absurd to assume—that the creature is superior to the creator. Nor is it enough to say that the creature could be made superior to the creator, for if that were conceded, it still would be necessary to show that what could be done (however unnatural) had in fact been done.

Our Government is one of limited powers, while the Constitution is of supreme power over it. It will not do to resort to that much-abused doctrine of implied power, for implied power must be coupled with a power not implied, but actually granted.

What could influence the Constitution makers to grant to Congress power unrestrained, undirected, by the Constitution? And why would they select this particular subject for that upon which the Congress, so carefully restrained elsewhere, should be a law unto itself? I believe no reason can be found—certainly none has been given. And if the makers of the Constitution, wise and great as they were, meant that in legislating for the Territories, Congress should be free from constitutional control, is it not passing strange that they did not make known their purpose by something in the Constitution itself? Is it not more than probable that if they meant that Congress, with respect to the Territories, should exercise extra-constitutional power—that is, power beyond the grant contained in the Constitution as it is—they would have changed the Constitution so that the power would exist under it? Why would they lift the Constitution from Congress instead of enlarging the power of Congress, in the desired particular, in and by the Constitution? And who has found in the debates in the Constitutional Convention, or in the writings of the fathers, or in the decisions of the courts, or anywhere else, except in the "expansion" utterances of the last few months, so much as a syllable claimed even as calculated to raise a suspicion that the makers of the Constitution contemplated any Congressional action whatsoever, outside of or beyond the Constitution?

Until some one appears with some evidence or some reason for the contention that Congress is above the Constitution, instead of the Constitution being superior to Congressional enactments, I shall cling to the ancient faith that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land, of any land and every land over which or in which Congressional action may be operative.

But surely I need not now argue at greater length a proposition so plain, so fundamental. The simple fact is that this new philosophy about the power of Congress to legislate outside the Constitution is merely the corollary of a reckless, not to say wicked, purpose to do that which not only must ever lack constitutional sanction, but that which is abhorrent to every respectable conception of the Constitution known to our history or our jurisprudence.

Whenever we come to deal with anything by legislation, I care not what it is or where it is, we are to be directed and restrained by the Constitution. There is not a thing that can be done by law that can be done outside of the Constitution without its violation. Where is there a single power possessed by any branch of the Government that is not in subordination to and in harmony with the Constitution? Where is there one?

There is found in that instrument a clause providing that—

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

This is supposed to confer some extraordinary power over Puerto Rico and the Philippines. Can we dispose of either, or make needful rules and regulations respecting either, contrary to the Constitution of the United States? Can we dispose of the Constitution in order to dispose of the territory? Who ever gave the Constitution that reading? Where can there be found in the decisions of the courts or in the writings of text writers deserving respect a solitary syllable that warrants any such construction or any such conclusion?

Congress, in dealing with the territory of the United States, whether it be much or little, whether it be near or far away, is the same Congress that is authorized under the Constitution and by the Constitution to legislate upon all subjects concerning which it may legislate at all, whatever they may be, mighty or small, important or trivial.

Then there is a notion that the nation has suddenly expanded into a "world power," and thereby got beyond the Constitution. Gentlemen speak of this as though the United States were trivial and inconsequential until within the last year or two. According to them we are no longer provincial. We are no longer a little bit of a republic, tucked away in a corner of the Western Hemisphere, but now we are a great and mighty nation—a "world power;" and somehow—of course they jump the process—somehow, according to their philosophy, material changes have taken place, not only in the standing of this nation in the world, but in the effect of its Constitution here at home.

Why, my friends, it was the honest belief and the proud though modest boast of our grandfathers that they had erected and maintained here, under great difficulties and against great obstacles, a nation which was a world power. It was the belief of our fathers who took part in the tremendous civil strife of 1861–1865 that a mighty world power here, divided for the time being into hostile armies, was engaged in deadly conflict.

The truth is—not to dwell upon a subject so insignificant—the truth is that this great Republic of the United States, from the hour that our people emerged from the American revolution to this hour, has been the mightiest world power upon this planet; has done more for the progress of civilization, more for the amelioration of the condition of mankind, more toward the advancement of correct principles and the eradication of evil ones, than any other nation upon the footstool.

A world power! This is a phrase, a mere phrase, behind which gentlemen hope to shelter themselves in their efforts to swerve this great Republic from its true course and to turn it adrift, a lawless body in a lawless space, ignorant or unmindful of the many dangers that threaten.

It is contended that, being a "world power," our nation possesses all the powers that any other nation possesses, and that therefore this nation can do anything that any other nation can do. Dealing with other nations, other members of the family of nations, we do possess, because we are able to assert and maintain, equal rights with the best of them. Whatever our rights there, and whatever we chose to do against a foreign foe or in our relations with foreigners, our institutions at home remain distinct and American, sheltered under and protected by the Constitution as completely as if all of the world except that which is under our dominion were to sink into the sea; as if all of this old planet except that over which the American flag floats were to cease to exist.

The power that we have to wage war is given by the Constitution. The power that we have to form treaties of peace, treaties of commerce, treaties of whatever character, is given, too, by the Constitution. These powers have nothing to do, so far as the outside world is concerned, with our own domestic affairs and their management.

But it is said that it is an incident of warfare, often necessary and sometimes inevitable, to acquire territory; and because other nations, having different systems of government, moving to different ends by different ways, choose to hold conquered territory as subject provinces, and the people inhabiting it as possessed of no rights except such as the conqueror chooses to yield, therefore, being a "world power," we have a right to do likewise; and in order to measure up to the full requirements of a world power, we must do the same thing. Calling the United States a world power falls far short of enlarging the power of Congress or lessening the binding obligations of the Constitution. The so-called argument based upon the parrot prattle about "world power" is not merely lame—it is absolutely worthless.

It may be conceded that the United States possess full right and power to acquire territory, either by conquest or by treaty, and yet there must remain the question as to the power of the lawmaking branch of the Government over the territory when acquired. When the power of legislating for the territory is to be determined, the source of all legislative power in the Government, the fountain head of such power, must be found; and there is but one source, one fountain head, the Constitution. We make no question about the right to acquire territory, though even that was doubted by so great a man as Jefferson. The question is, What can be done with the territory when acquired? For answer to that question, it being one of legislative power, we must go to the Constitution, the source of all such power.

Some try to deduce imperial power from a consideration of the powers of the several colonies or States of which the Union is formed. They say that if the Constitution never had been adopted and the Union never had been formed, each of the thirteen colonies or States which united in adopting the Constitution and forming the Union would possess ample power to acquire territory and to govern it in any manner or by any means whatsoever; and, they say, since the colonies, now States, have parted with all this power, surely the General Government formed by them, the United States, must possess it, and must have the right to exercise it.

Without stopping to consider what any of the States might do if the Union had not been formed, it is a fact that the Union was formed, and that the Constitution measures the powers possessed, as well as the powers that may be exercised, by the General Government or any of its branches, or by any State.

The contention is that, as the States (thirteen of them formerly colonies) no longer have any power to acquire territory, either by treaty or conquest, such power now must reside in the General Government. The vice of the argument lies in treating nation and government as equivalents. Powers not granted to our Government are reserved to the States or the people. To make anything out of the argument it must appear that if each of the thirteen colonies or States could govern as it might see fit to do any territory which it might acquire, the General Government, as it is under the Constitution—not as it might be—must possess the same power and right. This can not be shown, for it is not true. The General Government is restrained in its operations by the Constitution, and can not escape from that restraint except by amending the Constitution in the manner prescribed therein. The case at most is the familiar one of the State whose legislature could do yesterday what it can not do to-day, because of a constitutional restraint which became operative to-day, but had no existence yesterday. Upon the soundness of this reasoning and the correctness of this conclusion I am content to rest.

We must not forget that much of the power of the sovereign people of the United States is reserved in and by the Constitution:

> The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people. (Article IX.)
> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people. (Article X.)

Let those who can not find in the Constitution the powers which they covet to enable them to do something so un-American as the subjugation of alien people into obedience to the decrees of a colonial empire, try to amend the Constitution into what they wish it was, but what surely it is not—the chart of a government of absolute and arbitrary power.

We hear much about "extending" the Constitution to the Territories; about Congress legislating into this Territory or withholding from that Territory the supreme law, by virtue of which Congress itself "lives, moves, and has its continual being." The Constitution makes Congress, and then Congress takes charge of the Constitution and peddles it around as to Congress, from time to time, shall seem appropriate. It is said that some reptiles occasionally swallow their young to get them out of danger, and when the danger is past bring them forth again. Here we have a case of the offspring swallowing the parent, to come forth again when and where the dutiful child concludes to give the parent a little fresh air.

The Congress of the United States is not called upon to "extend" the Constitution anywhere. It can not annul the Constitution—can not of right annul it—though some seem to believe it may do so by a mere arbitrary exercise of power. It can not extend, withdraw, or amend the Constitution. Regarding its duty, it can obey the Constitution; disregarding that duty, it can violate it. But whatever our acts of Congress may be, whatever part of the territory subject to our control may be affected by them, those acts are and must be always (or they are and must be invalid) under the Constitution and in accord with it.

But treaties, according to some gentlemen, have a sacred function and a vast power and control over us. By the treaty under which we derive our claim, and whatever of right we have to Puerto Rico and the Philippines, it was provided that—

> The civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

Therefore, by virtue of the treaty, say these gentlemen, we have absolute power to legislate as we please respecting these possessions and these people.

The conditions and terms of cession, they insist, are entirely different from those under which we acquired territory heretofore, and being unrestrained by this treaty with Spain, we have a right to do precisely as we please with the islands and their inhabitants. And yet it is an absolute fact, determined by the Constitution and by reason as applied to it, as well as by the decisions of the highest court in the land, that a treaty, in its effect, is simply a law—nothing more, nothing less—subject not only to modification, but to be entirely abrogated and swept away by the legislative power of the nation. Whatever is in the treaty has the force of law, unless repugnant to the Constitution; and whatever might have been put into the treaty, in harmony with and in subordination to the Constitution, may be enacted into law by Congress, with the same effect as if it were contained in the treaty.

I am not going to take the position that the very moment that Spanish treaty was ratified all the people who dwelt in these scores of islands became American citizens. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that a government like ours, under constitutional restraints such as bind our Government in all its operations, in the course of a war or by the treaty of peace concluding it, may acquire territory, leaving it to the Congress, the lawmaking power, to determine what the disposition of it shall be; that is, whether it shall be part and parcel of the United States, or shall not be retained but parted with. But that we can hold these islands or legislate for and govern their inhabitants otherwise than under the Constitution, or can retain the territory except as a part of the Republic, in preparation for statehood, no man can show either by the Constitution or by the decisions of the Supreme Court of these United States.

The momentous question then is, Shall our legislation be for the retention or the disposition of the islands? Or shall we retain some of them and part with others? This question may be answered by another: Do we desire that a particular island or group of islands shall be admitted into the Union of sister States, the inhabitants thereof to be American citizens, entitled to all the rights and privileges which we enjoy? If not, then our legislation should be for the disposition and not for the retention of such island or islands. A prompt decision will save us from the shame of casting off American citizens, of dismembering the Republic.

Those even who believe we would be better off without Puerto Rico—and with them I have no quarrel—look upon it as our territory, just as Arizona is ours; not to be held for a specific purpose as a military or naval reservation is held, or as the Nicaragua Canal strip, a like reservation, should be held; not to be held temporarily until it can be disposed of, but permanently, as a part and parcel of our territory. That being true, and Congress coming to legislate for Puerto Rico, it can legislate concerning it only as it can legislate concerning Arizona or New Mexico.

The legislation of Congress divides itself naturally into two branches; one, that which is general, Federal in its nature, and relates to the whole Union in all its parts, States and Territories, laws of general application, laws that go over the realm and apply everywhere; the other, local, as legislation within a State is local. In legislating locally—that is, for a particular Territory—Congress is under less restraint than a State legislature; for while each must legislate in conformity to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States, the State legislature must also conform its acts to the requirements of the State constitution, while Congress must bow to but one supreme law, the Federal Constitution. So we see that while the Constitution of the United States must remain the supreme law of all the States and Territories, Congress, in legislating for a Territory, is free from the restraint upon local legislation which, in the States, exists by virtue of the State constitutions.

Congress may make for one Territory laws differing widely from those which it may see fit to make for another. It may make for one Territory laws the like of which no other Territory has. But this is true only with respect to local laws. The laws of one Territory may be as unlike the laws of another Territory as the laws of one State are unlike the laws of another State. All, however, whether State laws or Territorial laws, must be tested by the one supreme law—the Constitution of the United States.

Extending a law of the United States to a Territory is nothing more and nothing less than passing the same law, in due and regular form, for the Territory. Some laws are so essentially and necessarily general in their scope and purpose that they become operative in newly acquired territory immediately upon its acquisition.

Such, for instance, was the tariff law of the United States in force when the treaty of peace with Mexico was ratified and California and other territory thereby acquired, as was held in Cross against Harrison. The only difference between the case of California and the case of Puerto Rico lies in the difference between the two treaties under which, respectively, these possessions were acquired. By the treaty under which California came to us the purpose to hold it for statehood was made manifest, while the treaty with Spain does not disclose what disposition we meant to make of Puerto Rico, or whether we had determined what we would do with it. Less was provided in the Spanish treaty respecting the territory ceded and the inhabitants thereof than was provided in other treaties ceding territory to us; but the power of Congress with respect to the Spanish territory covered by the late treaty is neither less nor greater than its power over territory acquired under any former treaty.

A nation ceding territory to us, under a treaty containing stipulations respecting the disposition to be made by us of the ceded territory, and the rights to be guaranteed to its inhabitants, might have just ground of complaint if we should fail or refuse to conform our action to the requirements of the treaty stipulations; but our power and legal rights over territory and people would not depend upon the treaty, but would be measured and determined by the Constitution. If this were not true, the Constitution itself might be amended by a treaty with some foreign nation, even to the extent of destroying every one of its guaranties of freedom for the citizen, and every one of its limitations upon the power of Congress or the Executive or the judiciary, not only in the Territories, but in the States as well. Indeed, if the treaty could affect the Constitution at all, State lines might thus be obliterated, the form of government be entirely changed, and the empire made to take the place of the republic, in name and form as well as in substance. So, as respects the legislation here proposed, the treaty with Spain can cut no figure.

Suppose it had been stipulated in the treaty with Spain that the territory acquired thereby should be held by the United States permanently, but should never be formed into States, and that the inhabitants never should enjoy any of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, but that they should be held in perpetual slavery. Would those stipulations be binding? If not, why not? To the first question I answer: No. To the second I answer: Because the Constitution of the United States, supreme over treaties as well as laws, forbids.

Suppose it had been provided in the treaty that there should be no trial by jury in Puerto Rico; could jury trial then be denied the Puerto Ricans? Suppose it were provided that ex post facto laws could be passed by the Congress of the United States with reference to Puerto Rico; do gentlemen contend that that could be done? The Constitution of the United States determines it all.

But they say of the right of trial by jury, the protection of life and property, that those things are fundamental; that they have grown up out of a civilization of thousands and thousands of years; and, of course, wherever the flag goes, wherever American institutions are installed and the American power reaches, they must be and will be respected. That is begging the question. Just as well repeal all laws against murder, arson, robbery, burglary, upon the theory that surely nobody would commit those offenses; that the protection of life and property is the result of the growth of moral law, the advancement of thousands and thousands of years, many lives illustrious for their goodness teaching and admonishing us that these crimes are destructive even to those who seek to profit by them; and therefore there is no need for laws against them, because the civilization of thousands of years has demonstrated that people can not profitably, and that the masses of the people will not at all, commit murder or other grave crimes.

Ridiculous as that argument would be, it is, in effect, the argument for throwing aside the Constitution and relying upon our own sublimated disposition and civilization. Looking to the steadfastness of the Administration party, standing two or three months by their own professed philosophy of free trade for Puerto Rico, and then in a night switching to the policy of this tariff bill, certainly that could not be done unless the Constitution is to be torn to shreds and thrown to the winds.

Now, then, proceeding upon the theory that Puerto Rico is to remain a part and parcel of the territory over which the United States flag floats, that territory over which Congress is to legislate, that territory for which officers are to be appointed, directed, controlled, or removed by some agency of the Federal Government, it follows irresistibly and inevitably—and there is no escape from it except by getting rid of the Constitution, getting rid of the decisions under it—that Puerto Rico must be governed as the Constitution requires, and must be held and legislated for with a view of bringing it ultimately into statehood; that the people there must have the rights which belong to American citizens. Those rights can not be denied and shall not be denied unless the Constitution be overturned and the Supreme Court decisions of more than a century, without a break, without variance, without question, sustaining the constitutional doctrine, are all to be disregarded.

But it seems, if one may judge from the reports in the morning papers (I do not know whether they are true or not), that it may do, in the estimation of certain leading Republicans, to have a lower rate of duty for a short time; that is, that Congress may not have the right to put upon the Puerto Ricans, upon the American people with respect to trade between them, 25 per cent of the duties laid under the Dingley bill, but can righteously put on 15 per cent for a period of two years, or some other period.

To the man who believes in the general policy of this bill, who believes in that way of treating things, who has lifted himself—no, I will not say that; I was about to say who had lifted himself over the Constitution—who has debased himself enough to crawl under it [applause on the Democratic side]—to that man, the question of 15 per cent or 25 per cent may be a matter of substance. I think I can see how, in some minds, there may be some degree of compromise in limiting to two years the life of this unconstitutional legislation—abandon the Constitution for two years and see how it will work. In two years a large proportion of these Puerto Ricans may starve out; in two years, maybe, their extremely fertile lands may be gobbled up by syndicates. The syndicates may thrive upon American legislation that is un-American; the Puerto Ricans may be despoiled; the poor may die; the rich may be robbed, and the end may be accomplished—all in two years. But as to the constitutional question, as to the question whether the Constitution shall prevail, Congress is as powerless to suspend the Constitution for a minute as to bury it in oblivion for an age. It is as powerless to rob the Puerto Ricans by piecemeal as it is at one fell stroke to deprive them of life, liberty, and property.

Mr. Chairman, whatever may be done with this bill, the people of the American Republic will be aroused by the fact that for the first time in the history of this country, for the first time in the progress of this great Republic, a political party here is striving desperately to hold territory in some other relation than that in which our Territories have been held heretofore; a party which controls the votes of hundreds of thousands of black men upon the claim that it freed them and their ancestors thirty or forty years ago. The descendants of the party of Lincoln—and there might be a great emphasis upon "descendants"—the descendants of the same party are now here struggling desperately, against precedent, against reason, against authority, against the Constitution, against themselves—in gulping down their own declarations and philosophy not many moons old—all, all to inflict upon the Puerto Ricans, notwithstanding all their claims to our chivalrous regard, a tax law as unjust, arbitrary, and odious as any known in the realms of the Sultan of Turkey.

But they will administer it gently! Give them the power to rob, and they will not rob; give them the power to kill, and they will not kill; give them the power to despoil, and they will not despoil. Sweep away the Constitution, and they will put in its place the flag; sweep away the legends of the flag, and they will write others upon it. [Applause.]

What has driven the Republican party to all this? One has not far to go nor much search to make to learn that the majority of the party seem to have determined blindly and greedily—greedily for what they can make out of it—to hold the Philippine Islands. It is not so much a question about Puerto Rico. They are crucifying the Puerto Ricans to authorize them to raise crosses in the Philippines.

They have determined to hold the Philippines. The country is opposed to admitting the islanders to an equality with our American citizens. If they hold them they must either hold them as part and parcel of the American domain, or must hold them in a subject state, in actual slavery, with just as much mitigation as from time to time they choose to throw in. They have covenanted to maintain in the Sulu Islands the vices, the evil tendencies, the polygamy, the degradation of the Orient. In the hope that they can make a little money out of it, in the hope that a favored syndicate here and there will do better for their party, they are ready to bring in anything and everything, and hold those people in chattel slavery, with just such mitigation, as I said before, as they choose to vouchsafe.

Let me say right here that the Philippine problem, in my judgment, is susceptible of two solutions; and I believe that the right solution will have to be applied soon, or the only solution otherwise possible will be made by the current of events, by the force of law, by the mandate of the Constitution. We can part with the Philippines; we can turn those islands over to their inhabitants; we can withdraw our soldiers from the archipelago. By proclaiming that we do not seek to retain those islands we can very speedily restore peace; and in the shadow of peace, in the quiet and serenity of peace, we can easily and in order withdraw from the islands and leave the inhabitants to work out their own destiny; 10,000,000 people in the far away Orient—10,000,000 people under a tropical sun—to work out their own destiny in their own way. That we can do; and that, in my judgment, we ought to do and ought to declare at once that we will do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is the Philippine scheme which gentlemen who are advocates of this bill really have in view, which in large part, I must submit, shapes their action upon this question; because I can not think that they would wantonly wrong the Puerto Ricans. I can not think they would oppress and crush those poor people merely for the sake of violating the Constitution. In my charity, I can not believe implicitly that even for the favor of the syndicates which control so much of their action, and the monopolies to which they are so much indebted, they would perpetrate this great outrage upon those people under other circumstances—rivaling cruel Spain in ignominy. They are prompted now and here by what they feel to be the necessity of the programme upon which they have entered in the Philippines.

The other course is to hold the Philippine Islands, and just as certainly as they are held, just so certainly must they be held and governed under the Constitution. Then the Filipinos must be American citizens, entitled to all rights as such. Then that prolific land under a tropical sun will soon be teeming with American citizens, black, brown, and yellow. The Philippines, if admitted as States, would be entitled to representation upon this floor on the basis of their population—would have more than twice as many Representatives as all New England. And because some Representatives from New England, seeing, as no doubt they do, the graver problem confronting the country, and respecting the Constitution and the courts, have the patriotism and the ability to express, as real statesmen, their views in opposition to the passage of this bill, small statesmen, statesmen of small capacity and attainment [applause] and smaller performances, fancy they are doing something in the supposition that they are making attacks upon the New England giants.

The day is not far distant, I think, when the Republicans of conscience, the Republicans who stand by the Constitution, the Republicans with backbones not made out of angleworms [laughter] will be held as the saviors of their party, if there be any salvation for it.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Go on; I am about through, at any rate.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Am I correct in assuming that in the second contingency to which the gentleman refers he holds that Congress would have no constitutional power to enact a discriminating tariff against the Philippine Islands?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Of course it would not. If we hold the Philippine Islands, they become part and parcel of the United States, to be legislated for under the Constitution. We must hold and govern them for statehood, or we must cease to have dominion and control over them. If we part with them, get rid of them, turn them over to the island people themselves, the temptation to degrade our citizenship or to disregard our Constitution and establish a colonial empire will be gone. There can be no discriminating duties between the Philippine Islands and this country if we hold those islands; there can be no discrimination between the cheap labor of the Philippine Islands, retained by us, and the intelligent labor of this country; there can be no bar by law to prevent those people, and the people who go there and utilize them, from gorging our markets with their serf-made products and competing in the fields of labor with our own people, unless we get rid of the islands instead of holding them.

A few propositions which, to me, seem as plain as our duty to the Puerto Ricans once seemed to the President may be stated in summing up.

The Congress can not legislate at all except under the Constitution.

The Constitution, the purpose in framing and adopting it, the Revolution which made it possible, the Declaration of Independence, the decisions of the Supreme Court—everything in our history—preclude the idea that territory can be acquired, held, and governed with any other view than the formation of new States for admission into the Union of States.

Congress has the power and is charged with the duty, under the Constitution, of legislating for a Territory both generally, as for the entire Republic, and specially or locally, as for the embryo State.

The treaty by which territory is acquired is—subject, of course, to the Constitution—the law of that territory as well as of the Republic until otherwise ordained by Congress.

Extending laws of the United States to a Territory is nothing more nor less than making the same laws for the Territory.

Congress, having no power to extend, withdraw, amend, or annul the Constitution, can have no power to extend it to or keep it from any Territory. The act of Congress extending the Constitution to a Territory can not be more than making the Constitution part of the statutory law of the Territory, subject, like other laws, to be amended or repealed.

Territory acquired by the United States must be held as part of the domain of the Republic for the formation of new States, and governed under the Constitution, or it must be parted with. If not to be held for the formation of new States, the intention to part with it ought to be declared promptly, and the disposition determined upon should not be delayed.

If we have acquired Puerto Rico to be retained, it is part of the domain of the Republic, and within that domain free trade must prevail.

If we have acquired Puerto Rico to dispose of, to part with and not to retain it, then there is no constitutional warrant for any legislation concerning the island, except that appropriate for parting with our title to it.

If Puerto Rico is to be regarded as foreign territory, we have no right whatever to legislate concerning it, and any duty laid by Congress upon any article taken from this country to that island, whether to be collected here or there, is an export duty, expressly prohibited by the Constitution.

I hope that the wisdom of the American people, that even their selfishness—not the greedy selfishness that is blind, but the more intelligent selfishness that sees—may realize the dangers that impend over us in connection with this Philippine problem.

And what a glorious spectacle it would be for the American people to grant to those far-off inhabitants of the Philippine Islands the boon of independence; to declare now our purpose to do it, and thus bring the war to a close; to see a government there established, with the yellow man and the brown man in control; to make with them such trade arrangements, and such arrangements for coaling stations and naval stations as may be desirable; to stand in their estimation as their best friend, and have the advantages of trade relations with them by virtue of their good will; and to have the proud distinction in history of being magnanimous to them, while actually doing what is safest, wisest, and best for ourselves.

We never can gain by departing from the Constitution. We never can profit by trampling it in the dirt or by rending it. We never can profit by the hungry greed that destroys, but we will profit in the present and in the future, profit in every way—in the building up of free government, in the extending of free institutions, in the encouragement to men to strive for freedom everywhere—by directly the opposite course.

Our commerce grows under the flag when it flies in peace. Our commerce grows because we can outstrip others. Commerce is a pursuit of peace.

It is a sad reflection that now, even in a few short months, we have been swerved so far from our ancient moorings, have gone adrift already so far upon a dangerous sea, that not an official voice can be raised, not an official resolution can be passed in this body or in the one at the other end of the Capitol, in recognition of the patriotism and valor or in sympathy for the sacrifices and sufferings of those heroic Boers in South Africa, who to-day are fighting the good, but I fear the hopeless, fight against the foremost exemplar of that "civilization" of thousands of years; the civilization that destroys; the civilization that murders; the civilization that is tyrannous; the civilization that is shooting down husband and son and father, aye, and sister and wife and mother; the civilization that would overthrow republican institutions everywhere; the civilization that is crushing the Boers by the brute power of vast superiority in numbers and resources; the civilization that is prated about here as superior to the Constitution; the civilization on account of which gentlemen upon the other side say we may dispense with the Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us be Americans as our fathers were. Let us, like them, be devoted to our institutions. Let us make our way in the world by merit. Let us spread our commerce, because we are able to do it, in peaceful competition with all the people of the earth. Let us, while maintaining liberty here at home, deprive no race or man of liberty anywhere. Let us get rid of that which is about to pull us down. Let us direct our commerce to the Philippines, as to the four corners of the earth, but let us not extend the Government of our fathers, our Government, the Government of our children, to the far-away islands of the sea. Let us not hold that Philippine country. Let us not wrong the Puerto Ricans. Let us be Americans, true to the Constitution, and then we can face the future without repudiating the past. Then we may hope to solve the problems of the present and the future. Then we may go forward with confidence, guided by the lamp of experience, instead of doing, as some gentlemen are now doing, extinguishing the lamp of the Constitution and plunging along in the uncertain light of that "higher civilization" about which they prate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH
HON. JULIAN M. QUARLES,
OF VIRGINIA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, February 27, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. QUARLES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The island of Puerto Rico is distant from our shores about 1,050 miles and is one of that chain of islands that lies between the Atlantic Ocean and the Caribbean Sea, known as the West Indian Islands. It lies in the Western Hemisphere, in American waters, and belongs naturally to the American Continent.

It is comparatively a small island, a parallelogram in form, and measuring 100 miles east to west and 40 miles north to south, containing about 3,600 square miles. In territory it is not larger than some of our counties. It is traversed from east to west by a range of mountains 1,500 feet in average height and rising in one peak 3,878 feet above sea level. From the base of the mountains rich alluvial tracts extend to the sea, and there are numerous well-wooded and abundantly watered valleys. The soil is very fertile. The principal crops are sugar, coffee, and tobacco of the finest quality, and cotton remarkable for length of fiber, tenacity, and whiteness. Cattle and sheep are there extensively reared of a quality superior to any others in the West Indies. The population of this island, according to the last census, was 900,000, of whom about 582,000 were white.

Puerto Rico was ceded to the United States by Spain under the treaty of Paris, dated December 10, 1898, which was ratified in 1899, and while it came to us an incident of the recent war with Spain, the inhabitants of the island were willing to the cession. They indeed rejoiced in their deliverance from Spanish tyranny and gladly transferred their allegiance to a republic with a written constitution guaranteeing protection to life, liberty, and property, as they thought, throughout the entire extent of the republic. This island in time of war with a foreign power will be of great value to the United States from a strategic point of view. Our Navy in possession of it will command the Caribbean Sea, and thus protect the eastern entrance of the interoceanic canal, should it be built, whether it shall be the Nicaragua or Panama. This is one of the advantages that will be derived from the ownership of this island.

Mr. Chairman, the third section of the bill under consideration reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act all merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico and coming into Puerto Rico from the United States shall be entered at the several ports of entry upon payment of 25 per cent of the duties which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries; and, in addition thereto, upon articles of merchandise of Puerto Rican manufacture coming into the United States customs duties equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax which may be imposed in the United States upon the same articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; and upon articles of United States manufacture coming into Puerto Rico customs duties equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax which may be imposed in Puerto Rico upon the same articles of Puerto Rican manufacture.

This section creates a tariff barrier between the United States and Puerto Rico. It imposes a duty upon all merchandise coming from Puerto Rico into the United States and going from the United States into Puerto Rico, to be paid before entered at the several ports of entry. This is so though Puerto Rico is as much a part of the United States as is New Mexico, Arizona, the District of Columbia, or any of its Territories.

The President, in his annual message sent to Congress in December last, said:

Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

This recommendation the country approved, not only because it was just, but because it was constitutional and in accordance with all precedent. This island had been swept by a great hurricane from end to end on the 8th of August, 1899, reducing over 100,000 people to absolute want. They were homeless and without the necessaries of life. This being the condition of that unfortunate island, the President did but a "plain duty" in recommending that the markets of the United States be opened up to its impoverished inhabitants. The leader of the other side on the floor of the House [Mr. PAYNE], adopting the suggestion of the President, introduced a bill on the 19th of January last providing for free trade between the United States and Puerto Rico. In a letter to a constituent this distinguished gentleman presents the claims of Puerto Rico very clearly. I will read that portion of the letter which I find published in a newspaper:

To sum up, then, Puerto Rico is ours without a dissenting voice anywhere. Her people are impoverished by reason of the hurricane which destroyed the greater portion of two annual crops. She has no markets, being deprived of them by annexation to the United States. Commercially and industrially, without some aid from Congress, she is without hope for the future. A free admission of her products to the United States would give her relief. It will not hurt us, but, on the contrary, will give us a market for $10,000,000 annually, largely of the products of our farms, which will increase as American prosperity comes to Puerto Rico.

This letter, let it be known, was penned by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on the 8th day of this month the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee reported a substitute for his free-trade bill, imposing a tariff tax upon the "impoverished" Puerto Ricans. And why this change in the distinguished gentleman from New York? It is said that the President has changed too; that he now earnestly desires the passage of this substitute bill and would deplore its defeat. Some of the majority party in this House oppose this measure, but the great power of the Administration is being, we are told, brought to bear to constrain members to support it, and it will doubtless be carried through by the free use of the "whip and spur." It is a party measure and has become the policy of the Republican party, and it is said it must not fail of enactment. But what was the necessity of this sudden change in the policy of the Administration and the Republican party in respect to this matter?

This "somersault backwards" is easily explained when it is known that Mr. Oxnard, a representative of the sugar trust, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and made it appear that it was to the interest of the sugar trust for this country to have a tariff tax on Puerto Rico products. The conversion was sudden, and I doubt not profitable. Mr. Chairman, viewing this proposed bill in its moral aspect there never was a piece of legislation attempted more un-American, heartless, and cruel. Such a law would be monstrous, and I submit would be clearly unconstitutional. I will read a part of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The proposed law I contend is within the plain inhibition of this section of the Constitution. But gentlemen on the other side argue that the term "United States" as used in the Constitution does not embrace the Territories, but only the States, and that it is in the power of Congress to rule and legislate for the Territories of the United States without constitutional restraint—in other words, that Congress can rule Puerto Rico outside of the Constitution, and therefore the section just quoted does not apply, and "all duties, imposts, and excises" are not required to be uniform throughout the States and Territories.

Let us examine this proposition. In the first place, it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, through Chief Justice Marshall, in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheat., 317), that the term "United States" in the Constitution includes the Territories of the Union as well as the States. The court said:

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

The court thus holds, Mr. Chairman, that this Republic is composed of States and Territories, and the term "United States" is a name given to the Republic, and that a Territory is not less within the United States than a State; and that "it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other." This decision has never been overruled.

I know it is argued on the other side of this House by some gentlemen that the Government of the United States possesses an "inherent sovereign right," existing independently of the Constitution, to acquire territory, and that in the right to acquire territory is found the right to govern it; and that as the right to acquire is sovereign and inherent the right to rule is sovereign and inherent and not limited by the Constitution. The objection to this logic is that it is based on a false premise. It is not true that the right to acquire territory is sovereign and inherent, existing outside of and independent of the Constitution. The Government has no powers that were not delegated to and conferred upon it, and all that were not delegated were necessarily reserved in the States and people. The first article of the Constitution declares:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States.

The inference is irresistible that Congress has no powers except what were granted to it by the Constitution; and that being so, the powers not granted remain with the States and the people. As was said by Senator HOAR in a speech delivered in the United States Senate in 1898:

Mark the clear distinction between the sovereign powers of the States and those belonging to the United States. The powers of the United States must be affirmatively delegated, or they do not exist. The powers of the States must be expressly prohibited, or they do exist.

The Government of the United States is one of enumerated and limited powers, and those powers being conferred by the Constitution, the Government has only such powers as are affirmatively granted thereby. It follows from this that the Government of the United States has no inherent sovereignty. The Government is but a mere agent with certain powers conferred, and this view is wholly inconsistent with the idea of inherent sovereignty. We look to the Constitution to ascertain the powers of the Government, and they can be found nowhere else.

The rule for determining the powers of a State government is just the reverse of that for ascertaining the powers of the Government of the United States. A State government has inherent powers and those powers continue to exist until prohibited by either its own or the Federal Constitution. But the seat of all power is with the people and there it remains until parted with by them.

The tenth amendment to the Constitution, which is one of the amendments proposed to the First Congress and was ratified by the last State on December 15, 1791, would seem to settle the question I am now discussing:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Here is a distinct recognition of the fact, in this early amendment to the Constitution, that the powers of the Government are "delegated," and those that are not delegated or prohibited to the States are "reserved" to the States, respectively, or to the people. Then how can the Government of the United States have any other powers than those "delegated?" And if the Government can have and has no other powers than delegated powers, it is absurd to talk about it having inherent powers. I say, then, Mr. Chairman, that the Government has no inherent power to acquire territory, but the power to acquire territory is conferred by the Constitution, and it has been so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The rules for interpreting the Constitution is well settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the great statesmen of our country, and to these I wish to call attention.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Martin vs. Hunter's Lessee (1 Wheat., 304-326), said:

The Government of the United States can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given or given by necessary implication.

And the same great jurist, in Givens vs. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1), in speaking of the Constitution, also said:

This instrument contains an enumeration of the powers expressly granted by the people to the Government.

Daniel Webster declared the same doctrine in his "Reply to Hayne," made January 26, 1830. He said:

The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people conferred upon it and no more. The people erected this Government. They gave it a Constitution, and in that Constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited Government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted.

It is a Government of strictly limited powers; of enumerated, specified, and particularized powers; and whatever is not granted is withheld.

In a letter to the Barings dated October 16, 1839, this great statesman wrote:

This General Government is a limited Government. Its powers are specified and enumerated. The State legislatures, on the other hand, possess all usual and extraordinary powers of government, subject to any limitations which may be imposed by their own constitutions, and with the exception of the operation on these powers of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Webster, in his "Reply to Calhoun," made February 16, 1833, said:

The sovereignty of government is an idea belonging to the other side of the Atlantic. No such thing is known in North America. Our governments are all limited. In Europe sovereignty is of feudal origin, and imports no more than the state of the sovereign. It comprises his rights, duties, exemptions, prerogatives, and powers. But with us all, power is with the people. They alone are sovereign; and they erect what governments they please and confer on them such powers as they please. None of these powers is sovereign in the European sense of the word, all being restrained by written constitutions.

He, as late as June 27, 1850, in the Senate, in his speech "On the Constitution and the Union," said:

Sir, we mislead ourselves often by using terms without sufficient accuracy, or terms not customarily found in the Constitution and laws. * * * The term "sovereign" or "sovereignty" does not occur in the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution does not speak of the States as "sovereign States." It does not speak of this Government as a "sovereign Government." It avoids studiously the application of terms that might admit of different views, and the true idea of the Constitution of the United States, and also of the constitution of every State in the Union, is that powers are conferred on the legislature, not by general, vague description, but by enumeration. The Government of the United States holds no powers which it does not hold as powers enumerated in the Constitution or as powers necessarily implied.

The proposition that the Government of the United States has no powers that are not enumerated and specified in the Constitution or necessarily implied from the grants of power is maintained by Mr. Webster with a power of logic that can not be resisted.

Alexander Hamilton entertained the same views. He said in response to the objection of Mr. Randolph, Attorney-General, that the power to incorporate a bank could not be implied from the "nature of the Federal Constitution:"

This proposition is not precisely or even substantially that which has been relied upon. The proposition relied upon is that the specified powers of Congress are in their nature sovereign. That it is incident to sovereign power to erect corporations; and that, therefore, Congress have a right, within the sphere and in relation to the objects of their power, to erect corporations. It shall, however, be supposed that the Attorney-General would consider the two propositions in the same light, and that the objection made to the one would be made to the other. To this objection an answer has already been given. It is this: That the doctrine is stated with this express qualification, that the right to erect corporations does only extend to cases and objects within the sphere of the specified powers of the Government. * * * A particular legislative power implies authority to erect corporations in relation to cases arising under that power only.

I have quoted the views of these two eminent statesmen, not only because of their great ability and profound learning in constitutional law, but because they were liberal constructionists and favored a strong government and were not at all jealous of its powers. They were not strict constructionists.

Not only have we, Mr. Chairman, the Supreme Court and the opinions of Daniel Webster and Alexander Hamilton sustaining the position for which I am contending, to wit, that the Government has no inherent powers, but the leading text writers on constitutional law uphold it.

In Cooley on Constitutional Law, it is said:

The Government created by the Constitution is one with limited and enumerated powers, and the Constitution is the measure and the test of the powers conferred. * * *

It is manifest that there must be a difference in the presumption that attends an exercise of national and one of State powers. The difference is this: To ascertain whether any power assumed by the Government of the United States is rightfully assumed the Constitution is to be examined in order to see whether expressly or by fair implication the power has been granted, and if the grant does not appear the assumption must be held unwarranted. To ascertain whether a State rightfully exercises a power, we have only to see by the Constitution of the United States it is conceded to the Union, or by that Constitution or by that of the State prohibited to be exercised at all. (Pages 29-31.)

The same doctrine is laid down in Hare's American Constitutional Law, volume 1, pages 94, 95.

The proposition that the General Government has inherent powers existing outside of and independent of the Constitution is a vagary without the slightest foundation either in authority or in reason. This idea was never seriously advanced until now. It is found supported in no decision of the courts, nor in any deliberate utterance of any of our great statesmen. But it is condemned by every decision of our highest court when taking it under consideration; and all the great statesmen who have spoken or written upon the subject have likewise condemned it as untenable. It may be a necessity with the Republican party to hold this view, but necessity, Mr. Chairman, is always the tyrant's plea.

I think I may fairly claim that the authorities that I have quoted establish conclusively two propositions: First, that the term "United States" embraces the Territories as well as the States; and second, that the Government of the United States has no inherent sovereign powers and has only such powers as are delegated and expressly enumerated in the Constitution or implied from the grants therein.

With the first proposition established, it follows that Congress can not enact a constitutional law imposing a duty upon products from Puerto Rico different from the duty imposed upon products from other Territories or from the States. Such a law would contravene the constitutional provision that "all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." If we have the power to levy a duty upon Puerto Rican products, we can levy a duty upon the products from New Mexico or Arizona or any other Territory belonging to the United States. Indeed, we have as much right to levy a duty upon the products of one of the States as upon the products of one of the Territories.

The second proposition, that the Government possesses no inherent powers, is established by an overwhelming weight of authorities. Our Government is one of limited and restricted powers.

It is true that Jefferson, Webster, and other statesmen at one time thought that the Government had no power in the Constitution to acquire territory; but the Supreme Court of the United States years ago settled this question, and held that the Government has power under and by virtue of the Constitution to acquire territory. Mr. Jefferson never for a moment thought that the Government had any inherent power to acquire territory. He suggested that the Constitution be amended, giving the Government such power. This, however, was unnecessary and was never done, as the Supreme Court held that it had the power conferred upon it by the Constitution. I repeat that gentlemen on the other side who contend that the Government has an inherent power to acquire territory, and therefore to legislate for such territory outside of the Constitution, rest their argument upon an unsound and false premise. The authorities which I have cited, extending over years and dating almost from the foundation of this Government, demonstrate this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, since the term "United States" embraces and takes in the Territories, and the Government has no inherent power to rule them independent of the Constitution, I affirm that it is clear that the Constitution extends to and over the Territories as well as the States, and that Congress can not legislate for Puerto Rico or any other Territory without constitutional restraint.

The Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided this question in a number of cases.

In the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheat., 317 [1820]) Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, held that the general power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises extends to all places over which the Government extends, including the District of Columbia and all the Territories of the Union, as well as to the States, and that direct taxes may be apportioned among them. And this is so held because the Constitution extends to the Territories.

The court said:

> The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises," for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words, which modify the grant. These words are, "But all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of a power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend.

I have already read to the House that portion of the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in this case which decides that the term "United States" "is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories," and "on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed" in the Territories as well as in the States.

In the case of the United States vs. More (3 Cranch, 160) the same doctrine was substantially declared. This case is a very old one, being decided in 1805. The Court said:

> The Constitution was made for the benefit of every citizen of the United States, and there is no citizen, whatever his condition, or wherever he may be, within the territory of the United States, who has not a right to its protection.

Coming down to a later period, we have the Dred Scott decision, reported in 19 Howard, 393, which most explicitly lays down the doctrine on this subject. Chief Justice Taney in that case declared:

> The power of Congress over the person and property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of government. The power of the Government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself. And when territory becomes a part of the United States the Federal Government enters into possession in the character impressed upon it by those who created it. It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it can not when it enters a Territory of the United States put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the Constitution has denied to it. It can not create for itself a new character separated from the citizens of the United States and the duties it owes them under the provisions of the Constitution. The territory being part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out, and the Federal Government can exercise no power beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved. * * *
> The powers over person and property of which we speak are not only not granted to Congress but are in express terms denied, and they are forbidden to exercise them. And this prohibition is not confined to the States, but the words are general, and extends to the whole territory over which the Constitution gives it power to legislate, including those portions of it remaining under Territorial government as well as that covered by the States.

Mr. Justice Curtis, dissenting upon some of the points decided, concurred in these propositions. He in part said:

> I confess myself unable to perceive any difference whatever between my own opinion of the general extent of the power of Congress and the opinion of the majority of the court, save that I consider it derivable from the express language of the Constitution, while they hold it to be silently implied from the power to acquire territory. Looking at the power of Congress over the Territories as of the extent just described, what positive prohibition exists in the Constitution which restrained Congress from enacting a law in 1820 to prohibit slavery north of 36° 30′ north latitude?

So, Mr. Chairman, we see that the whole court in the Dred Scott case decided in 1856 that Congress had the power to legislate for Territories belonging to the United States, but subject to the limitations of the Constitution. This decision upon this point has never been overruled, but has been frequently affirmed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Constitutional Law, page 317, says of the part of the opinion of Chief Justice Taney which I have quoted:

> The position assumed by the court that Congress in the exercise of its legislative function for the Territories is bound by the restrictive clauses of the Bill of Rights can not be successfully attacked. Indeed, it can make no difference whether that body proceeds under the express grant of Article IV, or under its power implied in the capacity to acquire and hold additional soil. In either case it is equally hedged around and trammeled by the safeguards of individual rights that are contained in the first eight amendments.

I wish to call attention to more recent decisions of the Supreme Court on this question.

In the National Bank vs. County of Yankton (101 U. S., 129) the court, through Chief Justice Waite, held:

> All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included within any State must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. * * * The organic law of the Territories takes the place of a constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. * * * But Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this departmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

We also find the same doctrine enunciated by the court in the case of Murphy vs. Ramsay (114 U. S., 45). The court stated:

> The people of the United States, as sovereign owners of the National Territories, have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution, as are necessarily implied in its terms or in the purposes and objects of the power itself. * * * The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them as to other citizens by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national.

Chief Justice Waite, for the court, in Reynolds vs. United States (98 U. S., 145) held that both the first and sixth articles of amendment to the Constitution applied to the Territory of Utah. The court declared in that case:

> By the Constitution of the United States the accused was entitled to a trial by an impartial jury.

The accused was a citizen of the Territory of Utah. And in the same case it was further said by the court:

> Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation. The question to be determined is whether the law now under consideration comes within this prohibition.

It was decided in the case of Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., 707), by Chief Justice Fuller, speaking for the court, that an act of Congress giving to the local legislature of the Territory of Utah the power to provide that verdicts in civil cases might be rendered by less than the whole number of jurors was unconstitutional, as violating the seventh amendment to the Constitution. Chief Justice Fuller said:

> In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of trial by jury in common-law cases, and the act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule, and could not be treated as attempting to do so. It has been decided by the court that the Territorial act of March, 1892, permitting this, was invalid because in contravention of the Constitution and the act of Congress.

In the case of Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 343) it was declared by the court:

> That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question. It is equally beyond question that the provisions of the National Constitution relating to trials by jury for crimes and to criminal prosecutions apply to the Territories of the United States.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540), held that the third article and the fifth and sixth amendments to the Constitution applied to the District of Columbia, and said, in part:

> There is nothing in the history of the Constitution or of the original amendments to justify the assertion that the people of the District may be lawfully deprived of the benefit of any of the constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and property. * * * We can not think that the people of this District have in that regard less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in the case of Fong Yue Ting vs. United States (149 U. S., 738), in delivering his dissenting opinion, said:

> The Constitution has potency everywhere within the limits of our territory, and the powers which the National Government may exercise within such limits are those and only those given to it by that instrument.

The case of Cross vs. Harrison (16 How., 181) is directly in point. The question in that case was whether customs duties and tonnage dues which had been imposed upon imports and tonnage as military contributions by direction of the President in the exercise of the belligerent rights of a conqueror in Upper California and collected by the military authorities at the captured port of San Francisco between February 3, 1848 (date of the treaty of peace with Mexico), and November 13, 1849 (when the regular collector of that port entered upon the duties of his office pursuant to an act of Congress passed March 3, 1849, "to extend the revenue laws of the United States over the territory and waters of Upper California, and to create a collection district therein"), were illegally exacted and recoverable by the importers.

This case was decided in 1853, and the court in part said:

By the ratifications of the treaty California became a part of the United States. And as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce, it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage. It was bound by the eighteenth section of the act of 2d of March, 1799. The right claimed to land foreign goods within the United States at any place out of a collection district, if allowed, would be a violation of that provision in the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Upper California was acquired and held precisely as Puerto Rico was acquired and is now held. The case therefore applies directly to the point which I am discussing. It must be manifest to the House that if this bill shall become a law it will be unconstitutional and void.

How could any question be more clearly settled by decisions of the Supreme Court than this one? It has been decided time and again that the General Government has no inherent powers, and it has been repeatedly decided in cases extending over nearly a hundred years that the Constitution extends to every place, whether in a Territory or State, where the Government extends its powers and authority by statute. And in the case of Cross vs. Harrison, which I have cited, it was held that the Constitution extends ex proprio vigore to and over a Territory. In that case no statute was enacted to extend the Constitution to Upper California.

It can not be that the highest court in our country has been wrong upon this question for nearly a hundred years.

Must it not strike gentlemen on the other side as difficult to conclude that Congress can rule outside of the Constitution, when it is created by the Constitution and derives all of its powers therefrom? The force of every statute enacted by Congress is traceable back to the Constitution as its source. Wipe out the Constitution and Congress is without power and its statutes are nullities. There can be no such thing as a live statute and a dead Constitution, but the Constitution may be alive and the statute may be without force. Wherever the Government extends its power by law, it is so extended by virtue of the Constitution and the Constitution is therefore necessarily there with the power. It is there, too, with its limitations and restrictions.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is apparent that the doctrine contended for by gentlemen is contrary to the genius of our institutions. How can it be imagined that our fathers intended to establish a government with a policy—an imperialistic policy, such a policy as England had, and against which they rebelled and fought? They did not so intend. They founded a Republic in spirit and every principle the purposed enemy of imperialism.

The Territories are infant States. Their people need the protection of the Constitution of the United States more than even the people of the States. The States have constitutions of their own, whereas the Territories, if the Constitution of the United States does not apply to them, have no constitution and are without the guaranty of protection to life, liberty, and property. They are under tutelage for statehood. Can they better be taught the principles of free government by giving them the protection of the Constitution or by giving them imperialistic rule? That the annexed land is held in trust for future States and the Territories are in a state of preparation for statehood is well determined.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 317), says:

The difference between requiring a continent, with an immense population, to submit to being taxed by a government having no common interest with it, separated from it by a vast ocean, restrained by no principle of apportionment, and associated with it by no common feelings, and permitting the representatives of the American people, under the restriction of our Constitution, to tax a part of the society which is either in a state of infancy advancing to manhood, looking forward to complete equality as soon as that state of manhood shall be attained, as is the case with the Territories, or which has voluntarily relinquished the right of representation and has adopted the whole body of Congress for its legitimate government, as is the case with the District, is too obvious not to present itself to the minds of all.

Chief Justice Taney, in the Dred Scott case, said:

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States.

* * * * * * *

The power to expand the territory of the United States by the admission of new States is plainly given, and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the Government it has been held to authorize the acquisition of a territory not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a State, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new State is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in suitable condition to become a State upon an equal footing with the other States, must rest upon the same discretion.

Justice McLean, of the minority, said:

In organizing the government of a Territory, Congress is limited to means appropriate to the attainment of the constitutional object. No powers can be exercised which are prohibited by the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit, so that, whether the object may be the protection of the persons and property of purchasers of the public lands or of communities who have been annexed to the Union by conquest or purchase, they are initiatory to the establishment of State governments, and no more power can be claimed or exercised than is necessary to the attainment of the end. This is the limitation of all the Federal powers.

Mr. Justice Field, in Weber vs. Harbor Commissioners, 18 Wallace, 65, says:

Although the title to the soil under tide waters of the bay was acquired by the cession from Mexico equally with the title to the upland, they held it only in trust for the future States.

In the case of Knight vs. United States Land Association, 142 U. S., 183, says:

Upon the acquisition of the territory from Mexico the United States acquired the title to the tide land equally with the title to the upland, but with respect to the former, they held it only in trust for the future States that might be erected out of such territory.

In Shively vs. Bowlby, 152 U. S. Reports, 48, Justice Gray held the same doctrine.

The island of Puerto Rico, Mr. Chairman, is held in trust for a future State, and is entitled to the benefit and protection of the Constitution.

Gentlemen on the other side must know that this proposed legislation is revolutionary in its character. It will not stand the test without subverting the fundamental principles of our Government.

Should this bill become a law it will be the first step by Congress in the transformation of this Republic into an empire—into a monarchy. It will mark the distinction between expansion as heretofore had by this Government, carrying with it the Constitution and the blessings of liberty to the newly acquired people, and imperialism pure and simple, as once practiced by the Cæsars and now advocated by the leaders of the Republican party as a tenet of their political faith. It will establish the policy of imperialism which will ultimately and inevitably destroy the principle of human liberty upon which this Republic was founded and without which no free republic can exist.

I am not so much concerned about how much duty this bill imposes, though I believe it to be an outrage upon the people of Puerto Rico, as I am about how this imperialistic policy will affect our institutions and the future of our country. The policy is that Congress shall rule the Territories without constitutional limitations; that the people of the Territories, which, to suit gentlemen on the other side, may be more appropriately called colonies, shall have no guaranties, by a written constitution, of protection to life, liberty, and property, but that they shall be subject to the despotic will of man unrestrained; that the Territories shall be dependencies and their inhabitants subjects. I declare, Mr. Chairman, in all seriousness, that I would prefer, infinitely prefer, the rule of a king to that of a Congress without a constitution, dominated by a political party obeying in every act the mandates of the trusts and syndicates.

But gentlemen may say that the imperialism will be against the people of the Territories and will not affect the people of the United States. My answer to this is in the words of Abraham Lincoln: "Destroy this (the spirit of liberty) and you sow the seeds of despotism at your own doors." This is a great truth. A ruler, I care not who he may be, who will plunder and despoil the distant people of his dominion will plunder and despoil at the first opportunity his people at home. If the Constitution can be withdrawn from the people of the Territories and they be made subjects and vassals to meet the requirements of a political party, how long will it be before it will be trampled under foot and ignored in order that monarchy may have a free hand at home? The government with an imperial policy for part of its people will in time extend that policy to the whole people. Imperialism can not be restrained. We are safe only in its destruction.

We hear gentlemen on the other side say that no harm is intended; that all that is wanted is to raise money so that the Puerto Ricans may be given schools and other good things. The progress of a republic to monarchy has always been under the leadership of pretended patriots.

History teaches us a lesson which we may heed with profit. Rome was once a republic and became an empire, and its decline and fall followed. Our great country is now a republic, and became great by being a republic, and there are gentlemen here who would convert it into an empire to be attended with the same fate as Rome.

There is much in what Gibbon in his Decline and Fall says that is apposite, instructive, and warning:

The tender respect of Augustus for a free constitution which he had destroyed can only be explained by an attentive consideration of the character of that subtle tyrant.

When he framed the artful system of imperial authority, his moderation was inspired by his fears. He wished to deceive the people by an image of civil liberty, and the armies by an image of civil government. The names and forms of the ancient administration were preserved by him with anxious care. The usual number of consuls, prætors, and tribunes were annually invested with their respective signs of office and continued to discharge some of their least important functions. Cæsar—had provoked his fate by ostentatiously taking the title of king, while he might have reigned as such under the title of consul or tribune. Augustus was sensible that mankind is governed by names; nor was he deceived in his expectation that the senate and people would submit to slavery, provided that they were respectfully assured that they enjoyed their ancient freedom. To explain, in a few words, the system of the imperial government, as it was instituted by Augustus and maintained by those princes who understood their own interest and that of the people, it may be defined as an absolute monarchy disguised by the forms of a commonwealth. The masters of the Roman world environed their throne with darkness, and humbly professed themselves the accountable ministers of the senate, whose supreme decrees they dictated and obeyed. The face of the court corresponded with the forms of the administration.

As late as the age of the Antonines the Greek historians say that "although the sovereign of Rome, in compliance with an obsolete prejudice, abstained from the name of king, he possessed the full measure of regal power." As imperialism became more fully established the forms and shams were dispensed with. "The fine theory of a republic," says Gibbon, "insensibly vanished."

This brief account from Roman history must at this time impress the American citizen. Do we see in what is happening in this country a parallel to what happened to the Roman Republic? Are not gentlemen on the other side playing the arts of the wily Augustus? Do they not say that there is no imperialism in our Government, and yet is not the proposed legislation imperialistic? Do they not call our Government a Republic, and yet would they not rule it as an empire? Do they not say our Government is a free Government, and yet are they not trying to make vassals of the inhabitants of our Territories? Did not the President declare that the war against Spain was for the sake of humanity and that forcible annexation was criminal aggression and was not to be thought of, and has not the close of this war been followed by a war of conquest?

Did not the President do what no other President ever did, declare war against the Filipinos, when the Constitution says only Congress can declare war? Has he not professed devotion to the Monroe doctrine, and yet by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would he not abrogate that doctrine, so dear and important to the American people? Let not, Mr. Chairman, the people of this country be deceived. "Philosophy teaches us specially by the examples of Roman history." "Marius and Cæsar," says Gibbon, "subverted the constitution of their country by declaring themselves the protectors of the people;" and Augustus pretended to be a servant of the people while destroying their liberty and making himself a dictator. He established "an absolute monarchy disguised by the forms of a commonwealth." "His successors for a while observed his constitutional fictions," but the "republic insensibly vanished."

The President some months ago asked, "Who will haul down the flag?" The question has gone unanswered until now. The Republican party answers the question by the introduction of this Puerto Rican bill. This party would haul down the flag as it floats over this Republic, the emblem of liberty, justice, and humanity, and float it over an empire, the emblem of tyranny, oppression, and wrong.

Mr. Chairman, I would have the people of this country to read again of the oppression and outrages from which our forefathers suffered under the rule of monarchy. We should not forget the wrongs inflicted upon them lest we forget what imperialism means. They were ruled by a king and a parliament unrestrained by a written constitution. And, Mr. Chairman, what is the difference between the rule of a king and his parliament without a constitution to restrain and the rule of a president and his congress without a constitution to limit?

Let us see what were some of the wrongs visited upon the people of this country by King George and his Parliament. I read from the Declaration of Independence, and the charges are against King George: "He has erected a multitude of new offices and sent thither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance. He has kept among us in times of peace standing armies without the consent of our legislatures. He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power. He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

"For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:" "For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world: For imposing taxes on us without our consent: For depriving us in many cases of the benefits of trial by jury: For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offenses." "He has abdicated government here by declaring us out of his protection and waging war against us. He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people."

These are but a few of the crimes committed by King George against the American people—his people.

Are we to give to our Territories such a rule as this? I say no; not as long as the words of the immortal Henry, "Give me liberty or give me death," are remembered. These words tell how liberty is to be valued, and they, too, like Henry, are immortal. They were in the hearts and on the lips of our forefathers for seven long years of bloody warfare. And they are upon the lips of every oppressed people struggling for freedom. We hear them from the lips of the farmers of the Transvaal in their heroic struggle for the preservation of their Republic. We hear them from the lips of the Filipinos in the jungles of Luzon. And, Mr. Chairman, in view of the imperial policy inaugurated by the present Administration and the threatened destruction of our institutions, it is time the American people were taking those words afresh upon their lips.

Never before in the history of our country were there greater questions pending before the people for solution. The money question is one of vast importance. The trust question is another of deep interest and concern to the people; but there can be no greater or more momentous question than the question whether or not this great Republic shall be preserved, thereby preserving our liberties, or shall perish from the face of the earth. The people can not and will not be recreant to their duty. We hold this Government in trust for generations to come. Should we prove faithless to the trust, we will commit a crime against ourselves and against posterity. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Trade of Puerto Rico.

SPEECH

HON. WILLIAM H. RYAN,

OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. RYAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Let us at least be honest. This is the place and the present the time when the members of this House, irrespective of the side to which their political belief has assigned them, should discuss frankly, fairly, and thoroughly all the conditions, constitutional, commercial, legal, and practical that the cession of these islands to the United States has brought before Congress. The people demand frankness of us. We owe it to our constituencies. I owe it to a constituency whose Christian teachings prompt them to revere the Ten Commandments, particularly that commandment which says "Thou shalt not bear false witness." I owe it to a constituency a portion of which has come in the tide of progress to make up the great population of foreign born, who have suffered all the privations of imperialistic government and the hardships of the large standing army.

We are now confronted with a problem which reaches far into the future, and whether we solve it rightly or wrongly so will we be praised or censured by the next generation and the multitude unborn. It is therefore of vast importance that we be honest. Let us be honest as to the importance of this step; we owe that to ourselves. Let us be honest with the Puerto Ricans; we owe it to those dusky burnt children of the tropical clime, who, struggling to be freed from the tyrannical rule of Spain, greeted General Miles with open arms—greeted him as a savior who had come to bring them out of the house of bondage and into the land of the free—honest to those little ones who scattered flowers in the path of our soldiers as they marched to San Juan. Let us be honest to the people of our own country. Let us be honest to the laboring man of these United States, who is vitally interested in our course with reference to these new possessions.

The legal and the technical sides of this question have been discussed. My able colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has viewed it in its commercial light, but the fanciful twists of his giant brain, that have even gone so far as to give expression to his belief in two measures of diametrical sentiment, have placed his ideas in the deadly parallel and caused him to exclaim, "If we do not put a tax on the products of this island we are commercially doomed, and if we do put a tax on the products of the island we are doomed also." To relieve the strain I would suggest to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that he introduce a third measure authorizing the President to sever what appears to be our imperialistic connection with Puerto Rico. I am neither a lawyer nor an Ohioan, so I will not presume to expound the Constitution in its bearing on this question.

I have, however, enjoyed the privilege of being a student of those able minds who have expounded the Constitution in its bearing on this particular question, and I shall ask the indulgence of your time and attention later on to quote to this House passages from the opinions handed down by Chief Justice John Marshall, by Justice Cooley, and by Justice McLain, whose memories have been kept green and whose opinions have been revered by all men in all times until the present moment. Our Republican friends have made it imperative that we contrast these opinions with those of my friend from New York, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; with Mr. GROSVENOR, of Ohio, and those other stanch party leaders on this floor, who now ask us to take a radical step in the opposite direction to which we have been taught to walk, and in opposition to that course which has, until this time, maintained our grand institutions and made us a happy and a contented people, enjoying life in the blessedness of freedom.

As this debate has been open for some time, I shall not endeavor to bring into it at this period any new topic of discussion, but still I do not intend to vote against the measure without first laying before the House my views on the subject. Mr. Chairman, what is the status of the case as we now have it?

To go back to the beginning and picture the landing of our victorious arms on the shore of the island. It is not for me to say at this time what the sentiment of our people toward the island was at that period. Neither shall I assume to tell this House what feeling prompted the Puerto Ricans to their demonstrations of enthusiastic greeting. Instead, I read from the report of General Miles, commander of the army of invasion:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
Ponce, Puerto Rico, July 28, 1898.

To the inhabitants of Puerto Rico:

In the prosecution of the war against the Kingdom of Spain by the people of the United States in the cause of liberty, justice, and humanity, its military forces have come to occupy the island of Puerto Rico.

They come bearing the banner of freedom, inspired by a noble purpose to seek the enemies of our country and yours and to destroy or capture all who are in armed resistance. They bring you the fostering arm of a nation of free people, whose greatest power is in its justice and humanity to all those living within its fold. Hence the first effect of this occupation will be the immediate release from your former political relations and, it is hoped, a cheerful acceptance of the government of the United States. The chief object of the American military forces will be to overthrow the armed authority of Spain and to give to the people of your beautiful island the largest measure of liberty consistent with this military occupation.

We have not come to make war upon the people of a country that for centuries have been oppressed, but, on the contrary, to bring you protection, not only to yourselves, but to your property, to promote your prosperity, and bestow upon you the immunities and blessings of the liberal institutions of our Government. It is not our purpose to interfere with any existing laws and customs that are wholesome and beneficial to your people so long as they conform to the rules of military administration of order and justice. This is not a war of devastation, but one to give to all within the control of its military and naval forces the advantages and blessings of enlightened civilization.

NELSON A. MILES,
Major-General, Commanding United States Army.

This was followed in the succeeding month by the signing of the protocol under which hostilities between the United States and Spain ceased. The treaty of peace between the two countries was signed by the commissioners in December of that year and was ratified by the Senate of the United States in February, 1899. By the terms of the treaty the island of Puerto Rico was ceded to the United States.

Section 8, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States, says:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

The powers and limitations of Congress under the Constitution have been placed before this House plainly and strongly, and it is not of moment that I go into them in the limited time I have at my disposal. I shall, however, as briefly as possible quote from able constitutional authorities to show that this action is without precedent.

First of all, I read from the resolution passed by Congress prior to the declaration of war with Spain. I do so because it has been stated that the action of the Democrats in that Congress caused the nation to go to war and brought on this question. For the part the Democratic party took in urging the Administration to that war in humanity's cause, I honor it. I desire to show, however, that Congress did not desire or intend that the Constitution should be violated in providing government for whatever territory may, or was to come, into our possession by reason of that war. The resolution reads:

The United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island [Cuba] except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

The resolution says Cuba, but it is plain to even a careless observer that the intention of Congress was to demonstrate that we were not entering into a war of conquest.

Chief Justice Cooley has given to us an opinion that I feel is particularly pertinent to the topic. It leaves no ground for equivocations, and it is brief and to the point. He says:

The Constitution itself never yields to treaty or enactment; it neither changes with time, nor does it in theory bend to the force of circumstances. It may be amended according to its own permission; but while it stands, it is "a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances." Its principles can not, therefore, be set aside in order to meet the supposed necessities of great crises. "No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government."

Justice Cooley has been careful in reaching this decision. He would rather that the Constitution be paramount to the greatest crisis that time might bring, so that men would not err in the heat of nerve-raking scenes. Such judgment must be listed as the soundest judgment. Having dispelled any hesitancy that I may have entertained in a feeling that the present time was one when we should not look back to the wise judgment of those able jurists—and I assure the gentlemen that I entertained it but briefly—let us proceed to other authorities which say that we can not place a tax on one part of the country and allow another part to go free. Chief Justice Marshall has held that—

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary on the principles of our Constitution that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other.

Justice McLean could have written nothing more apropos to the discussion of this week, even if he were a member of this House and was present at this time, than is contained in the following opinion as to the limitations of Congress:

No powers can be exercised [by Congress] which are prohibited in the Constitution or which are contrary to its spirit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to discuss a little of the history of our advent into Puerto Rico, and view, as well as I can, the island as we found it. It was not aggression or force by which our arms marched victoriously to the seat of government in Puerto Rico.

The flame of our cannon and the swish of the Mauser did not blaze the way. Our gallant soldier boys trampled over no dead comrades nor climbed blood-stained heights 'mid hazy smoke of battle to plant the Stars and Stripes on the topmost peak of the island, where all nations might see its folds float flauntingly and gloriously in the breeze. Puerto Rico did not come by conquest. It came because we had given to the world a mandate of manliness and were known to the extreme ends of either hemisphere as the nation of humanity, the defender of the oppressed, and our homes were the mansions of the "free and the brave." We were simply greeted to possession, and in that word I would embody the purest sentiment of anticipated enjoyment. General Miles was received as an emancipator. The Puerto Ricans felt that he was to make them free. They pictured contentment and equality with all men as their future lot. They viewed a new era for their country. They gloried in the government to come, and, if we are to believe the reports, which we have no just cause to doubt, they welcomed our Army, believing that they were throwing wide their portals to the Constitution and the Government of the United States.

From what I have learned and have heard here stated that is the prima facie case of our material acquirement of the territory. The report of General Miles bears it out. It is my purpose to show in this regard that we should clear ourselves of any charge of deceit. If we do so, we are doing naught but being honest. Does this measure carry out our promise? Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that it does not. We have but two ways to give to those people what we promised them amid the chaos of war, when men and nations usually speak as man to man and nation to nation. What are these two things? Surely they are not the benefits of the unwritten constitution that a colleague pictured so brightly and said existed in the human mind or human conscience. No, Mr. Chairman, not that. We must give the Puerto Ricans the privileges and benefits of the Constitution, that great state paper penned by Jefferson when we were a Puerto Rico in principle, or we must give them their independence and allow them to bring forth a new Jefferson and a new constitution, which will be sufficient to their conditions and bring them their expected happiness.

We can not ask these people of our new possession, the Pearl of the Antilles, to take a step backward in the tide of time and give them poorer trade and governmental relations than those which they enjoyed prior to the signing of the treaty of Paris, prior to the war with Spain. I appeal to this House, and particularly to you, my Republican friends, to allow no cloud of trust smoke to so dim your view that you may not see this comparison of conditions as they existed under the rule of Spain and as they will exist under the views of the Republican majority of the Ways and Means Committee that are to be forced upon the country. But I am glad to say that the conditions to come are not sanctioned by the Constitution, controvert it as you will. [Applause.]

We have these facts from reports of Mr. Davis and others who have investigated the subject Puerto Rico has an area of about 4,000 square miles, and about a million of inhabitants, over 800,000 of them being white people of mixed nationalities—Americans, Irish, English, French, Spanish, Italians, and Portuguese—and the information I have warrants me in saying that about one-fourth of the people can read and write. They are not savages, Mr. Chairman. They know a good government from a bad government—right from wrong. They are law-abiding and thrifty, and the great majority follow agricultural pursuits for a livelihood. What rights and privileges did they enjoy under Spanish rule? Let us see. The first thing we note is that they were given equal representation with the other provinces of that government in the Spanish Cortes. That was just and honest.

At the time they became a part of this country by treaty they had not only no public debt but one million and a half dollars in their treasury. For the five years previous to this statistical report the exports of the island were worth nearly $85,000,000, the imports about $70,000,000, leaving a trade balance in their favor of nearly $15,000,000, which would mean about $3,000,000 per year. The chief products of the island are sugar. coffee, and tobacco. The annual average production of sugar is about 58,000 tons. The great quantity of their sugar was exported to Spain, the tobacco to Cuba and there mixed with Cuban product and sold in foreign markets. We gather from these facts that the island can pay its way from its own resources. In average times it is more than self-supporting. Last year was an extraordinary year in the island. The hurricanes wrecked the plantations, strewing devastation broadcast, and destroying millions of dollars' worth of crops in the field and in storage. The work of the elements has left them, especially the poorer classes, in a degree, dependent upon the charity of this country.

Our course should not be one of forcing further hardships upon these people. Would it not be preferable to be as liberal as possible in our dealings—trade relations—with the island under these conditions, especially when we can do so in strict conformity with the Constitution? But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says that the duty will be placed upon the sugar trust, as that corporation controls all the sugar there is on the island at the present time. Then, in theory, I step across to the other side of this House, where I find I am outside of the Constitution, and I ask: If this tax on importation is levied against the sugar trust, why are we reducing it from 25 per cent of the Dingley tax to only 15 per cent of that tax?

Gentlemen, if your side of the House ever decides that it wants to tax the sugar trust, tax it to the limit and tax it every day, or it will take you until the end of time to reimburse this nation for the taxes it has dodged. Giving due attention to what the gentleman from Illinois has to say about the sugar trust, I will assume for the present—and feel safe in my assumption—that the tax is on the Puerto Rican, as, with the assistance of nature, he has produced the sugar. We can afford to be fair and liberal and give to these people a demonstration that they have benefited by the unfurling of the Stars and Stripes on their island. Let the Constitution follow the flag.

Though I am not an admirer of President McKinley in the policies he has mapped out for this Government, and on the majority of his themes I am diametrically opposed to him, still I would be less a man and no Democrat at all if I did not heartily concur in his sentiment as regards our commercial treatment of this island. I quote here from his annual message and ask for the attention of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee while I read it:

> It must be borne in mind that since the cession Puerto Rico has been denied the principal markets she had long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under Spanish sovereignty.
> The markets of Spain are closed to her products except upon terms to which the commerce of all nations is subjected. The island of Cuba, which used to buy her cattle and tobacco without customs duties, now imposes the same duties upon these products as from any other country entering her ports. She has, therefore, lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba without any compensating benefits in this market. Her coffee was little known and not in use by our people, and therefore there was no demand here for this, one of her chief products.
> Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

Now note what the Secretary of War has to say:

> The highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interest of this people as our own; and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

In addition to these statements and the statements of able men well versed in the conditions of the island at the time of the cession, I call attention to the fact that during this session Mr. PAYNE of New York, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, introduced a bill following these lines. It is natural to presume that he was prompted by the sentiment that stirred the President and was acting in accord with the policy of the Administration when he did so. Here we stop suddenly. Mr. PAYNE withdraws his bill and substitutes a measure that will place a tax of 25 per cent of the Dingley tariff on all imports and exports of Puerto Rico. We have no ground for believing that the President has ordered this or intimated that it was his desire. He has, however, offered no resistance. Now, I ask, why this radical change? I pause for a reply.

What is this done for? Where is the necessity of going outside of the Constitution when we can give these people just and equitable government within the limitations of that great paper? There must be a cause for this change of sentiment on the part of the Ways and Means Committee. If not, why this unprecedented, unwarranted, and, I believe, unconstitutional action of Congress? What is there in it for the great mass of people of this country known as the working class? Is it the intention to have citizens in one part of the country and subjects in another? Is it not dangerous for the American people to allow the flag to be planted where the Constitution can not follow? I say, as we treasure the liberty that this Government of ours affords us, guard well the principles that have been handed down by Washington, by Jefferson, and by Lincoln—the principles that have made it possible for this country to maintain its proud position among the nations of the globe.

I do not for an instant believe that this bill is meant solely to settle the question of our relations with Puerto Rico. I shall go further and say that I do not believe there is a majority of the members of this House who so believe. The framers of this measure, whoever they may be—and I regret that its parentage should be lost in obscurity—know that its effects will reach through Puerto Rico and away to the Philippines, where Aguinaldo is still playing the character of the squirrel and the fox. If this bill was unshod of any intention to stretch out its arms to the Philippines there would be no such strenuous action on the part of the Ways and Means Committee.

Politics would be eliminated to a great extent, and we should be compelled to face only the proposition of what is best for Puerto Rico. This measure embodies more than all that. It is the first step in the direction of imperialistic government. It leads from the republic to the empire; and, gentlemen, if you still insist on the adoption of this unwarranted and unconstitutional measure, if you insist on making the Philippines part of the United States, you must eventually, judging by your efforts to date, in direct opposition to the opinions of the Supreme Court and of all the Secretaries of State, find yourselves in the vexing position of fixing one rate of import duty for Puerto Rico, another for New York, another for Florida, and another for Manila.

Is it not enough that we strain every timber in the Constitution to reach some kind of a settlement of this question, or must we pay out millions of dollars annually as well, and secure no benefit from the commercial relationship that we may enjoy therefrom? It is proved beyond peradventure that we can secure no advantage in any equitable trade relation that we may establish with the islands in the oriental seas. From the reports of the Treasury Department it is shown that the entire import and export trade of the entire archipelago amounts to $30,000,000 per year. Presuming that no other nation traded one dollar's worth with the islands; that we received all the trade, and figuring a reasonable profit from it, you would expend three and one-half times as much to maintain a standing army of 25,000 men, which all authorities agree must be maintained after order has been restored. And you would put in direct competition with American labor 12,000,000 brown and yellow men of the far east.

We are now maintaining an army there of 65,000 men at an annual expense of $65,000,000. History shows us that every government on the earth which has acquired colonial possessions and holds them has found it necessary to establish a large standing army of occupation. I shall not enter into the deplorable conditions wrought upon European countries by the great army appendage, primarily because I have not the time, and because I have no desire to bring to my Republican friends more anguish and dismay than has come to their lot through the agency of this iniquitous measure. They are dodging now the storm that is sure to appear as soon as they feel themselves safe enough to declare to the country that through their majority in Congress they intend to enact the large standing army bill into law. But to follow a line of commercial inquiry.

It is an admitted fact that our labor can not compete with the labor of the Philippines. If we hold the islands there can possibly be no benefit to the American workman, either direct or indirect. There can be no benefit to the country, because our expenses would far outweigh our receipts. Who, then, will benefit by such acquirement? The American workman has the answer to this question from Hawaii. Capitalists now have the control of that Territory. They went there with improved machinery, hired Chinese, Filipino, and coolie labor at the munificent sum of 15 cents a day, and this labor is now thrown in competition with the white labor of our Western and of our Southern States. Six dollars a month is considered good pay in the Philippines. For the harvest season $1.50 per week is excellent remuneration for labor.

This is the pay and this is the class of laborers that the Americans will be compelled to compete with if we take the Philippines. Capital will control it as surely as it controls Hawaii, and capital is always seeking the cheapest labor.

No American workman can go to the Philippines and mingle with the laborers of that territory. Puerto Rico, however, is not identical in this regard. The Puerto Rican is as superior to the Filipino as the Cuban is superior to the Costa Rican. All are equally entitled to be free. While the Constitution is a heritage to us, for which our fathers bled and died that we might forever remain a free and independent people, still I would like to see all nations enjoy its benefits, or rather the benefits that we enjoy, and especially would I glory in the freedom of the oppressed.

I admire the gallant Boer as he battles for his liberty in the Transvaal, and my sympathies from the bottom of my heart are with him; the sympathy of the American people is with him, and to no greater extent than it is with the Cuban and the Puerto Rican; and I now repeat that this country is not truly represented, neither in sentiment nor in principle, when you vote through this Congress a heavier burden for the men of the Antilles than they carried under Spain. Not only is your action unconstitutional, according to the opinions of the great jurists of the past, but it is also unjust. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Policy Relative to the Philippine Islands.

HON. ALEXANDER S. CLAY,

OF GEORGIA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Thursday, March 1, 1900,

On the joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands, introduced by Mr. BEVERIDGE January 4, 1900, as follows:

"A joint resolution (S. R. 53) defining the policy of the United States relative to the Philippine Islands.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Philippine Islands are territory belonging to the United States; that it is the intention of the United States to retain them as such and to establish and maintain such governmental control throughout the archipelago as the situation may demand."

Mr. CLAY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In addressing myself to the resolutions which have just been read, I speak from the standpoint of one who voted in favor of the ratification of the treaty. The remarks which I shall make, however, will be perfectly consistent with the views I entertained and expressed before and at the time the treaty was ratified. The reasons which induced me to cast that vote were fully explained at the time, and I do not deem it necessary to reiterate those views. I took occasion then to announce on the floor of the Senate that I favored a declaration on the part of Congress setting forth fully that it was not the purpose of our Government to hold and govern the Philippine Islands permanently against the consent of their population, but, on the contrary, we should give to them every assurance by legislative action that our purpose was to grant them independence and to assist them in forming a government which shall be free and independent, one suitable to their conditions and surroundings, one capable of maintaining law and order, one fully capable of discharging international obligations, and a government that would enable them to realize the best aspirations of the people of those islands.

During the discussion of the treaty no Senator, so far as I remember, belonging to either political party contended on the floor of the Senate that our Government should permanently retain these islands and govern them against the will of the inhabitants. If such a purpose was entertained by either the President or any member of the Senate, no expression indicating such purpose can be found in the record of the public debates or in any official paper from the executive branch of the Government.

I remember well the resolution that came from the House of Representatives declaring war against the Government of Spain. That resolution passed the House of Representatives without making any provision for the independence of Cuba. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and came back from that committee with both a majority and a minority report. My friend the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] joined our Democratic friends on this side of the Chamber, and the majority report was not only in favor of independence for the people of Cuba but recognized the de facto government existing on that island. It was on that occasion that the distinguished Senator from Ohio made one of the most eloquent and forcible speeches ever delivered in the Senate in favor of liberty, independence, and self-government. It reminded us of the early days of the Republic and breathed the same spirit of liberty which fired the soul of Patrick Henry. In concluding this most remarkable speech, which attracted the attention of the entire country, what did our friend say, having reference to the war with Spain? He said:

Business interests may be interfered with, loss of life may occur, all apprehended evils may result, but no matter what the cost, in the presence of this commanding duty we must go forward. The time, I repeat, for diplomacy has passed. The time for action has come. Let the doubting, the opposing go to the rear, while the virile, strong-minded, patriotic, liberty-loving masses of American people, coming from all sections and all pursuits and avocations of life, rally as one man around our gallant Army and Navy, and, taking the flag of our country, carry it on to triumphant victory.

This was not all the distinguished Senator said. He declared:

A victory, Mr. President, for civilization over barbarism; a victory for the right and capacity for man to govern himself; a victory for the Western Hemisphere; a victory for Cuba; a victory for freedom, liberty, and independence; a victory worthy the descendants of the heroic men who achieved our independence and worthy of the successors of those heroic men who have since preserved and perpetuated our priceless heritage.

I wonder whether the distinguished Senator thinks that the course we are now pursuing toward the people of the Philippine Islands is in favor of freedom, liberty, and independence. Those were patriotic words; and if they were applicable to the people of Cuba, why are they not applicable to the people of the Philippine Islands?

Mr. FORAKER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Georgia has spoken so kindly of the remarks I made a year ago that I dislike even to appear to be taking exceptions to anything he may state; but I do not want him to pass from this subject until I say to him that I have not changed the views that I expressed one year ago, but entertain the same now; and I do not understand that anyone else has changed views since then, but that the ultimate purposes which we were talking about are still entertained and will be pursued.

Mr. CLAY. Those purposes may be entertained, but I see no evidence that there is any intention of carrying out such purposes. I will say in my opinion we are further to-day from granting independence and self-government to the people of the Philippine Islands than we have ever been since the ratification of the treaty. The very resolution which we are now debating contemplates the permanent retention of these islands. Has the party in power shown any disposition to favor the policy indicated by the Senator from Ohio?

The Senator from Ohio, always eloquent, logical, and consistent, and in favor of liberty, freedom, and independence, had something to say on the ratification of the treaty.

I remember well the substance of an expression that came from the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and which apparently met the approval of those most ardently in favor of the ratification of the treaty. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains the language of the honorable Senator. I repeat his exact words:

I do not understand anybody to be proposing to take the Philippine Islands with the idea and view of permanently holding them and denying to the people there the right to have a government of their own, if they are capable of it and want to establish it. I do not understand that anybody wants to do that. I have not heard of anybody who wants to do that. The President of the United States does not, I know, and no Senator in this Chamber has made any such statement.

Now, mark you, Mr. President, this is very strong language, coming from the distinguished Senator from Ohio, the home of the President, and used on the floor of the Senate just before the vote was taken on the ratification of the treaty. Mark you, the Senator declared that he knew that the President of the United States did not intend permanently to hold these islands and to deny to the people the right to have a government of their own.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HANSBROUGH in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Georgia, but it seems to me he ought, in giving our positions, to say that it was expressly stated by each and every Senator. I have not any doubt about it. I know it was by myself, not that we would be in favor of granting independence immediately upon the ratification of the treaty and taking possession of the islands, but so soon in the course of events as it should be found these people were capable of self-government, and meanwhile, from the beginning and until that time, we should grant them the fullest measure of local self-government possible.

Mr. CLAY. I would be glad to see the faith of those who say they favor such policy demonstrated by works. We have no substantial evidence showing that this policy is to be pursued, but, on the contrary, every indication points in the opposite direction.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] delivered an eloquent and forcible speech in favor of the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think I ought to call public attention to the fact, before the Senator proceeds to quote anything from my colleague, that my colleague is detained from the Senate by reason of a severe domestic affliction.

Mr. CLAY. I desire under no circumstances to make any improper reference to the Senator's colleague.

Mr. HOAR. I have made this general statement, not because I supposed the Senator from Georgia would for a moment be forgetful of that fact, but that the public might understand if any quotation was made from my colleague, the reason why he did not reply to it, if necessary, on the spot.

Mr. CLAY. I so understood, Mr. President.

I have taken the trouble to read it most carefully, and the language used upon the occasion could have but one interpretation. After the treaty was ratified, his views, as expressed at that time, were in favor of legislation by Congress granting to the Filipinos the right of self-government. To show that my construction of his language is correct, I quote from his speech delivered in the Senate his exact language as to the future government of the Filipinos. He said:

> Suppose we ratify the treaty. The islands pass from the possession of Spain into our possession without committing us to any policy. I believe we shall have the wisdom not to attempt to incorporate those islands with our body politic or make their inhabitants a part of our citizenship. I believe we shall have the wisdom, the self-restraint, and the ability to restore peace and order in those islands and give their people the opportunity for self-government and for freedom under the protecting shield of the United States until the time shall come when they shall stand alone.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts also said in the same speech:

> I want no subject races and no vassal States. That we had by the fortunes of war assumed a great responsibility in the Philippines; that we ought to give to those people an opportunity for freedom, for peace, and for self-government.
> I want to get this country out of war and back to peace. I want to get the disposition and control of the Philippines out of the hands of the war power and place them where they belong—in the hands of Congress and the President. I want to enter into a policy that shall enable us to give peace and self-government to the natives of those islands. The rejection of the treaty makes all of these things impossible.

Every Senator who spoke in favor of the ratification of the treaty in legislative sessions except two, who delivered constitutional arguments, contended at that time that Congress should take action in favor of self-government for the Filipinos after the treaty was ratified. The senior Senator from Colorado, who was an able and earnest advocate of the ratification of the treaty, took strong grounds at that time in favor of future action by Congress granting independence to these people. He said:

> There are few people in the world incapable of self-government. I believe the people of Luzon are capable of self-government now. I believe the people of some of the islands are. I do not know but all are. Mr. President, I keep in view this truth which I have stated, which I believe to be a truth, that the people are entitled to a government of their own making, and that we have no right to say, "Your standard is so low you will create a government which we can not affirm; therefore you can not have a government of your own." They are entitled to only such a government as they themselves can maintain; it must be one producing order and protection to persons and property, for otherwise it is not a government at all.

This is not all he said. He continued:

> We shall make a mistake if we make up our minds that we are going to govern these people from here, that we are going to govern them with Anglo-Saxons whom we send out there from here to administer the affairs of that country. You will need 50,000 soldiers; in a little while you will need more, for they are a great people. They are a people who are willing to contend for their liberty, and I believe it also to be an axiom that a people who will fight for their liberty and who are willing to die for it are capable of maintaining it.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. TELLER. I would like to say to the Senator from Georgia, who has done me the honor to quote my remarks, that I have not changed my views in the slightest degree; and I think, if anything, that I am stronger in that belief now than I was then.

Mr. CLAY. I so understand.

To further demonstrate that those who contended that the treaty should be ratified gave assurances immediately afterwards that legislation would follow declaring it our purpose to deal with these people as we had dealt with Cuba, I quote from the speech of the junior Senator from Colorado, who said:

> There are no questions, Mr. President, raised by these resolutions or their amendments that could not be equally well and satisfactorily dealt with after the treaty shall have been ratified.

The senior Senator from New York, who made a speech in favor of the ratification of the treaty, declared in the same speech that there was no reason why an American Senator should misunderstand that we would approach the Philippine problem with any other than the most benevolent intentions concerning the Filipinos and their future. He said in substance that there is no American in all this broad land who wishes any other fate to any single native of the Philippine Islands than his free enjoyment of a prosperous life.

In the exciting debate on the resolution declaring war against the Government of Spain the senior Senator from Vermont, who had just returned from the island of Cuba, delivered a remarkable speech on the situation in that island, in which he said:

> I am not in favor of annexation, not because I would apprehend any particular trouble from it, but because it is not a wise policy to take in any people of foreign tongue and training and without strong guiding American elements.

The distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON], speaking on the same subject, declared that—

> I am unalterably opposed to any departure from the declared policy of the fathers, which would start this Republic, for the first time, upon a career of conquest and dominion, utterly at variance with the avowed purpose and manifest destiny of our republican Government.

If such strong language could be used in regard to the population of Cuba, how much stronger would be the force of an argument against the permanent retention of the population of the Philippine Islands. If the views of Senators are consistent with utterances heretofore made on the floor of the Senate, a majority of the members of the Senate are against the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands. The counsel and wisdom of President Garfield was at one time highly esteemed by the Republican party. Would it not be well for us to reflect and remember that he said:

> We occupy a portion of the great North American zone which girdles the world, and which has been the theater of the greatest achievements of civilization, especially in the history of the Anglo-Saxon races, but should we extend our possessions into the tropical belt we would weaken the power of our Government.

The junior Senator from South Carolina [Senator MCLAURIN] before the treaty was ratified delivered a most forcible and logical speech against a colonial system of government and against the permanent retention of the Philippine Islands, and I regret to see the wonderful change in his views in regard to our policy with these islands. In that remarkable speech he said:

> It is idle to speak of Americanizing a tropical country 8,000 miles away. Our people will never consent for the people of that far-off land to ever have a voice in the affairs of our country. Therefore, to govern them we must inaugurate a military or colonial system utterly at variance with the principles of our Republic. But even if by a strained construction of the Constitution the power is vested in the United States to inaugurate a colonial system, I am utterly opposed, as a matter of policy, to the acquisition of any territory that can not be Americanized and brought into harmony with our institutions. I believe the time is not far off, and I gladly welcome its approach, when our flag will float over every foot of North American soil, but it must come naturally and peacefully—by the consent of the governed, not by the rude hand of war.
> But when it comes to thrusting our rule upon 10,000,000 people on another continent by force of arms, I hold that such a policy is unwise as well as at variance with the principles upon which our Government is founded. Taxation without representation is as much tyranny as when King George's tea was dumped into Boston Harbor. To govern the people of the Philippines without their consent is as much government without the consent of the governed as it was when we were under the rule of Great Britain.
> In a commercial point of view, I believe the importance of the Philippines per se is greatly exaggerated. They are chiefly valuable as the key to the Orient, but we need not colonize to obtain that advantage. The exports of the Philippines, according to the statistical abstract, in 1896 amounted to $50,806,250. If this entire trade was monopolized by us it would be insignificant. We will have to teach them to wear shirts and breeches before we can trade with them much.

I feel sure that my friend from South Carolina will some day say the words above spoken were full of wisdom to the American people, and that the error of his life was when he departed from their teachings.

During the debate on the ratification of the treaty the senior Senator from Delaware, probably closer to the Administration at that time than any other Democratic Senator, speaking of these islands, said:

> Now we have them, it does not follow that we are committed to a colonial policy or to a violation of those great principles of liberty and self-government which must always remain American ideals if our own free institutions are to endure. No country, and this country least of all, can afford to trample on its ideals. I have no fear that it will do so.

The distinguished Senator did not stop here, he went further:

> I assure you, with some knowledge of whereof I speak, that the President is committed to no policy calculated to discourage, much less strike down, the aspirations of liberty-loving people all over the world.

The Senator was a member of the Peace Commission negotiating the terms of peace at Paris, and was an earnest, able, influential Senator in favor of the ratification of the treaty. At that time all those who spoke for ratification took the position that when Spain relinquished her sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and ceded them to the United States such a course cleared the way for the recognition of a Philippine republic by our Government.

No one contended that such ratification precluded our Government from taking immediate action favorable to the independence of those people, but, on the contrary, freed us from complications with Spain, settled the war, and thus cleared the way for favorable action by Congress for the future government of the Filipinos. It is only of recent date that the secret purpose of those who now declare that our Government shall change the policy of a lifetime and deprive the people of their long-cherished hopes, has been known to have existed from the beginning. I cast my vote in favor of a declaration of policy looking forward to the independence of these people, and subsequent events have demonstrated that we made a serious blunder when we failed to pass such a resolution. But, Mr. President, I do not care to devote too much of my time to the past, but it is essential to understand the past in order to prepare for the future. Let us trace the interesting history of our connections with the Philippine people since the commencement of the war with Spain, and let us see what were our relations with this people from the time we met them until the breach occurred, and let us probe to the bottom and ascertain the causes which led to hostilities, and then let us see, even at this late day, if we can not apply a remedy that is just, that will restore peace and preserve our honor and free institutions, and at the same time grant justice to a struggling, helpless people.

Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet May 1, 1898. The city of Manila surrendered to our Government on August 13 following. The treaty of peace was ratified February 6, 1899. It has been more than twelve months since the ratification took place, and while it was openly avowed by those who led the fight in favor of ratification that so soon as the treaty was ratified then would be the time for Congress to take action for an independent government for these people, not a word or line has come from them fulfilling this promise. They now have changed their plans and openly avow that we shall maintain permanent dominion over the islands and govern them forever as our dependencies by Americans and absolutely denying them the right of self-government. No fair and impartial mind can reach any other conclusion than that the want of a fixed and just policy in keeping with the principles of our Government, pointing out the manner in which we intended to deal with this people, showing that we were a just and liberty-loving people, is the prime cause of all the trouble heretofore and now existing between the insurgents and our Government.

I have already said that Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet May 1, 1898. When he was ordered to Manila the common American mind knew scarcely anything about the Philippine Islands and their population. We knew nothing about the relations existing between the Government of Spain and these people. We soon ascertained that practically the same condition of affairs existed between the Filipinos and Spain that existed between Cuba and the Government of Spain. We soon learned that the Filipinos for hundreds of years had been rebelling against the Government of Spain and were now, like the Cubans, fighting for their independence. A temporary peace had been made and the leader of the insurgents was then in exile, but in reality a condition of war existed between the insurgents and the Government of Spain. Intracing our relations with this people let us remember that shortly after Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet our consul-general, Mr. Pratt, wired the Secretary of State, Mr. Day, after holding a consultation with General Aguinaldo, that Aguinaldo, at his (Mr. Pratt's) instance, had gone to Manila to organize an insurgent army to crush the Government of Spain on those islands and to arrange with Dewey for cooperation with the insurgents. He also wired, at the same time, Commodore Dewey that General Aguinaldo would go to Manila and cooperate with American forces if desired. We all know that Dewey replied promptly:

Tell Aguinaldo to come as soon as possible.

Our consul-general assured the Secretary of State that this insurgent leader was a man of ability and courage and worthy of the confidence that had been placed in him. General Otis tells us that the insurgent forces entered the city of Manila with our troops on August 13—the day the city surrendered—and held joint occupation with our forces. Up to this period the most cordial and friendly relations existed between the insurgents and our soldiers. Both made common cause of battle against the army of Spain. The leaders of the insurgents spoke most touchingly and feelingly of the services rendered the Filipinos by the Americans. They openly avowed that the Americans, not from mercenary motives, but for the sake of humanity and the lamentations of so many persecuted people, have considered it opportune "to extend their protecting mantle to our beloved country."

They spoke of Americans as their brothers and as their liberators. These people expressed to the United States, time and again, their deep and sincere gratitude for the efficient and disinterested protection which our country had given them to help them shake off the yoke of the cruel and corrupt Spanish domination. Thus far, at every stage of our intercourse with these people, the most amicable relations existed, and there was not the least possible friction. Even as late as the 22d of October, 1898, the insurgents declared that more than ever the Filipinos desired to live in peace and perfect harmony with the Americans. Their leaders declared that when it was possible for a formal convention to pacify and harmonize the interests of the two peoples, then the suspicion of the masses of the insurgents would disappear. Actual hostilities between the insurgents and our army did not commence until February 5, 1899, the day before the peace treaty was ratified.

Let us, however, Mr. President, not forget that our Government knew before the army of the insurgents cooperated with our soldiers to destroy Spanish sovereignty in those islands that the Filipinos aspired to independence. At every step in the history of the cooperation of the American and insurgent forces the representatives of our Government were put on notice that the Filipino people would expect and demand at the hands of Americans their absolute freedom and independence when the Spanish Government ceased to have authority and jurisdiction over the islands. General Otis said to them: "I will assure the people of the Philippine Islands the full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of a free people." Every communication addressed to our consuls or generals put our Government on notice that the Filipino people would never be satisfied with anything less than absolute independence. We knew this fact when Aguinaldo was landed in our war ship. We knew it when we asked him to organize the insurgent forces and to cooperate with our Army. We knew it when both armies cooperated together and forced the surrender of the city of Manila, and the leaders of the insurgents were encouraged by the representatives of our Government, especially by Consul-General Pratt and our consul, Mr. Williams, as well as by General Anderson and General Otis.

While it is true that Secretary Day notified the representatives of our Government not to enter into any alliance with the insurgents which might in any way complicate our Government and disavowed such acts of our representatives, these facts were never communicated to the leaders of the insurgents. Silence upon the part of our Government under such circumstances was calculated to lead the Filipino people to expect that their most cherished hopes would be realized, and good faith on the part of our Government demands that we shall not in any manner thwart their laudable aspirations.

Mr. President, why did the Filipino people become suspicious of the Americans? Why did the suspicion ripen into anger and hate, culminating in open hostilities between the insurgents and our soldiers, resulting in the loss of many precious lives and the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars? Could Congress have, by a timely, wise, and conservative course, prevented this deplorable condition of affairs? Can Congress now, by prompt and decisive action, preserve the honor of our Government, save untarnished our free institutions, and at the same time put an end to this war?

I will confess that the complications are more serious at this time than they were on the 6th of February last, but still prompt action upon our part even at this late hour will solve this complex problem. Mr. President, I do not insist that all of the suspicions the Philippine people entertained against our Government were well founded, but we must remember that these people had been oppressed by the Spanish Government for nearly three hundred years. They were suspicious, jealous, almost crushed, and distrustful, and a brave, generous, and patriotic people like the Americans should have made proper allowances for their many weaknesses. Intelligent and thoughtful public officials of our Government should have taken into consideration all the surroundings of these people—their prejudices and peculiar environments—in every step taken after we landed upon these islands until all differences between the insurgents and our Government had been fully settled. But I must answer the question, Why did they become suspicious and turn from friend to enemy?

I will let one speak in answer to this question, an American general, who was on the islands, came in contact with these people daily, was fully acquainted with their habits and aspirations. He certainly ought to be better authority on this subject than the eloquent junior Senator from Indiana, who spent a few weeks conversing with the Filipinos within the ranks of our own Army, and who knows absolutely nothing of the rural population or those in rebellion against our Government. General Otis ought to be good authority on this subject. After going on to state that the Filipino people had grown more suspicious of the friendly character of the Americans and were gradually becoming hostile to our soldiers and Government, he summarizes the causes of their gradual estrangement to our soldiers and Government, and he tells us—I quote his exact words:

Repeated conferences were held by us with influencial insurgents, whose chief aim appeared to be to obtain some authoritative expression on the intent of the United States with regard to the Philippines, and complained bitterly that they were unable to discover anyone who could speak ex-cathedra. They asserted that theirs was a government de facto, which had the right to ask an expression of intent from the United States Government.

They insisted after the war was over and Spain ceded the islands to the United States that they wanted an expression on the part of our Government as to what disposition we proposed to make of them—what assistance we proposed to give them in organizing a government. They asked specially that we deal with them in the same friendly and magnanimous way in which we declared we would deal with Cuba. They did not insist that we withdraw our Army or our Navy from those islands. All they asked was an expression of opinion on the part of our Government that we intended to grant them independence and self-government. They complained that the United States offered nothing advantageous to the Filipinos, who had expended so much blood and treasure for their independence. They began to have suspicions that the United States were to replace the odious domination which Spain had exercised for centuries.

They discussed among themselves the silence on the part of our Government as to the course we intended to pursue, and, whether right or wrong, they reached the conclusion that they had exchanged a Spanish for an American master. General Otis tells us again that the masses of these people believe that certain words, as "sovereignty of the United States," had peculiar meaning disastrous to their welfare and significant of future political domination like that from which they had been recently freed; that this arose because they insisted that the United States had not shown by affirmative action the policy we intended to pursue toward them. Trace, if you will, the reports of every respectable representative of our Government from the time Dewey won his famous naval victory till the conflict between the insurgents and our soldiers, and but one conclusion can be reached, and that conclusion is that the great bulk of the Filipino people are a unit against annexation and in favor of a Filipino government, formed and put in operation by their own people. Mr. Wilcox, paymaster in the United States Navy, also Mr. Sergeant, whose high character is vouched for by Admiral Dewey, tell us that there is much variety of feeling among the Filipinos with regard to the debt of gratitude they owe the United States.

In every town they said we found those who said our nation saved them from slavery and others who claimed that without our interference their independence would have been won. These same gentlemen tell us that on one point, however, they are united, viz, that whatever our Government may have done for them it has not gained the right to take their islands and annex them. General Otis tells us in his reports that this feeling is so strong among the natives that even the women gave him to understand that after all the men were killed off the islands they were prepared to shed their patriotic blood for the liberty and independence of their country. In the same connection he says the leaders of the insurgents have made repeated efforts to secure some marks of recognition for their government from American authorities, that their cry for liberty and independence and the vile aspersions of the motives of the United States have stirred up distrust and fear of the Americans. They claim not to understand the silence on the part of our Government.

Our paymasters of the Navy, Mr. Willcox and Mr. Sergeant, who traveled more than 600 miles through these islands, coming in daily contact with the natives, and traversing more than seven provinces, endeavoring to obtain an accurate account of the resources of the country as well as to familiarize themselves with the habits, disposition, intelligence, and every possible characteristic of the people, make a report worthy of the thoughtful consideration of every patriotic, liberty-loving American. In describing the sentiment among those people toward Americans they said: Already the hope was fading that freedom from Spain meant freedom of government; that the feeling toward Americans was changing, and we saw its effect in the cold manner of the people and in their evident desire to hustle us along by the most direct road to Manila. These gentlemen tell us that at first these people had absolute confidence in Americans and hailed us as the champions of liberty. Gradually they drifted away from us, lost confidence in our patriotic purposes, all because the American Government gave them no positive assurance of final independence.

If every voter of the United States could read and understand the desire and struggles of these oppressed people, their appeals to us for that liberty for which our fathers fought, the tyranny and oppression which they had suffered and endured at the hands of Spain, and could then pursue closely their conduct and deportment from the surrender of Manila till hostilities begun, the American people, true to the traditions of our fathers, would grant to them, not grudgingly, but cheerfully and willingly, justice, liberty, and the right of self-government. I assert now, after careful consideration of the reports of General Otis, General Merritt, Admiral Dewey, as well as the reports of every other respectable representative our Government had on those islands, that hostilities could have been prevented if our Government at the proper time had given positive assurances that we intended that this people should be free and independent. Congress has now been in session for months. The President said that this problem was one for Congress to solve. If we adjourn without taking action, those who have charge of the Government and are responsible for its administration will not only be responsible for the continuation of this war, but will by their silence have continued the perpetration of an irreparable wrong upon a helpless, struggling people, and will have traduced the good name and character of a Republic that has illustrated constitutional freedom in all its beneficence and power and which has always been our priceless inheritance.

Mr. Burke, in his celebrated speech in favor of conciliation with America, declared that when England crushed out the aspiration of her colonies for liberty she struck a serious blow at her own institutions. Who can forget the famous words of the immortal Burke, when he said:

> For in order to prove that the Americans have no right to their liberties, we are every day endeavoring to subvert the maxims which preserve the whole spirit of our own. To prove that the Americans ought not to be free, we are obliged to depreciate the value of freedom itself; and we never seem to gain a paltry advantage over them in debate without attacking some of those principles or deriding some of those feelings for which our ancestors have shed their blood.

Will not Americans endanger the free institutions of America and depreciate the value of freedom and republican institutions when we wrench from 10,000,000 people their country and arrogate to ourselves the right to appoint their public officers, to make and execute their laws, against the will and consent of the inhabitants? These islands contain a population more than three times as large as ours when we won our independence from England. Do you suppose this vast population will consent for the United States to appoint their officers, to own their country, to make and execute their laws without a struggle for years? If you do you have not been observant of the history of nations. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] told us the other day that God made all nations of the world capable of being influenced by the same motives, and that the love of liberty does not depend upon the color of the skin, but depends on humanity. The Senator declared that these people were God's children, and that a universal Father had implanted in their bosoms the same love of liberty and justice that we possess. The sentiments so beautifully expressed ought to find a ready response in the hearts of the American people.

I believe, even at this very hour, if Congress, with the approval of the President, will declare that the United States will assure the people of the Philippine Islands the full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of a free people, this wise, just, and friendly action will immediately end the war and secure to us the lasting gratitude and the honorable friendship of this people. If such action fails to accomplish this purpose, then we shall have done our duty and our course will be in keeping with reason and justice. In the solution of this question we are bound to consider the temper and character of these people. A love of freedom is the predominating feature which marks their lives since their early history; they are suspicious and restive, especially whenever they believe an attempt is being made to deprive them of self-government. These facts must be taken into consideration in dealing with these people.

Two remarkable speeches have been made on the other side of this question, one by the junior Senator from Indiana, discussing the commercial side of this question, and the other by the junior Senator from Vermont, reviewing the situation from a legal and constitutional standpoint. Together they reached the conclusion that these islands are a rich and promising country, that the United States must keep and govern them forever, and can do so without any constitutional limitations whatever. The Senator from Indiana spoke eloquently of the salubrity of the climate, fertility of the soil, and the great mineral wealth of these possessions, but in the same connection he tells us that the ten millions of people who inhabit these islands are a barbarous race. Continuing his remarks, he says the Filipino is the South Sea Malay put through a process of three hundred years of superstition and religion, dishonesty in dealing, disorder in habits of industry, and cruelty, caprice, and corruption in government. He does not stop here; he gives it as his own belief that there are not a hundred men among this vast population capable of comprehending what Anglo-Saxon government means.

If the Senator's information be reliable, does he calculate for a minute what a responsibility our Government assumes when we become responsible for the future government of this barbarous and ignorant race on the other side of the world, 10,000 miles away from our Capitol; especially, Mr. President, when this people have been conquered by our soldiers and have become embittered against the American people and look upon us with the same jealousy and hatred they have so long cherished toward Spain? Why, the eloquent Senator tells us that these people have fought

Spain so long for their liberty that insurrection has become a fixed habit with them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Georgia, in quoting me, should quote me exactly right. I did not say they had been fighting Spain for three hundred years for their liberty, but that on account of the way Spain conducted her military operations, on account of the fact that she never did the thing thoroughly in war or in peace—a spurious peace, as I called it—that on account of the fact that she was weak and never thorough in war, treating rather than fighting, and that in peace she was cruel, corrupt, and capricious, therefore they had continued insurrection until it had become a Filipino habit. I did not say that they had been fighting Spain continuously for three hundred years for liberty.

Mr. CLAY. That is the speech my friend makes to-day. It is not the speech the Senator made on the occasion to which I refer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not ask the Senator, of course, to extend his remarks by inserting my speech as a part of his speech in the RECORD, but if he will only kindly turn to my speech and read that particular part of it he will find I am right.

Mr. CLAY. My friend said that insurrection had become a fixed habit with these people. He will not deny that. I believe I know his speech now better than he does, but he knew it better when he made it than I did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Since the Senator is doing me the very great honor of referring to my remarks, and since I insisted a moment ago that he should quote me correctly, as I know he wants to do, and since he insists that he knows my speech better than I do myself, wherein I am highly honored and complimented, because it shows a studious reading of it, and in view of the difference of opinion between the Senator from Georgia and myself as to what I did say, I ask the Senator's permission to read that particular part of my speech.

Mr. CLAY. I have no objection.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is as follows:

> This, too, has been Spain's course in the Philippines. I have studied Spain's painful military history in these islands. Never sufficient troops; never vigorous action pushed to conclusive results and a permanent peace; always treating with the rebels while they fought them; always cruel and corrupt when a spurious peace was arranged. This has been Spain's way for three hundred years, until insurrection has become a Filipino habit. Never since Magellan landed did Spain put enough troops in the islands for complete and final action in war; never did she intelligently, justly, firmly administer government in peace.

Mr. CLAY. It is stronger than I thought it was.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is a compliment that I hardly expected and that I gratefully acknowledge.

Mr. CLAY. I am glad my friend the Senator from Indiana saw fit and proper to read from his speech.

Did the Senator ever contemplate that when we take the islands, together with their rivers, harbors, their minerals, and all the wealth so graphically pointed out by him, we necessarily take with them the very population which he describes as ignorant, barbarous, dishonest, indolent, corrupt, treacherous, and incapable of understanding the elementary principles of Anglo-Saxon government? You can not separate the country from the population; when you take one you become responsible for the other.

I will not say, however, that I place the same low estimate on this people as the Senator from Indiana does. Neither does his estimate correspond with the great weight of testimony of those who have made extensive investigations as to the intelligence, education, character, and capacity for self-government of the population of these islands. Our consul, Mr. Williams, said in his report to the Secretary of War:

> While the Spaniards barbarously and cruelly slaughtered the Filipinos, even women and children, the insurgents, on the contrary, followed American example—protected the helpless, nursed, fed, and cared for Spaniards taken as prisoners and for the wounded as they cared for those who had fallen from their own ranks.

Admiral Dewey, in his report to the Secretary of War, said that in his opinion these people are superior in intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and said he was familiar with both races. He declared:

> The greater number seem to be able to read and write. In Manila are many thousands of educated natives who are merchants, lawyers, doctors, and priests. They are well informed and have accumulated property.

It can not be contended that we are to hold these islands for future homes for the American citizen. A careful study of the territory and its population will show this to be impossible unless we should exterminate the natives, or, by reason of our cruelty toward them, they should abandon the islands.

The present density of the population precludes the idea of American homes and American communities being built up there. These islands have been variously estimated at from 1,200 to 1,800 in number. The important ones, however, are less than a dozen in number. Two-thirds of the population reside on six islands. All of the islands except about a dozen are exceedingly small and are of no value. The important islands are as follows: Luzon, Panay, Cebu, Leyte, Bohol, and Negros, with an area of 59,800 square miles and with a population of 5,422,000. It can be readily seen that the population of the islands named is nearly 50 per cent greater than in Illinois or Indiana. We are told that in many of the provinces the density of the population exceeds 200 per square mile, and is greater than any of the United States, except Massachusets and Rhode Island. This is not a vast wilderness, uninhabited, where the American youth, by enterprise and industry, is to build cities and plant American homes. The present population precludes any such idea. Suppose the views of the junior Senator from Indiana should triumph, and we conquer these people and force them to submit to American arms and to receive American government, how long, Mr. President, does the honorable Senator think they will stay conquered?

Remember, the population is between eight and ten millions and they have surrendered to American authority and accepted American government by the force of an American army and navy. Sixty-five thousand American soldiers and sailors crossed the ocean and conquered them. I admit that we can conquer them, but how long will they stay conquered? How long before we will have to conquer them again? They will remain in subjection to our Government just so long as we keep an army on the islands and a navy in their harbors strong and powerful enough to keep down insurrection. When our ships sail home freighted with our gallant soldiers, this conquered race of Malays will rise up again in insurrection against American rulers, American authority, and kill and murder your governor-general sent there to make and execute laws for them against their will. You will find it necessary to send an army to conquer them again and again. Experience will demonstrate to us the necessity of keeping them perpetually conquered. Sir, do we want a race of people that we must keep perpetually conquered by arms? Do we want a race of people that are hostile to our Government?

Do we want a race of people annexed to the United States and governed by the United States who will be perpetually at war with us, continuously in a state of insurrection against our Government and against our laws and sovereignty? Do we want a race of people that can never become American citizens, a race of subjects that shall never be the recipients of our free institutions, just and equal laws? Our matchless progress we owe to our representative free institutions, with equal rights, equal justice, and equal laws for every possible condition of our fellows. The laws of inequality should find no place upon our statute books. Here a homogeneous people are devoted to the flag of their country. They obey the laws, meet patriotically every duty they owe their country, because the spirit of justice, liberty, and equality has marked every step in our career. The Senator from Indiana made another remarkable statement on the floor of the Senate. He claimed to have studied Spain's military history on these islands. To my surprise, he tells us Spain's military operations were too lenient, not sufficiently vigorous and aggressive to conquer these people. He complained that Spain was always treating with the rebels while they fought them. The inference to be drawn from his argument is that Spain should have been more cruel, more exacting, and more oppressive in her military operations against this helpless people.

The Senator tells us that the United States must not adopt the lenient course pursued by Spain, but we must be firm and rule them with an iron hand. Is it possible, Mr. President, that we have sounded such a depth in the decline of political administrations that we complain of the mercy, kindness, and leniency of the Spanish Government toward her struggling colonies and point out a pathway of tyranny, oppression, fire, and sword for the future control and government of the Philippine people? Less than two years ago the senior Senator from Vermont returned from Cuba and fired the hearts of the American people on account of the cruelty, suffering, starvation, and death inflicted by the Spanish soldiers on the helpless women and children of the Cuban people. The wires flashed this tale of horror and suffering to every American home, and the American people, true to their traditions, responded in purse and blood to save this struggling, starving people from the cruelty of Spain.

Now, Mr. President, in less than two years the Senator from Indiana tells us that the American people must not tread in the pathway of leniency pursued by the kind, generous, and merciful Government of Spain, but, on the contrary, while we went to war and sacrificed hundreds of lives and millions of money to give freedom to Cuba, we must reverse our conduct in dealing with the Filipinos, who were struggling under the same burdens and abuses that had cursed the people of Cuba. Such inconsistency is without a parallel, and brands the statement as false and hypocritical that the United States Government went to war for the sake of humanity.

Mr. President, I prefer the remedy suggested by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, "Justice, righteousness, duty, and freedom the only sure foundation of empire," to the remedy of fire and sword pointed out by the eloquent Senator from Indiana. The junior Senator from Indiana intersperses his argument with numerous Biblical quotations, but there is an entire absence throughout his remarkable speech of that blessed spirit of our Lord and Master which characterized His memorable Sermon on the Mount, "Therefore, all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do you even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." It may be possible in this day of avarice, greed, selfishness, and commercialism that this Golden Rule shall no longer measure the conduct of either individuals or nations. The Senator from Indiana tells us that just beyond the Philippines are China's illimitable markets. He asked the question, "Where shall we turn for consumers of our surplus?" He says, "Geography answers the question; China is our natural customer; the Philippines," he claims, "give us a base at the door of all the East." He also said, "Nothing is so natural as trade with one's neighbors." He then tells us that the Philippines make us the nearest neighbor of all the East, and that nothing is more natural than to trade with those you know. He closes this part of his enticing picture with the statement that the Philippines bring us face to face with the most sought-for customers in the world. This fanciful and illusory picture will not stand the test of logic and reason. There is quite a difference between commercial and territorial expansion. One does not necessarily follow the other. I favor commercial expansion, but oppose the latter where applied to territory beyond the Western Hemisphere. The proposition that we must own vast tracts of land, populated by a race of people that can never assimilate with our people, adjacent to Asia, across the Pacific, to induce the teeming millions of China to become our customers is absurd and is not supported by the laws of trade and commerce.

No Senator upon this floor is more anxious to enlarge our markets and to induce the vast population of China to purchase our surplus products of farm and factory, so as to give employment to labor and enhance the value of both the raw material and finished product of producer and manufacturer, than myself. Wars, entangled alliances, domestic insurrection, are not the proper means to induce foreign consumers to buy our goods and wares and to become our customers. The laws of business, commerce, and trade, friendly alliances, cheapness and quality in comparison with other countries contending for the same trade and business, are elements that must shape and regulate the volume of our business with other countries. Jefferson taught us that peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations went hand in hand together. But they tell us now that the teachings of Jefferson are not applicable to the times. These teachings are not in keeping with the advanced ideas of our political bosses. We can not surpass Europe in the race for wealth and foreign trade by exhausting our resources in internal quarrels, or in unjust and unprofitable wars, waged to acquire and govern uncongenial races who can never become adapted to our laws and political institutions. If we desire the trade of China, we must make it to the interest of her people to trade with us. We must study their markets, the wants and demands of their people. We must cheapen transportation by the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal; build up our merchant marine; take every possible advantage of the laws of trade and commerce to meet promptly the keen competition of England, Germany, France, or any other foreign country seeking to extend its trade to the markets of China.

These rules, applicable to business principles and common sense, are the only means that will give to the American farmer and manufacturer foreign markets for American products. Neither do I agree to both propositions that if we keep the Philippines we will be neighbors to China and that it will be natural for our neighbors to trade with us. The course that we are pursuing toward the Philippine people will be just the reverse of the proposition stated by the Senator from Indiana. Certainly we can not expect to enlarge our volume of business with the Philippine people by waging war against them. A magnificent opportunity came to us when Spain surrendered her claim to the Philippine Islands to the United States for us to lay the foundation for large and continued commercial dealings with the population of the Philippine Islands. These people at that period, full of gratitude for the services which we had rendered them in achieving their supposed independence, would naturally have come to our markets to make purchases rather than to any other country in the world. They then esteemed us with that affection which we felt toward France at the close of the Revolutionary war. If we had granted to them their most cherished hopes, given them our sympathy, encouragement, and aid in framing a constitution and putting in operation a government suitable to their wants, demands, and conditions, then the laws of gratitude would have made these people our customers against the markets of the world for all time to come.

They are neighbors to China, coming almost in daily contact with the Chinese markets. Trading daily with the United States, and recognizing us as their friends and benefactors, they would have planted the good name, high character, and commercial advantages which we enjoyed at the hands of the Philippine people into the hearts, consciences, and business of the population of China. Does any reasonable man contend that we can enlarge our business and commercial transactions with the Filipinos by waging war against them, embittering them against us now and for all time to come? Is it possible for any student of the laws of trade and business to contend that if the Filipino people are conquered and kept in subjection to American authority by our soldiers, that such a course would enlarge our trade with China? If this population of 10,000,000 people should learn to hate us, constantly being in insurrection against us, charge us with being their oppressors, as they did Spain, would it not be natural for this feeling of hate and distrust to be transplanted upon the shores of China, who in all probability would sympathize with their struggling neighbors? If we desire the trade of the Philippines and the trade of China, let us by all means keep the Filipinos our friends and treat them as our neighbors. The argument advanced by the Senator from Indiana falls to the ground when brought to its final analysis, and the reverse of the proposition stated by him would certainly follow. It is conceded on all sides that this population is never to be organized into States and to be treated as American citizens, but we are to hold them, make laws for their future government, appoint Americans for their officers to cross the ocean and rule this people.

This 10,000,000 of population, located 10,000 miles away from our capital, are to be wards without any right to have an organized government of their own, but, on the contrary, their laws are to be made and their rulers appointed at Washington, on the opposite side of the world from them. It is not denied that never in the history of our Government has such a problem been presented to us for solution; never before have we undertaken to acquire territory and govern a race of people to whom we did not intend to extend all of the privileges granted to American citizens. Until during the present time the proposition to acquire a people foreign to us in race, foreign to us in religion, unsuited to American institutions, and to force a government on them that they did not want, would not have been tolerated by the American people. A desire for liberty, justice, self-government, freedom, and equality gave birth to this Republic. If we now change the only Government in the world that guarantees absolute freedom and equality to all of its citizens, recognizing the right of any people to form their own government, then, Mr. President, this Republic, that has been reared by more than a century of patriotic labor and sacrifice, will no longer be the Government of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln. The spirit of justice, equality, and freedom which has characterized its history, resulting in the noblest achievements ever recorded in man's struggle for self-government, will no longer be our blessed heritage.

Mr. President, we do not want to retain permanently a nation and be responsible for their government who never can participate in our free institutions. We can not afford to take a hundred thousand soldiers from the peaceful pursuits of life and send them across the ocean to maintain military government on the Philippine Islands at a cost of a hundred millions of dollars a year to our people. We can not afford to do it, because it will be an injustice to the American people and because it revolutionizes the entire scope and purpose of our Government and will inflict a great wrong upon a helpless, struggling, inferior race. I do not believe in a government that does not emanate from those to be governed and where the lawmaking power does not come in contact with the people to be affected, for the reason experience has demonstrated that a watchful and jealous constituency is essential to maintain honest and faithful public officials. Seven thousand miles of ocean lie between us and this people.

No power on earth, Mr. President, can prevent the effect of this distance weakening government. Spain felt it in the administration of her colonial policy in her South American possessions and in Cuba and the Philippine Islands; and now, Mr. President, we are undertaking to do something that destroyed Spain's navy and bankrupted her treasury.

It is absolute folly to undertake to force and maintain a government for an uncongenial race of people that occupy a territory that does not come within 7,000 miles of your coast and within 10,000 miles of your capital. Let us take warning, and remember that this new departure is contrary to the teachings of Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Lincoln, Garfield, Blaine, Sherman, Edmunds, Reed, Carlisle, Cleveland, and Bryan.

We have three resolutions pending before the Senate relating to the disposition and government of the Philippine Islands. One by the senior Senator from Wisconsin, which vests in the President the right to govern the islands until Congress directs otherwise. The resolution of the junior Senator from Indiana, which declares that the islands are ours forever, and that we shall keep them and govern them as dependencies. The bill introduced by the Senator from Wisconsin leaves the policy of our Government toward these people to the future action of Congress. They are left in doubt and uncertainty as to what they may expect from our Government. The second resolution contemplates that we will exercise permanent dominion over the islands, appointing their officers, making and executing their laws. The third resolution, introduced by my colleague, disclaims any intention on the part of our Government to maintain permanent dominion over this territory or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold them as vassals or subjects. This resolution concedes the fact that these people fell to us as the result of war, and that we must restore peace and maintain order throughout the islands until a government shall be established by the people there, with our assistance, capable of protecting the people from violence and maintaining law and order. It provides that our military forces shall be kept on the islands until the insurrection is suppressed, and until a stable government can be put in operation.

This resolution bears the blessed message to the Filipinos which they have so long sought in vain, namely, that it is the purpose and intention of the United States, when the insurrection is over, when peace and order shall be restored and a stable government established, that then we will withdraw our land and naval forces from the islands, reserving to our Government such harbors and tracts of land as may be needed for coaling stations and governmental purposes, and transferring to the government of the Filipinos all other rights and territories secured in said islands under the treaty with Spain, and leave the future control and dominion of the islands to the Filipino people.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to ask the Senator this question: Since he favors the resolution which intends to turn the government of the islands over to the people, yet at the same time keeping our military forces there, and establishing, as he says, order, how does he reconcile the one with the other? If he is going to hand the government of the islands over to the people themselves after he has crushed them out, as he says, not as I say, after he has established peace, why not do it now? Why should you fire another gun if, after you have fired all the guns you want to fire, if, after you have carried on all the war you wish to carry on, if, after you have established peace, you are to turn the government over to the people of the islands? Why do you not hand the government over to the natives at present?

Mr. CLAY. I want to say to my friend from the State of Indiana that if you pass a resolution of this kind and this fact goes to that people and they understand the course we intend to pursue—that we are going to give them liberty, independence, and self-government—in my opinion such a resolution, in keeping with their desires and aspirations, will settle the war itself, and not another gun will be fired, and in less than six months a government will be established there. Why not? Look at Cuba. We went to war with Spain, I say, on account of conditions in the island of Cuba. We declared that we did not intend to take their country or to interfere with self-government there; that we intended to give them an independent government. When the war was over the Cuban people accepted the situation and did not fire a single gun against our Government. Why, is it not true that a like declaration on the part of our Government toward the people of the Philippine Islands would have led them at once to accept conditions and to hail with joy this blessed message from the American people?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I have the indulgence of the Senator from Georgia to ask him another question?

Mr. CLAY. With a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is the logic of the Senator who offered the resolution and of those who support the resolution, why do you not make the resolution go directly to the point and call for the withdrawal of our troops at once and leave at once the establishment of this government to the natives, whom you claim are capable of establishing and exercising it?

Mr. CLAY. We went to the Philippine Islands and cooperated with the insurgent forces in destroying the Government of Spain. The people of those islands at that time had in existence a government throughout those islands. We have gone there with our soldiers, and we have been at war with those people for nearly twelve months, resulting in the loss of more than 2,000 Americans and the expenditure of $150,000,000. Now, I say, we having destroyed the only government the insurgents had, and the demoralization necessarily following war, it is essential that we stay there until conditions are such that a good government will be put in operation, one that will establish law and order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me, again. Now, the Senator's contention is that these natives are capable of conducting, but not of establishing, a government. Is that it, and that it is our duty to establish a government for them and then turn it over to them? Is that your position?

Mr. CLAY. I answer my friend by asking, Are not we on the island of Cuba trying to assist those people to establish a government there? We are on the island of Cuba to-day. We have our American officers there trying to establish a government for the people of Cuba. We are assisting them and cooperating with them. We are informed every day that they are cooperating with us because they believe we are their friends and do not intend to take their country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We are now discussing the Philippine Islands. I respectfully ask the Senator to answer the question whether his position is that the natives are capable of conducting, but not of establishing, a government, and therefore whether his position is that we must establish a government and then hand it over to them?

Mr. CLAY. I believe that a large part of them are capable of establishing and maintaining a government.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, then, I will ask——

Mr. CLAY. Let me answer the question. I desire to say if they were assured that we intended to give them their country and assured that we intended to cooperate with them in establishing a government of their own, they would most gladly receive any aid we offered to them; but when we say to them, "We are going to take your country and govern it by Americans," the situation is quite different.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator whether or not, since he said we should cooperate, he has any evidence that they ask us to cooperate? Do they ask us to retain our military forces there? Do they ask us to assist them in establishing their government?

Mr. CLAY. I desire to say that I hardly think that at this time they are asking us to retain our military forces there. They are trying to get our military forces away.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think they want to establish a government of their own?

Mr. CLAY. I certainly do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, if that is true, why does not the resolution be frank and logical enough to go directly to that point and ask for the withdrawal of our forces, and, as the Senator from Louisiana says, leave it absolutely to them; to use his very descriptive expression, "Get out and leave it to them." Why does not the Senator go diretly to the point?

Mr. CLAY. I am in favor of our forces staying there until a government is established that will maintain law and order; and I tell you now, I give it to you as my opinion, that when you say to these people that we will be just to them, we will aid them in putting into operation such a government as they desire, in my opinion they will cooperate with us at once, and there will be no further trouble.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, may I ask the Senator another question? It is whether he is in favor of retaining our forces there until the government is established, because, first, he thinks they are not capable of establishing it themselves, and, secondly, because they ask our assistance; and if not, on what ground?

Mr. CLAY. I have stated to the Senator that I was in favor of doing it because we had destroyed the only government they had, and they probably need our assistance in putting in operation a government at the present time. The war resulted because we failed to point out the manner we intended to deal with these people, showing them we intended for them to have a government of their own.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, I will ask the Senator further——

Mr. CLAY. I decline to yield further to the Senator, because my time is limited.

The resolution is most carefully guarded, discharges faithfully every duty we owe this people, as well as to carry out the obligations and duties we owe to foreign governments resulting from the war.

First, this resolution provides for the suppression of the insurrection; second, that we will assist these people in putting into operation a government of their own that will maintain law and order; third, it protects the interests of the Government of the United States by reserving the necessary coaling stations and land needed for governmental purposes; fourth, it provides that until a stable government is established on the islands the President is empowered to maintain law and order there; fifth, that so soon as such a government shall be established by the people of those islands, with our assistance, we will withdraw our land and naval forces, leaving the future control to the people thereof.

If these resolutions do not cover every phase of the case, I do not understand the English language. Pass them and give them the effect of law, and then we will have pursued a course in the solution of our troubles with this people which will be in keeping with the principles of our Government. I do not believe we will ever reach a satisfactory solution of this problem, a solution in harmony with the principles of our Government, by pursuing any other course than one substantially as above outlined. Mr. President, this course meets my approval, because humanity, reason, and justice dictate such a policy. I realize that if we force a military government upon these people against their will, the alienation existing between us will be an incurable one. I am unalterably opposed to the permanent retention of these islands with the view of forcing American government upon them by Americans, because I believe such government will cost the people of the United States a hundred and fifty million dollars a year to pay the increased expenses of our Army and Navy to maintain military government there, a tax of $2 per capita annually for every man, woman, and child in the United States. This does not take into consideration the sacrifice of human life that must necessarily follow in maintaining military government on those islands. It is a fact that can not be disputed that the expenses of maintaining our Army has already increased more than six-fold.

The demoralization that follows war and the military spirit is always to be deplored. I am opposed to it again, Mr. President, because history teaches us that sovereignty acquired by the sword must be maintained by the same means and that power acquired by conquest and wealth gained by robbery are certain in the end to weaken and corrupt the possessor. This rule applies to nations as well as individuals. I am opposed to it again because by such a course we revolutionize our Government, which was intended for a free Republic and self-governing people and not for subjects or vassal states without representation in the making and execution of our laws. I am opposed to it because it shatters the Monroe doctrine from top to bottom. I am opposed to it because I believe that at no distant day such a course will involve us in European and Asiatic quarrels. I am opposed to it because all of the habits, traditions, surroundings, experience, education, and aspirations of this people are opposed to our theories of government. I am opposed to it because such a course would be a repudiation by our Government of the principle that all governments must be founded on the consent of the governed.

I am opposed to it because such a course is not calculated to advance the interests and promote the happiness of this people. Self-government does not mean that these people are to have such a government as we possess, but that these people shall have a government in keeping with their desires and suitable to their conditions. It has been said that greatness does not lie in coffers or territory, but it lies in the men and women of a nation and their ideals and acts, and that a nation is great as it clings to its ideals. A great bishop said: "The end of all worthy struggle is to establish morality as the basis of individual and national life, to make righteousness prevail, to make justice reign, to spread beauty, gentleness, wisdom, and peace, to widen opportunity, to increase good will, to move in the light of higher thoughts and larger hopes, to encourage science and art, to foster industry and thrift, education and culture, reverence and obedience, purity and love, honesty, sobriety, and disinterested devotion to the common good—this is the patriot's aim, this his ideal." If we should strive for this purpose and work in this spirit, the Republic of our fathers will never perish.

The Interests of Labor in the Puerto Rican Question.

"Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird."

HON. CHARLES H. GROSVENOR,

OF OHIO.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. GROSVENOR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: "Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird."

Our Democratic friends and those of our own party who have been beguiled into the support of free trade between the United States and our newly acquired insular possessions will do well to halt before their action has carried them to a condition that is irretrievable, and look about them to see what is the legitimate result and necessary effect of the establishment of the doctrine sought to be established by the defeat of the pending measure.

I shall avail myself of the generous indulgence of the House to offer, as a kind of supplement to the remarks which I have made heretofore, some comments upon the attitude of organized labor to the dogma of the Democratic party. I shall address myself substantially to the Democratic position on this subject. I am not unaware that there is a strong sentiment in certain localities among hitherto Republicans who favor the Democratic position, and I could, I think, if personalities were not odious in connection with a matter of national politics, point out some curious incidents explaining the attitude of certain gentlemen upon this question, but everything of that character shall be avoided.

From the very beginning of the contest growing out of the war with Spain it has been entirely manifest that selfish interests would cut an important figure in the position which men would take upon these questions. We have seen the representatives of great interests, manufacturing, industrial, and otherwise, scurrying about the islands to ascertain the effect that annexation first, and legislation afterwards, would have upon their interests; and this is human nature exemplified, and nobody can complain about it. But I now want to point out how the laboring men of the United States are to be affected by the future of our legislation and how they are looking at it at present and how they will continue to look at it in the coming elections. The issue here presented was sharply drawn in the early days of the Republican party.

The question, and the sole question, here involved is the question of the right and power of Congress to legislate in reference to the internal affairs—the question of taxation by imports and otherwise upon the territories lately acquired from Spain. To put it sharply, it is this: Is Congress bound by the limitations of the Constitution in the matter of levying taxes upon importations into or out from these newly acquired possessions? The position that we have planted ourselves upon is a very simple one. We say Congress may legislate in relation to these territories without any reference to the provisions of the Constitution, excepting that Congress can not do a thing forbidden by the Constitution. To illustrate, we admit that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" nor can it pass any law "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," nor forbidding the people "peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances," nor can it quarter soldiers upon the owner of property in time of peace, nor prevent the people from bearing arms, nor shall it involve the homes of people in the matter of searching for papers, etc.

All these things which Congress is forbidden by the Constitution to do we say it can not do anywhere, neither in the United States nor in the Territories or anywhere else. We stand upon these limitations of the Constitution as sharply as do our friends on the other side, but we do say, and we will stand by it, that it is Republican doctrine, old as the Republican party itself, that the Constitution goes nowhere into newly acquired territory except by the act of Congress itself, and that these Territories are all open to such action as Congress may determine. When did this doctrine start? The controversy pended for thirty-five years prior to 1856, and the Republican party in its platform of June 17, 1856, used this language:

Resolved, That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government, and that in the exercise of this power it is both the right and the duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism—pologamy and slavery.

That is where this doctrine started against the Democratic dogma that the Constitution went everywhere ex proprio vigore. Then came the sharp contest of 1860, and here we have it:

That the new dogma, that the Constitution of its own force carries slavery into any or all of the Territories of the United States, is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of that instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition, and with legislative and judicial precedent; is revolutionary in its tendency, and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

That settled the question which Calhoun had spent thirty-five years in educating the South to understand, and we then went into a bloody war, and at the end of four long deperate years we settled it that the Constitution went nowhere but by the operation of its extension through the action of Congress, and this has been argued until it has become wearisome.

I want now to make this application to the practical politics of to-day. From Maine to California the labor organizations of the country are on the alert. Some Senators may not know it; some Representatives may not hear from them. I do. I have the honor to represent a district in which there are 9,000 coal miners, now employed at splendid prices for their labor. Their wages have advanced under the McKinley Administration from 45 cents a ton to 80 cents a ton, and their working time is every day in the week, if they desire to work, as against the half weeks heretofore. That district lies right across the Ohio River from the great body of the coal-mining industry of the State of West Virginia; magnificent industry, making happy homes and well-fed and well-clothed and well-educated possibilities for a host of laboring men. It would seem that the gentlemen in the House and in the Senate who represent these great bodies of laboring men do not understand the situation as well as I do. Those laboring men are on the alert, and this is what is on their minds.

The Democratic propositions of free trade in Puerto Rico, because Puerto Rico is a part of the United States, teaches those men that as surely as the sun rises and sets if this free-trade measure shall pass, then the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States are committed irrevocably to the same doctrine in its application to the Philippine Islands. That is where you stand, gentlemen of the House of Representatives; that is where you stand, representative gentlemen, in any and all bodies of men in this country. You owe a duty to the labor of this country, and you must perform that duty. You owe the duty to the labor of this country that not only shall there be adequate protective tariff laws upon the statute books, but that there shall be a protection policy that shall give Congress the right to exclude from the labor markets the millions upon millions of men in the islands of the Pacific.

Your votes for free trade, your votes for the phantom politics of the flag following the Constitution, and the Constitution tagging after the flag, is but a declaration that the Sulus, the Tagals, the Filipinos, and all the enormous horde of foreigners in Asia that have come to us as a possession under our treaty with Spain shall come to the United States and move in solid, indefensible, overwhelming columns of cheap—oh, how cheap!—low, degraded labor into the mines of West Virginia, into the labor districts of Minnesota, all along the great lumber region of that magnificent State, right into the very heart of the labor districts along the Great Lakes. That is what it means. How are you going to keep them out? If this dogma is true, they are citizens of the United States, endowed with all the rights I have.

Mr. Chairman, I may go to Duluth; no power can stop me but the Almighty. I can bid upon the labor that is being done in Minnesota; I can put my muscle in competition with the muscle of the men at work in the mines of West Virginia. I can even invade the marble quarries of Vermont and attack the prices that are being paid there. Is it any wonder that from New England comes a report to the highest authority in Washington that the labor organizations of that section of the country are alert in this matter?

Oh, Mr. Chairman, there will be a day of judgment. Men can harp about the Constitution and chipper about the flag and send out their manifestos from political conventions, but the men of this country who are doing the work, the men who are just now on the high road to permanent prosperity, are looking to see who are forging the chains that shall destroy their immunity from this competition. Never will I submit to it. Not only that—I will not only go among the miners of my district and tell them that this outrage has been perpetrated, but I will go among the coal miners of the adjoining districts and point out to them who it was that, in the hour when their interests were in peril, dared to hesitate and fool and bedevil the whole country in the interest of cheap labor.

We may as well talk plainly. We may as well come right to the point; we may as well call things by their right cognomen. Here is your first opportunity. The United States has entered upon a great future, a great scheme, a great purpose, wonderful in its grandeur, and it involves the welfare of its citizens at home more than it does the welfare of the citizens abroad, and here in this hour, when labor for the first time in this country for many years is profitable, it is menaced by a political dogma which is coming from the same source from which came the dogma of 1860.

Talk about humanity! No people on earth were ever treated with humanity in such overflowing rivers as we propose to treat the people of Puerto Rico. Nonsense, ridiculous absurdity, the whole of this. I read in a New York paper the other day a series of special telegrams, purporting to have come from Puerto Rico, stating that 30,000 women were naked and could not get cotton cloth to cover their nakedness, and right down under it was a statement from this same General Davis, who is a politician, a soldier, and a little of everything, and a good deal of nothing, declaring that if this money were appropriated, they would expend it to build roads. These people are suffering: I know they are suffering. I weep for them; I sympathize with them. They have not a dollar of anything to sell, and they have not a dollar with which to buy anything, and we not only propose to give them all this tariff, but we propose to take it off the men who in great haste, with their little sample cases, have rushed to Puerto Rico and Cuba and elsewhere and spotted the places where they could make money out of the commodities.

The statement published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD last Saturday, being a telegram sent to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, pointed out the whole situation, and "He who runs may read." Here it is:

The principal importers of sugar from Puerto Rico are A. S. Lascells & Co.—

These gentleman at this time are suing to recover what they have paid—

Lawrence, Turnure & Co., American Sugar Refining Co.—

to wit, the greatest trust in the world, the American sugar trust—

L. W. & P. Armstrong, Muller, Schall & Co., John Farr, and Melchor, Armstrong & Dessau.

These are the men who have bought the sugar of Puerto Rico. These are the men who stand here clamoring for free trade. These are the men who have bought the 60,000 tons of sugar which will be relieved of 85 per cent of the Dingley rate, and who will put that into their pockets, and who now protest against the payment of the meager, pitiable sum of 15 per cent of the Dingley rate. That is this whole transaction. No man can turn it in any other way. You may shout, you may pass resolutions, you may chipper through the newspapers, you may attack nominations of candidates for Congress, and you may threaten and bulldoze and make the charge of criminality and fraud and bribery through the press, as has been done in this city, and after it all you will find that the whole of this controversy is a contest of the owners of sugar and tobacco, bought in advance, to get rid of paying the pittance of 15 per cent of the Dingley tariff and to have that go to the people of Puerto Rico. That is all there is of it, and in order to bring that about the whole Democratic party of the United States and all their cogitators and cooperators have launched their boat in support of a principle that will bring to the labor sections of the United States millions upon millions of half-dressed vagabonds to cut down the prices of wages. If you will give the coal operators of West Virginia the right to bring by shipload those Filipinos as American citizens, clothed with their rights, they will drive the coal miners of West Virginia to 30 cents a ton or death and starvation.

Let us be plain about it. Let us look the country in the face. Let us tell our constituents what it is all about. Let us have no more of this nonsense. Daily and hourly come letters to members of Congress saying, "What is this about? What is this contest that is said to be splitting parties into pieces?" Why, my friend, it is this question, whether we shall put 15 per cent of the Dingley duty on the sugar and tobacco that come from Puerto Rico, and 15 per cent of the Dingley duty on goods that go into Puerto Rico, and take that money from the trusts and the dealers and operators and expend it for the benefit of the people of Puerto Rico. That is all there is of it. Not by a long way, my laboring friend. Not by a long way, you men of New England working in a factory. Not by a long way, you laboring men of Minnesota and Michigan and Illinois. Not by a long way, you burrowers in the mines of Indiana; you who are just beginning to see daylight; you who are just beginning to put clothes on the backs of your wives and children; you who are just beginning to look forward to the hope that you may at last have some reasonable and just compensation for your labor. Not by a long way is that the question. The question is, What is the status of the citizens of Puerto Rico and all the islands?—for no honest man will say that there is any difference.

That which settles the status of one settles the status of all, and if this tariff bill is defeated upon the ground that the flag and the Constitution march hand in hand and citizenship goes with the flag and the rights of citizenship go with the flag, your rates of wages, my friends of the Indiana coal mines, are gone and you have at last fallen into the hands of the men who never did anything for you but skin you when they had the opportunity. This is the issue of 1900, Mr. Chairman, and far the greatest issue that has been made in this country since 1860.

Now comes this question: Does any living honest man believe that any living sensible man believes that there is potency and merit and actual value in the question of this 15 per cent duty? Does not every Republican orator and statesman and newspaper writer who writes about it know that he is writing about a bogy man, and that behind it all is simply the stalking of the Democratic purpose, manifested at the very outset, to drive the Republicans of this country into a position where they could destroy them at the polls?

"Sauve qui peut" was the cry of the French at Waterloo when destruction was inevitable. "Every man for himself" must be the cry of 1900 if the Republican party in this Congress is to split upon the great principle which we settled in 1860, as we supposed forever.

Mr. Chairman, I will stand by the laboring men of my district. I will fight in the open ground, without qualification, all comers who seek to seize the labor markets of the United States and turn them over to this labor which has thus come upon us, and all this sickly sentimentalism about charity to our neighbors, all this absurdity about a great principle involved, will not answer the men at the polls in 1900.

Nobody would have hesitated to have given free trade to Puerto Rico had this question not come up. I think if the Democrats in Congress had been quiet and waited and let the Republicans gone on they would have executed the purpose that they had at this session, but they would have treated it as a matter of free trade by legislative enactment and not by the doctrine promulgated at Lincoln, Nebr., that the Constitution follows the flag.

We propose to give to the people of Puerto Rico money out of the pockets of the men who have been speculating in their products. The Democratic party proposes to give them the Constitution. There are 30,000 naked women in Puerto Rico. We propose to clothe them, if that be true, with money drawn from the men who have taken advantage of their troubles and of their products and stored them in warehouses waiting for this. The Democratic party proposes to clothe them with the Constitution. I once read a wonderful poem about Godiva, who, naked in the ordinary sense, rode through the streets upon her palfrey clothed "all in chastity," but this is a new doctrine.

They propose to clothe them with the Constitution; and if it gets a little colder, they will add the Declaration of Independence; and if it gets still a little colder, they will add Washington's Farewell Address and the writ of habeas corpus and all sorts of things of that character. We propose, in liberality, in justice, in honest appreciation of humanity, to tax these importers 15 per cent of a hundred and use it for the purpose indicated, and in that way place a barrier upon the statute books of this country against the incursion of barbaric labor into the labor districts of Minnesota, and into the mines of Ohio, and Indiana, and West Virginia; and fight it as you will, disguise it as you will, analyze it as you will, that is the position that the laboring men of this country will take upon this question, and thank God the majority of Republicans of this House—almost all of the Republicans of this House—stand clear as the sun, bright as the moon, and, in the coming contest with the men who sought to destroy labor, terrible as an army of banners.

Contested-Election Case—Robbins vs. Aldrich.

OF

HON. MARTIN H. GLYNN,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 6, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Gaston A. Robbins was not elected a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That William F. Aldrich was elected a member of the Fifty-sixth Congress from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, and is entitled to a seat therein"—

Mr. GLYNN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has talked about the election laws of nearly every place in this country. As I watched the minute hand of that clock move, I concluded that if he would only talk a little longer he would probably tell us something about the election laws of heaven whereby the archangels are chosen, and perhaps something of the election laws of the other place where murky imps are chosen.

Mr. MANN. There are no Democrats in heaven, and perhaps it would not be so interesting. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLYNN. No; but there are so many of your own party in the other place that the gentleman ought to know something of what is going on there, and he could tell us, perhaps, how they are elected. [Laughter and applause.] I believe the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who preceded him yesterday, showed the weakness of their own case by talking about everything else but the particulars of this case.

The gentleman from Nebraska has talked about the election laws of South Carolina, of Kentucky, and numerous other places, and I would like to ask him what application these laws have to this election case. He has told you again and again why the majority reported in favor of throwing out certain precincts in this election case, but I stand here to tell you that he did not give you the right reason why the majority threw out these precincts. I stand here to say that these precincts are thrown out by the majority because Mr. Robbins happened to get more votes there than Mr. Aldrich. The record shows such to be the fact. The election laws of this country have decided again and again, precedent upon precedent, that the entire poll of any district shall be thrown out where it is possible to show fraud in the vote of the different candidates by aliunde process. Now, Mr. Aldrich started out to do that in this county of Dallas, and you will find that in the precincts thrown out the aliunde vote of Robbins was proven to be larger than that of Aldrich, and that is why they were thrown out. If they allowed the aliunde vote to stand in seven of those precincts, why could it not stand in the other four? The only reason is that Mr. Robbins in the precincts thrown out got more votes than Mr. Aldrich did, and proved more.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] by a mathematical process and a yard measure has tried to show that the Robbins vote in Dallas County as returned was larger than it ought to be. Why, sir, the friends of Mr. Aldrich on the stand admitted that there were 3,000 white voters in Dallas County. A large number of white voters were put on the stand, and of that number only 12 swore that they voted for Aldrich. Now, if more voted for him, why were they not produced? Do you suppose that if Aldrich could have proven that more than 12 white men voted for him he would not have done so? But he did not do it, and instead he adopts the contemptible course of coming in here and saying: "I did not get all the votes I ought to have got, and therefore I want to be seated."

The gentleman from Nebraska has talked also about the material progress of Dallas County; he has abused that county and its people. He has held them up as the most unprogressive people in Alabama, or perhaps in the United States. Yet from that county of Dallas, from that terribly abused, that loathsome county, come the two able men who to-day represent Alabama in the United States Senate, MORGAN and PETTUS.

The gentleman refers to a little "scrap," so to speak, that Mr. Robbins and Mr. Aldrich had in a hotel. It is true they had a fight; but that fight took place two months after the election—nearly three. What had that fight, then, to do with this contest? The facts of the fight are these: There appeared in a paper controlled by the Aldrich people a contemptible, a nasty, a dirty article; an article which, from whosever pen it emanated, reflected its own devilishness, its own murkiness. Robbins, like a man, denied the accusation and insinuations in that article, and asked Aldrich whether he was responsible for it. Both men grew angry and hot-headed. A fight ensued in which Mr. Robbins got the best of Mr. Aldrich. And for that reason the gentleman from Nebraska wants you to unseat Mr. Robbins. When the gentleman brought in that matter he was guilty of unprofessional conduct. The evidence about that fight was offered in rebuttal, but in fact it was evidence in chief. And in the report which the gentleman signed the majority said they would disregard the evidence which was offered in rebuttal, which should have been offered as evidence in chief. They disregarded it in their report, but now the gentleman comes in here to tell you that because these gentlemen had a fight and his man got the worst of it, Mr. Robbins ought to be thrown out.

The gentleman argues also that because Mason was shot one month after the election—or two months—Robbins ought to be unseated.

A MEMBER. The 14th of November.

Mr. GLYNN. Well, it was after the election. Three days are as good as three months. The man who shot Mason was the political opponent of Mr. Robbins in the Democratic party of his district; and to charge Mr. Robbins or his political associates with that would be the same as charging the Republican party with the murder of Garfield because the man who shot him happened to be a Republican, or the murder of Lincoln upon the Democratic party because the man who shot him happened to be a Democrat.

The gentleman talks a good deal about a man named A. Thompson down in Burnsville. This man Thompson was the only man of all the witnesses offered by Aldrich who swore that there was fraud in Dallas County. He was appointed as inspector and represented Aldrich at Burnsville. He says he is a Democrat, yet he has been the postmaster down there for years under a Republican régime. He swears that he voted for Robbins. Mr. Bamberg, the Republican clerk, and Mr. Aldrich's friend, swears that he knows Thompson voted for Aldrich. About Thompson I will have something to say in reply to the gentleman from Nebraska later on. But, sir, he talks about fraudulent counting of the votes. The ballots were intrusted to Thompson's keeping. Thompson represented Aldrich. He took the ballots home and kept them all night. Does that look as if the Democrats down there were trying to "monkey" with the vote, when they intrusted the ballot to a Republican inspector?

He said he got up during the night and counted the ballots, and that when they were counted the next day at the polling place, the count then made as part of the returns did not agree with the count he had made. Well, Thompson signed those returns; he swore that they were true. He afterwards went on the stand and swore that they were false. Now, I want to know, can this man, upon whose testimony the majority of the committee rely in this report, be believed? Is a man honest who swears one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow? Every other election officer in that place—the Republican marker, the Republican clerk—swore that the returns were true; and in their rebuttal Aldrich never tried to show that those men swore to a lie. He brought no man forward to uphold Thompson's veracity or besmirch the truthfulness of those who contradict Thompson.

Mr. MANN. I would like to suggest that whatever the fault may be on the part of the election commissioners, in signing the returns they no not swear to them.

Mr. GLYNN. These returns were practically sworn to.

Mr. MANN. They were not sworn to.

Mr. GLYNN. I would like to hear the evidence which shows they were not.

Mr. MANN. The evidence shows what I state; all the gentleman needs to do to satisfy himself on this point is to turn to the record.

Mr. GLYNN. Did not Thompson sign the returns? Was he not a sworn election officer, and were not all his actions performed under his obligations as such?

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether he was under oath or not.

Mr. GLYNN. He certainly ought to have been; and it is unfair to presume that he was not, under the circumstances.

Mr. MANN. He was not under oath, at all events.

Mr. GLYNN. Why, Mr. Speaker, he swore to the returns as an officer of the elections; and it is only dodging the issue for the gentleman to claim that he was not under oath in this particular statement. It is only boy's play.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is your contention.

Mr. GLYNN. That is the common-sense view of it, if any man will consider the question for a moment.

Mr. MANN. I repeat, that is your contention.

Mr. GLYNN. The gentleman from Illinois talked yesterday, and said that the Democrats did not want the negroes to have anything to do or to say about the Government. Well, in this particular case Mr. Aldrich and his campaign managers advised the negro Republican voters of Dallas County to stay at home and not vote at all. Who, then, wanted the negroes to have nothing to do with the affairs of Government in that case?

Mr. MANN. Only in certain precincts, and for very good and sufficient reasons, if the gentleman will pardon me. I repeat, only in certain precincts.

Mr. GLYNN. Well, at all events the Republican managers sought to keep away from the polls a certain number, whether it be large or small, of the Republican voters.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; in 21 of the precincts of that county they advised them to stay away.

Mr. MANN. It was requested that they should not participate in the election in a few of these precincts, for, as I have stated, good reasons.

Mr. GLYNN. But they were requested to stay away. They were advised not to vote, and I ask the gentleman if that looks as if the Democrats in that county did not want the negro to have anything to do about the Government? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is simply begging the conclusion.

Mr. GLYNN (continuing). The gentleman from Illinois dreams that. In the course of his remarks yesterday he also read a campaign circular issued by the campaign committee down there. Now, that circular has as much to do with the legality or illegality of this case as the enunciation of the Ten Commandments or the whistling of the winds through the lofty buildings in his own white city of Chicago.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am very glad the gentleman calls it "white;" because if there is much white left in that busy center, it is certainly hard to find.

Mr. GLYNN. Well, perhaps a whitened sepulcher, I might call it. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Speaker, I was referring to this particular campaign circular. I heard a Republican member of the majority of the committee, when this circular was read, say jocosely, "Why, I have issued worse circulars than that myself in campaign times." And yet the gentleman from Illinois uses it as a reason for unseating the contestee in this case.

Now, sir, I do not want to make this a political controversy. I do not think it is a question in which politics ought to enter. It is a question of fact, to be determined by the House. It is merely a matter of right and wrong. I deprecate the words and the implication of the man from Nebraska in the matter of making it political. There is no justification for such conduct in this case.

The gentleman from Illinois the other day talked glibly about how magnanimous the majority of the committee were in the Turner case. What was pending there? I, Mr. Speaker, was a member of the subcommittee which made the report in that case, and I knew the policy which was to be pursued. The game there was to hold it up as long as possible. Mr. Turner's opponent had no case at all, and the only thing that hurried up the seating of Turner was the sad news from Kentucky relating to the shooting of an executive officer of that State. But it has nothing whatever to do with the pending case, and I mention it now simply for the purpose of meeting the suggestions which have been raised in regard to it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a question?

Mr. GLYNN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it not true that the Turner case was argued before the committee thoroughly by attorneys for the contestant, who insisted that Turner should be unseated?

Mr. GLYNN. Certainly; they all insist on that when they want anything done.

Mr. MANN. I simply wished the gentleman, in complete fairness to the committee, to make that statement.

Mr. BARTLETT. Every member of the committee contended that there was nothing in the contest.

Mr. MANN. Well, the report of the committee will not sustain that statement. I ask gentlemen to read the report of the committee and see whether there is anything to justify the suggestion of my friend from Georgia.

Mr. GLYNN. Well, the secrets of the committee room have no place here, but it was the chairman of your committee who hurried it up for political reasons and thus blocked the game of delay. That has nothing to do with this case, though.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] also said on yesterday that the returns were thrown out from three of the precincts in which Mr. Aldrich secured the representation he desired. Now, the election officers there, appointed at Aldrich's request, signed the election returns. Do you not suppose that they would have known if there was fraud there? And if you throw out those returns, you brand as traitors and thieves the men whom Mr. Aldrich himself selected as his representatives there. For my part, I do not believe that they were traitors and thieves. I do not agree with my friend from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] who thinks that every man who differs with him wants to stuff a ballot box or go down in his neighbor's pocket.

It was my intention to confine myself solely to the merits of this case, Mr. Speaker, but as the majority have seen fit to go into ancient history I have concluded to avail myself of the same privilege. Mr. Aldrich, in 1894, was nominated by the Populists of his district. He was indorsed by a branch of the Republican party. He crept into this House through the knot hole of a contest. About the contest of 1894 I do not want to say anything, for the reason that the present majority did not bring in the report, but you did bring in your report in the contest of 1896, and I protest most emphatically against your effort to try this case on any previous contest. I plead for extenuation of my conduct in citing this letter, your conduct in trying to oust Mr. Robbins in the contest of 1896.

In 1896 Mr. Aldrich was a candidate for Congress. When the Republican convention met, he and his followers found that they did not have enough delegates to nominate him. They bolted the convention and held a convention of their own, nominating Mr. Aldrich for Congress and sending Mr. Aldrich, with a negro Republican, as delegates to the national Republican convention at St. Louis. In the national Republican convention at St. Louis, the contested seats were tried. Aldrich and his opponent were denied their seats, and the men sent by the other convention were given their place there. The same convention which tried to give Aldrich a seat in the national convention nominated him for Congress. He went to that convention, this record shows, against McKinley, telling the silver people there that he was a silver man, and telling the gold men that he was a gold man, telling the Populists he was a Populist, and telling the Republicans that he was a Republican, a regular weather-cock in politics. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Telling the Greenbackers that he was a Greenbacker.

Mr. GLYNN. Yes; telling the Greenbackers that he was a Greenbacker and the Free-soilers that he was a Free-soiler. Well, Mr. Wilson was nominated by the regular Republican convention. Mr. Wilson is a poor man; they tell me that Mr. Aldrich has plenty of this world's goods. Evidently the possession of these goods work strange results upon a man that went and caused poor Wilson to get out. Wilson, nominated by the regular Republican convention, withdrew from the contest, but when he withdrew he wrote this letter, of which I want to read part. Mr. Wilson says—remember he was the regular Republican nominee:

I yield to no man when demand is made upon me for service to my State or to my country. An enemy—

"An enemy," he says—Aldrich, that meant—claiming to be within our ranks confronts us. The principles of the Republican party are sought to be subordinated to the debauchment and hoped-for greed of some of those heretofore trusted, and in whose sense of honor and decency we had relied, through the corrupting influences of an alien to our principles, aided by the misuse of money. I am unable longer to continue the unequal fight against this pseudo nominee.

Pseudo nominee! This is Aldrich. Perhaps the majority will not want so much ancient history after hearing this letter. [Laughter.]

Somewhere in his writings, Mr. Speaker, Lord Bacon says that "no pleasure is comparable to standing upon the vantage ground of truth," while in one of his prose efforts John G. Whittier holds that "it is always safe to do right, and the truest expediency is simple justice." Mr. Speaker, I agree with Lord Bacon. I agree with John G. Whittier. I believe that the greatest of pleasures is the pleasure of standing on the vantage ground of truth. I hold that it is always safe to do right. I know that the truest expediency is simple justice; and those thoughts are reflections of the reasons why I purpose to vote for Gaston A. Robbins to maintain the seat in Congress which, in my mind, he now legally and honestly holds from the Fourth Congressional district of the State of Alabama. And I take this position not because I am a Democrat, not because Gaston A. Robbins is a Democrat—for as a member of the Committee on Contested Elections I am blind to all political complexions and deaf to all party cries—but because I want to follow the right as God has given me to see it, and because I believe that the sovereign will of the majority of the people of the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama should not be thwarted by any political thimble-rigging or any legal hairsplitting based on possible contingencies and improbable probabilities.

In a contest of this kind political inclinations should have no place, party prejudices no seat, personal feelings no habitation or home. On one side is arrayed Right, in her robes of immaculate majesty; on the other, Wrong, with her retinue of satanic courtiers and murky imps. With the arguments of one blend the sweet strains of the carols of Justice, while with the other mingle the groans of a disappointed Ambition and the stentorian commands of a suffering Hope that the members of this House will trample under heel the one royal prerogative of American citizenship—the power to name the men who shall make the laws for the land. We are sitting to-day as a judicial tribunal, and, like the Goddess of Justice, should be blind to every purpose and every determination but the sole aim—

> To think, to feel, to do
> Only the whole right,
> To yield no step in the awful race,
> No blow in the fearful fight.

For the opinion of the majority I have all the respect in the world. This respect, however, can not prevent me from thinking that the opinion of the minority is the true one. Of course, I do not expect that the majority of the committee will agree with me on this point, but I do hope that the majority of the members of this House will so agree when they vote on this proposition. We members of the minority gave the majority a pleasant opportunity to do this by offering to allow them to sign the minority report, but for some inexplicable reason they spurned our proffered generosity. Why they could possibly refuse to do this after hearing the evidence has been almost as much a matter of wonderment to me as why the seat of Gaston A. Robbins was ever contested at all. I think that both of these facts are destined to become the political curios of this session of Congress.

All through their report the majority lays great stress upon the multiplicity of contests that have come from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama and seem to advocate the unseating of Mr. Robbins as a necessity for putting an end to these contests. It is true that Mr. Robbins has been before this House in a contest once before, but it is equally true that Mr. Aldrich is now trying to win his seat in this House through a contest for the third time. Every time before this that he has been a member of Congress he has come in through the back door of a contest, and if the majority of this committee are so anxious to put an end to the contests from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama, let me suggest to them that they tell Mr. Aldrich to go back home and conduct his campaigns in the future on a square, manly basis, and not on a method predicated on a contest.

There is a contest in this election case because Aldrich was afraid to stand squarely and fairly before the people of his district and because his campaign manager, George B. Deans, gave orders to voters to stay away from certain precincts, had witnesses trained to swear to falsehoods, so that he might bring this election case into this House in a contest. Aldrich had succeeded in getting in twice that way before, but Aldrich and Deans wanted to get a seat on the principle of Disraeli when he said, "Get money honestly, if you can; but get money." I know that this is a bold statement to make, but in all its boldness I challenge each member of the majority individually to assert that it is not true or to cast the least shadow of suspicion upon the truthfulness of that assertion. But if they should so far forget the evidence in the case as to think that I am allowing partisan feeling to run away with my reason in this assertion, I most respectfully refer them to page 893 of the record in this case, on which Mr. George B. Deans, the campaign manager of Mr. Aldrich, swears that he conducted the campaign in the county of Dallas predicated on a contest having to be made. And so I say if the majority of this committee are so anxious to put an end to the contests from this Congressional district, they should send word to the campaign managers of Mr. Aldrich not to conduct their campaigns predicated on a contest, but fight them out in a good manly way.

I protest, and I protest most vehemently, against the course of the majority in trying to drag into this case any previous contest from the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama. I insist—and every fair-minded man must support me in the contention—that this case should be tried solely on its merits and absolutely divorced from all other contests. The majority of the members of this committee seem to think that they are trying over again the old Robbins-Aldrich case of four years ago, and their course fits well the famous story of Natt Head "about the same old hoss." A Western farmer had a college-bred son who went off preaching on the missions. He came back with an old rackabone, and the old man met him on the piazza. After exchanging salutations the father asked the son, "Where did you get that old horse?" "That is as good a horse as our Saviour rode into Jerusalem," replied the son. The old man came down from the piazza, examined the animal's mouth carefully, and then, standing back, remarked quietly, "Dan, I'll be blowed if it ain't the same old horse." [Laughter and applause.]

And so I am afraid that some members of the committee have hastily come to the conclusion that this election case is the "same old horse" from Alabama which stalked in here years ago. But it is not. It is a horse altogether of a different color this time. Without a scintilla of disrespect to my differing colleagues on the committee, I am afraid that they have allowed extraneous incidents to warp their judgment in this case. I am fearful that in this case at least they have dropped into the mood of that olden judge, Themistocles, whom Plutarch represents as saying, "May I never sit on a tribunal where my friends shall not find more favor from me than strangers." [Laughter.]

To my way of thinking, the position of the majority of the committee in this case is like the habitual mood of that famous old Greek, Agesilaus, who thought a rigid adherence to justice a mere pretense. A friend of his, Nicias by name, was once on trial for a serious offense, and to the judge Agesilaus wrote, "If Nicias is innocent, acquit him; if Nicias is not innocent, acquit him; anyway, be sure to acquit Nicias." So the majority of this committee say to the members of this House, "If Aldrich is elected, seat him; if Aldrich is not elected, seat him; anyway, be sure to seat Aldrich." [Laughter and applause.] But if a sense of justice yet abides in this House and if its contested-election cases are decided in accordance with law and evidence, Mr. Aldrich can not get the seat in this Congress to which Mr. Robbins has been elected; and facts and figures both prove Mr. Robbins to have been elected.

Why, my friends, if you grant every concession for which Mr. Aldrich asks, Mr. Robbins is yet elected by a majority of 389 votes; and surely the majority of the members of this House are not ready to stand before the tribunal of public opinion and acknowledge that they have been guilty of the crime of robbing a man of a seat in Congress for which he has a clear majority of 389 after there has been granted every concession for which his opponent asks. In addition to this, a fair examination of the evidence will show that many of the objections raised by Mr. Aldrich are puerile and ill founded. With these brushed aside Mr. Robbins would have a majority of over 1,100, but 389 is as good for all practicable purposes as is 1,100.

In view of these facts, it would be an act of injustice of the rankest kind to oust Mr. Robbins—an act of injustice deserving of the universal condemnation of the law-abiding people of this country. In his History of Rome Gibbon makes narration of an incident where the Ottoman, Bajazet I, had the stomach of one of his chamberlains torn from the body because the chamberlain had been guilty of drinking a bowlful of goat's milk belonging to a poor woman. The action caused a hurricane of comment on account of its excess of justice. And yet, those who advocate unseating Gaston A. Robbins are seeking to follow the course of Bajazet. They are apparently so anxious to walk straight in the path of an imaginary duty that they are traveling zigzag and bending backward. Because of some trivial irregularities—akin to the drinking of that bowl of goat's milk—they seek to tear the vitals out of the rightful cause of Gaston A. Robbins.

Why, my friends, if the reasons asked for by Mr. Aldrich for the unseating of Robbins, after all his contentions have been granted, were applied to the election of each man in this House, I make bold to say that there would not be a single Congressman in this House to-day and the Government could never secure a representative body to enact laws. There never was an election without some error and some taint, and everyone here knows this to be true. If you unseat Robbins, I warn you that there is not a man in this House who could not be unseated for somewhat similar reasons, provided each one had an Aldrich against him who was willing to spend his time and money in hunting up spooks and bugaboos to invalidate your election, spooks and bugaboos used by himself, but devoid of effectiveness because bunglingly handled.

If the lawyers of this House will read the brief of Mr. Aldrich, they will be amused by the jumping-jack tactics employed therein to established his case. They will find that the charges therein are not as particularly specific as is required by section 105 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which says:

> The contestant shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest.

In section 1 of the brief the contestant falls to do this. In fact, he does everything but this. He is indefinite, purposely indefinite, possibly with the hope of hitting something by shooting at everything. He is like the sick man who was told he was about to die and in quick succession sent for a Catholic priest, a Presbyterian minister, a Methodist minister, and a Campbellite, and in explanation of his queer conduct said to the last minister: "Well, you see, Mr. Preacher, I am on my last legs and about to go, they tell me; and I have heard heaven is a very good place to go to, and I want to take all the chances of getting there." [Laughter.] Identically similar is the position taken, from a legal standpoint, by the contestant in this case. He has concluded that Congress is a very good place to go to, and wants to take all the chances of getting there. He wants to override justice and cast aside legal rules to reach the object of his ambition.

The Fourth Congressional district of Alabama is composed of the counties of Cleburne, Calhoun, Talladega, Shelby, Chilton, and Dallas. In this contest the whole question turns on the vote of Dallas County. There is no dispute as to the other counties. Under the laws of the State of Alabama under which this election was held, the statutes of the State provide that thirty days before the election a board, composed of the judges of probate, the clerk of the circuit court, and the sheriff of the county, shall appoint three inspectors or judges for each precinct in the county, two of them shall be of opposing political parties.

Some time before this board met Mr. Aldrich presented a list of 31 persons and asked the board to appoint those to represent him in the 31 precincts in Dallas County. Out of these 31 names the board named 20 of the inspectors asked for by Mr. Aldrich. Out of the 10 not appointed, the board gave good and sufficient reason for its conduct in refusing to name 6. This leaves only 4 for whose nonappointment no excuse is given. About this fact the members of the majority make much ado, and would create the impression that a crime had been committed. This is not true, for according to the Code of Alabama, section 1583, the board is not required by law to select inspectors from any list served upon them by any person or candidate, but are required "to appoint 3 inspectors for each place of voting, 2 of whom shall be of opposing political parties, if practicable."

So you see that the board really did Mr. Aldrich a favor when they named twenty out of the thirty-one names he presented. It was not obliged to name a single one of the names presented by Mr. Aldrich if it did not so wish. As long as it named three inspectors for each polling place, and two out of these three were of opposing political parties, the law was complied with. Thus drops the bottom out of the contestant's first cry of wrong and fraud in the election of Mr. Robbins. If Mr. Aldrich was elected at all, he was elected under the law passed by the legislature of the State of Alabama, and he has to stand or fall by that law. It is not within the power of this House to prescribe or to enact election laws for the State of Alabama. Congress has nothing whatever to do with the goodness or the fairness of this law.

In addition to this, "the act appointing inspectors is a judicial and not a ministerial act," as will be found declared in 100 Alabama Report, page 603, and this decision of the Alabama court is verified by the following decisions, viz: United States vs. Paxton (40 Federal Reporter, page 136); United States vs. Chairs (40 Federal Reporter, page 820); In re Supervisors of Election (43 Federal Reporter, page 859). Will this House say that it can take control of a board which acts judicially? Has it not been held from time immemorial that judges shall not be called upon to account for their judicial acts? If, however, this House should so override precedent as to be of the opinion that it has the right to call into question the acts of the appointing board and to criticise it, I propose to call the attention of the House to the sworn evidence in the case, which shows conclusively that the board gave the contestant every inspector it possibly could, except, perhaps, four, and of these, two were from Union precinct, which is the only one that was contested by Mr. Aldrich.

The evidence shows that the identical persons asked for by Mr. Aldrich to be appointed as inspectors were appointed in the following precincts: Plantersville, Summerfield, Woodlawn, Harrel's, Dublin, Martins, Pine Flat, Old Town, Pleasant Hill, Richmond, Burnsville, Pence's, Liberty Hill, Bell's, Vernon, Brown's, Elm Bluff, Smyly's, Boykin's, Carlowville, and City precincts (Record, page 291). The evidence also shows that the board failed to appoint the ones requested by Aldrich in the following precincts: Valley Creek, Orrville, Lexington, River, Portland, Cahaba, Union, Marion Junction, and Kings.

Thus it appears that the board did not give him inspectors in 9 precincts instead of 15, as alleged in Aldrich's notice of contest. The testimony of J. H. Lumpkin further shows that the following persons, requested by Aldrich to be appointed as inspectors, were unknown to the appointing board: Jurdon Hatcher, Orrville; J. H. Brown, River; and Westley Williams, Portland. Could any sane man ask the appointing board to appoint as inspectors persons who were unknown to them and whose politics was unknown to them?

The evidence of Sheriff Lumpkin shows that Charlie Smith, of Valley Creek precinct, was not qualified for the duties of inspector, and that the said Lumpkin requested Campaign Manager Mason to suggest the name of some other person to act in his place; and the evidence also shows that J. G. Johnson, suggested as inspector for Lexington precinct, was objectionable on the ground that there was a good deal of feeling against him in the precinct where he lived; and the testimony of W. N. Carson (Record, page 861) and of T. F. Kelley (Record, page 865) shows that W. S. Johnson, suggested as inspector for Mitchell's precinct, was disqualified, and that it is doubtful whether or not he was an elector of Mitchell's precinct—one of the qualifications required by the law for an inspector to possess—and for other reasons stated by said witnesses, in that they say it is not certain that he is a person of sound mind.

The testimony of A. C. Donaldson (Record, page 740) shows that S. B. Mitchell, the name of the person recommended for inspector in Cahaba precinct, was unknown, and it is also shown by the testimony of Sheriff Lumpkin that Saul B. Mitchell was unknown to the appointing board. There is no proof offered by Aldrich that John Logan, the person asked for in Union recinct, was a supporter of Aldrich, or that he was in any way qualified as inspector. The fact is that the record in this case does not show that the appointing board declined to appoint any person requested by Aldrich or his supporters who is shown by the record to possess the statutory qualifications. On the contrary, the record affirmatively shows that in every precinct where the board did not appoint the person requested by Aldrich there were good reasons for not appointing them, except, perhaps, in the single instance of John Logan, and in this instance there is no evidence to show that he was qualified or belonged to the opposing political party from the other inspectors.

It is true that some of these inspectors appointed by the board failed to appear on election day, but the appointing board is in no way responsible for their failure to appear and act as inspectors. In justice, the responsibility for their absence and failure to act should rest upon Aldrich, for the reason that he requested his supporters to remain away from the polls and take no part in the election. Under these circumstances there was but one course for the inspectors who did appear, and that was to appoint some other qualified elector of the precinct and proceed with the election.

Evidently Mr. Aldrich has proceeded under a misapprehension of the law. There is no provision of the election law of Alabama providing that a candidate or the constituted authority of a political party may offer or serve the appointing board with a list of persons to represent him or his party as inspectors at the several voting places. But the law does provide for the presentation to the inspectors by the candidates or by the constituted authorities of the political parties of a list of clerks and markers—not less than six nor more than ten in each precinct—to act as clerks and markers of the opposing political parties respectively (Code of Alabama, section 1595). The testimony shows that where the constituted authorities of the opposing political parties, or the candidates themselves, presented a list of clerks and markers, as provided for by law, asking the inspectors to appoint certain persons to represent them, that the inspectors complied with such request.

Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully call the attention of the members of the House to the fact that all through this contest Mr. Aldrich insinuates that the people of Dallas County would rather vote for the devil than vote for Mr. Robbins. Well, sir, His Satanic Majesty was not a candidate against Mr. Robbins, but Mr. Aldrich was, and the people of Dallas County showed that though they might prefer to vote for the Prince of Darkness rather than for Mr. Robbins, yet they preferred to vote for Mr. Robbins rather than for Mr. Aldrich.

The evidence of the case shows that Aldrich bases his whole contest upon the votes which he thought he ought to get, but which he did not get. He has completely lost sight of the fact that a vote in the ballot box is worth two dozen on the fence. "Aim high," says Emerson; "Aim low," says General Jackson; but the wise candidate is he who makes his gauge depend upon the fact of whether he is aiming at the moon or at a melon thief crawling off on his hands and knees. Aldrich aimed too low that he did not want the colored vote of Dallas County. He depended solely upon the white vote, and he overshot his mark. Robbins aimed at the golden medium and rung the bull's-eye so loud that it is still ringing in the ears of every justice-loving man in this House and urging him to uphold the law by keeping Robbins in his seat.

Examine the evidence in this case, members of the House of Representatives, and you will find Mr. Aldrich trying to create the impression that he did not get his full vote in Dallas County, and if the conditions existing after election had not existed he would have received more votes. Examine this evidence a little further, gentlemen, examine it a little further, I ask you, and you will find the contention of Mr. Aldrich contradicted by his own campaign manager, Mr. G. B. Deans, who testified that he was in Dallas County constantly during the Congressional campaign and that he instructed the leading Republicans of certain precincts not to bring out their vote on election day.

How, I ask you, could Aldrich receive a full vote in Dallas County when, in obedience to his campaign manager, his supporters remained away from the polls? Aldrich was hoisted on his own petard. He had hugged himself into the delusion that he would receive the white vote of the district. He desired to go down in history as having been elected by the white people of the district for some purpose covered up in the secret resources of his soul, and wanted to anoint his bosom with the sweet unction of having carried the election held in the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama by the white votes. He thought he was going to get the white vote of the district, and he therefore instructed his campaign leaders not to bring out the colored votes in certain districts.

When, however, he found that he had not carried the so-called "white counties" by the majorities he expected, he falls back upon his old cry of "fraud" and says he was swindled in the count. What does the evidence say, gentlemen? Well, if it says anything it says that the contentions of Mr. Aldrich are without ground. All the election officers swear so. During the campaign and on the day of election there was peace and good order in Dallas County. All the citizens of this county were quiet and law-abiding on the day the last order was issued by contestant's campaign manager, G. B. Deans, who said:

> On one of my trips to Dallas County, the week before the election, I was informed that there were some cases of smallpox in River, Pine Flat, and some of the other adjoining beats. Thinking it possible that an election might not be held in Pine Flat and River beats, where I had instructed the full strength to be cast, I issued an order for the Republican vote to be cast in Cahaba beat, where I had previously ordered it suppressed. (Record, page 892.)

There is not in this record one scintilla of evidence upon which Mr. Aldrich can base his claim that the votes of this county should not be considered by Congress.

It appears from the testimony introduced by Mr. Aldrich that he had every opportunity of making a canvass, and that his campaign managers were constantly at work in Dallas County, and his general policy of instructing his supporters to remain away from the polls was fully carried into execution. Campaign Manager G. B. Deans testified that he instructed the contestant's supporters not to vote in the following precincts: Woodlawn, Harrels, Martins, Orrville, Lexington, Oldtown, Pleasant Hill, Richmond, Portland, Pence's, Liberty Hill, Vernon, Marion Junction, King's, Smyley's, Elm Bluff, Carlowville, Boykin's, Mitchell's, and Brown's, and the vote in Cahaba precinct was ordered suppressed until Saturday prior to the election on the following Tuesday. (Record, page 892.) This policy of instructing his supporters to remain away from the polls in other precincts is shown and proved by the testimony of Cæsar Foster (Record, page 315), and the testimony of A. J. Martin and exhibit thereto (Record, page 639), and the testimony of W. W. Sheppard and exhibit thereto (Record, page 792), and that of William F. Cook (Record, page 577).

Mr. Aldrich claims that the colored voters of Dallas County were his supporters in this race for Congress, although the testimony shows that he did not receive their votes generally. Hundreds of them appeared as witnesses, and their testimony is found in the record showing that they voted for Robbins. This claim of Mr. Aldrich is directly contradicted by his policy of instructing the colored electors not to vote. I call special attention to a letter written by George R. Mason and addressed to A. J. Martin which contains the expression that "If Mr. Aldrich is willing to risk his chances with the white voters, Mr. Robbins ought to be." (Testimony of A. J. Martin and exhibit thereto, Record, page 639.)

Before taking up the contested precincts I want to call the attention of the House to some of the general features of this case. Mr. Aldrich occupied forty days in taking his direct testimony, and he failed to produce a single witness, with the exception of one A. Thompson, of Burnsville, who swore to any fraud in the count. If there had been any fraud in Dallas County, do you not think that more than one man would have known about it? If there had been any fraud in Dallas County, do you think for a minute that the 19 other inspectors appointed on Mr. Aldrich's selection would not have come forward and said something about it? If there had been any fraud in Dallas County, do you not think that the men who were appointed markers and clerks upon the request of Mr. Aldrich at the voting precincts in the county would have proclaimed the facts from the house tops?

If the majority of the committee or the majority of this House takes any other stand, it brands these friends of Mr. Aldrich as traitors and thieves, and surely there must have been some honest men among them who would be willing to stand for Mr. Aldrich's cause. For my part, I think they were all honest men, and proved themselves such when they would not allow themselves to be persuaded from swearing to the truth to further the interests of their friend Aldrich. They placed honesty, justice, and truth above personal friendship, and swore, all of them, that Robbins had been honestly elected.

During the first thirty days of evidence taking Mr. Aldrich tried to prove his vote, and yet when he fails in that he cries out that the vote in certain districts of Dallas County ought to be set aside. And now a word more about Thompson, who swore that fraud was committed.

I want to call attention to the man's doings just to show his unreliability. He was appointed inspector at Burnsville precinct, 22, upon the request of Mr. Aldrich. When the returns were handed in from his precinct he swore to them as an inspector and certified to them as correct. Afterwards he took the stand and swore they were not correct. Evidently he swore to a lie at one time or the other; and when, I would like to know, can you tell that the truth is being told by a man who swears to one thing to-day and directly the opposite thing to-morrow? Which time is he telling the truth? Can you or I tell? Can he tell himself? And yet, in direct contradiction of Thompson, all the other officers of the Burnsville precinct—half of them Republican—F. S. Campbell, J. H. Burns, Jack Robinson, J. S. Dillon, and W. D. Barmberg, all swear that the returns from Burnsville are honest and true.

Shall the statement by a witness who swears one way at one time and then another way at another time be taken to set aside the sworn oath of four other officers? And if Thompson can be believed, why did not Mr. Aldrich offer evidence in his rebuttal testimony to uphold his tottering champion?

Another peculiar feature of the evidence in this case is that after Mr. Robbins had consumed his forty days of taking direct evidence, Mr. Aldrich broke all rules of legality, all canons of justice, all dictates of right, all mandates of manliness, by offering in rebuttal evidence which was not rebuttal at all, but evidence in chief to attack the integrity of the returns at Smiley's precinct 31, Lexington precinct 36, Valley Creek precinct 4, and the City precinct 36; also testimony in reference to the appointment of inspectors by the county board in Dallas County.

To this testimony no opportunity was ever given Mr. Robbins to reply, and every lawyer in this House knows that such a procedure is in direct violation of the statutes of the United States providing for the taking of testimony in contested-election cases. Mr. Robbins objected to the consideration of this testimony. So worthy did the majority of this committee on contested-election cases deem the objections of Mr. Robbins that in their discussion of the testimony at precinct No. 36 they concluded to disregard this testimony offered by Mr. Aldrich. If this evidence was disregarded by the committee and is disregarded by the House, there is no legal evidence which could have authorized the majority of the committee and none which can authorize the House to reject the returns of City precinct No. 36 and to report Mr. Aldrich elected.

If the case of Mr. Aldrich is deprived of the testimony taken in time of rebuttal testimony, but which is testimony in chief, the conclusion that Mr. Aldrich was elected, even under his own claim, can not be sustained. Mr. Aldrich relies upon that testimony in his brief, and without it he has no case, so far as City precinct No. 36 is concerned, and without the rejection of this precinct Mr. Aldrich can not be legally seated.

In their report the majority of the committee permit to stand as returned with the exception of the correction of two votes in precincts Nos. 1 and 2; the returns from Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7; give no vote in either Nos. 10 or 11, because no election was held; permit to stand Nos. 12, 13, 14, 15, 27, 29, 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35.

Thus it will be seen from the report of the majority that six precincts are rejected entirely and no vote permitted to be counted for either, although both Aldrich and Robbins did by aliunde proof prove a number of votes cast for each. The following are the precincts rejected by the majority entirely, and contains the official returns for each and votes proven for the contestant and contestee by witnesses:

	Official returns.		Aliunde proof.
	Aldrich.	Robbins.	Aldrich.	Robbins.
Orrville, No. 8	1	90	3	75
Lexington, No. 9	3	54	2	36
Marion Junction, No. 28	.....	73	.....	40
Kings, No. 30	.....	52	.....	9

The majority report rejects the return of the election officers, and counts the vote proven by aliunde proof at the following precincts, which were contested:

	Aldrich.	Robbins.
No. 4, Valley Creek	152	52
No. 16, Cahaba	163	8
No. 22, Burnsville	113	22
No. 23, Union	132	34
No. 24, Pence's	1	44
No. 36, city	126	564

They permitted to stand as returned—

	Aldrich.	Robbins.
No. 3, Woodlawn	3	38
No. 12, Old Town		56
No. 14, Richmond		21

which had been contested.

It will be observed from the report of the majority that they reject the returns from Valley Creek precinct, No. 4, upon the ground that the inspector asked for by the contestant and his party managers was refused by the appointing board of Dallas County, and that they appointed Llewellen Philips, who was claimed to be a Democrat, and that Judge Thomas, a colored man, was appointed in Philips's place on the day of the election when Philips did not arrive in time to conduct the election, and on account of this alleged fraud the said precinct is rejected, and they count for the contestant and contestee the votes which were proved by each. It will be noted that at this precinct the committee in the majority report find Aldrich to have proven 152 votes and Robbins 51 votes.

When the committee reach Orrville precinct No. 8 they discard the returns entirely for the same reason that they discarded the returns in Valley Creek, and yet decline to count the votes they found to have been proven by the contestant and contestee by aliunde proof. It will be noted that in this precinct the contestant proved only 3 votes, while the contestee proved 75 votes, according to the majority report.

Lexington No. 9 is treated in the same way for the same reason.

When the majority report deals with Cahaba No. 16 they reject the returns upon the same ground that they rejected the other two; but Aldrich having proven in this precinct, according to the report, 163 votes and Robbins 8, these votes are counted.

At Union precinct No. 23 the report finds that Aldrich proved 132 votes and Robbins 34, and they have declared that it should be rejected for the same reasons as the others were rejected, yet the votes proven by aliunde proof are counted.

At Marion Junction No. 28 the report of the majority entirely discards the returns for the same reasons as those applied to Orrville and Lexington, and refuses to permit any of the votes proven to be counted, and for the same reason reject entirely precinct No. 30.

It is a matter to be noted that the votes proven by aliunde evidence to have been cast at these precincts, rejected entirely, and those partially rejected are not counted by the majority except where Aldrich's alleged proven vote is large and Robbins's proven vote is small. Where the contestee proved a large vote and the contestant a small vote the returns are entirely rejected, and where the contestant proved by aliunde proof a considerable vote more than the contestee they are counted by the majority.

The rule of law which requires that when a precinct has been rejected for fraud in the conduct of the election the party shall be entitled to receive the votes proven by aliunde to have been cast for him is not applied when it benefits the contestee, but is applied when it benefits the contestant. The universal rule of law is that where the evidence shows the returns to be false and not a true statement of the votes cast such returns are impeached and destroyed, but that the true vote may be proven by calling the electors whose names are on the poll list as having voted at such election, and such votes as are proven by competent evidence should be counted for each candidate. Fraud does not invalidate the legal vote cast, but simply makes it necessary for those claiming the benefit of it to prove the vote. The rule of rejecting an entire poll is not to be adopted if it can be avoided. No investigation should be spared which would reach the truth without resorting to it. When a return is rejected for fraud, this will not disfranchise the legal voters of the precinct, but the true vote may be proven by competent evidence.

These principles of law have been uniformly held to be correct in many contested-election cases decided by the House, and are sustained in a large number of cases, a few of which are: Sixth volume American and English Encyclopedia of Law, pages 356 and 357; Washburn vs. Voorhees (3 Cong. El. Cases, 59); Reed vs. Julian (3 Cong. El. Cases, 832); Smith vs. Shelly (6 Cong. El. Cases, 18); Lowe vs. Wheeler (6 Cong. El. Cases, 61); Lynch vs. Chalmers (6 Cong. El. Cases, 338); Vallandigham vs. Campbell (2 Cong. El. Cases, 54); Covode vs. Foster (2 Bart., p. 600); Mann vs. Cassidy (1 Brewster, Penn.); Bisbee vs. Finley (2 Ells., p. 171); Paine on Elections, section 526, page 445; section 596, page 502.

In this contest Mr. Robbins has examined every election officer. He has examined 1,330 witnesses, all of whom testify that they voted for Robbins. What more could Robbins do? The sworn returns give it to Robbins. The sworn testimony of almost all the officers of election in the county of Dallas shows that the returns were fair. The testimony of almost 1,400 witnesses shows that the election was fair. And now shall we as judges, on the flimsiest of reasons, reverse the decree of the people that they rendered by their ballots on the 8th day of November, in the different precincts of Dallas County, Ala., and here in the Hall of the House of Representatives elect a man to represent that people? Can we afford to carry centralization to such an extent? I think not; and I hope that this House will reverse the findings of the committee and permit the contestee to retain his seat.

There is no law in Alabama which directs, compels, or authorizes the appointing board to appoint the men asked for by the contestant or contestee as officers of the election. The law does require that two of the inspectors shall be members of opposing political parties. It will be noted that this notice served upon the appointing board of Dallas County by the chairman of the Populist party and the chairman of the Republican party in Dallas County does not state to what political party the persons requested belong; and in one instance, where the man requested was appointed and served, it appears from the evidence that he was not of the opposing political party.

In some instances the persons requested were unknown to the appointing board as residents of the precincts for which they were asked to be appointed. No evidence has been offered to show that those who were not appointed for that reason, and who were unknown to the appointing board, lived either in Dallas County or in the precincts for which they were asked to be appointed, or that such persons existed at all. It appears from the evidence in the case of the sheriff, J. H. Lumpkin, and the probate judge that this duty of appointing inspectors was performed in pursuance of the law of Alabama, and in every instance where the parties requested were not appointed some good reasons existed why they should not be appointed; and the appointing board judicially determined after investigation who should be appointed as the various inspectors at the various precincts.

The statement made in the report of the majority that this board refused and neglected to give to Mr. Aldrich information prior to the election day as to what election officers had been selected for any of the precincts is not borne out by the testimony. From the testimony of Lumpkin it will appear that he had a full and free conversation with George R. Mason, the most active supporter of the contestant in Dallas County, about the persons asked to be appointed and those who were appointed and those who were not appointed, as requested. The testimony upon which the majority report that the chairman of the Aldrich campaign committee failed to receive a reply to his registered letter addressed to the probate judge of Dallas County, asking for a certified copy of the names of the inspectors and returning officers, is evidence given by G. B. Deanes in the time allowed for rebuttal testimony only, and should not be considered, because the contestee had no opportunity to reply to it or rebut it. Besides, from the testimony of the probate judge already referred to, the list of appointments for inspectors, after they had been completed, was delivered to the sheriff, who swears that each of the inspectors was notified in the usual way—registered letter—by the deputies of the sheriff.

There is a very, very curious feature of this case to which I again call the special attention of the members of this House. On page 893 of the record Mr. G. B. Deans—who was Mr. Aldrich's campaign manager—swears that he "conducted the campaign in Dallas County predicated on a contest having to be made." He also swears that in certain precincts he ordered the Republican vote to remain away from the polls—with the avowed purpose, it seems, of giving him some grounds for a contest. Mr. Aldrich has been a member of this House twice, and each time he has crept in through the knot hole of a contest instead of walking in like a man with a title undisputed and a right unchallenged.

Twice before he has been successful, and his campaign manager in the last election went on the theory that if he could not secure enough votes for Mr. Aldrich, he might land him by a contest, and so shaped his course. He admits this contemptible plan in his own sworn statement, and asks the members of this House to become sharers in his dastardly scheme. It is about time that Mr. Aldrich and his campaign managers were told that the charity of this House toward him had been exhausted, and that to obtain a seat any longer here it has become necessary for him to be elected.

Throughout its entire report, Mr. Speaker, the majority of this committee betrays a disposition to try this case on the previous contests brought here from Dallas County. I desire to protest most emphatically against this method of procedure and to call attention to the fact that many precincts which were attacked in previous contests are admitted to have returned the votes as cast. I also desire to impress upon the House the verity that an examination of the testimony will show that in those precincts where Mr. Aldrich had election officers appointed as requested he received fewer votes than at those precincts where he did not get the men he requested.

By the process of elimination the contest now narrows to ten precincts. Of these the first is Valley Creek, No. 4. In this precinct the majority rejects the returns of the election officers and counts the vote proven by aliunde proof. To uphold his contentions in this precinct Mr. Aldrich introduced a number of colored men as witnesses. Of these 116 colored witnesses who swore that they voted for Mr. Aldrich 51 could not read and write; yet most of them promptly swore that they marked their votes for Aldrich without the assistance of either a marker or an inspector. Evidently these fellows were owls who could see in the daytime. It ought not to surprise anyone to learn that upon the poll list of this district there does not appear the names of many of the men who swore that they voted for Aldrich.

The election officers—even the Republicans—of this precinct contradict the testimony of these colored witnesses and swear the election was honest and fair. The reason for the colored witnesses contradicting the oaths of the election officers may be surmised from the fact that the evidence shows they were promised 10 cents per mile and 75 cents per day while at Stanton, and the testimony of Andrew King (page 664 of the Record), who swears that he was promised $7 per day for his time as a witness. The unreliability of the evidence of these people is shown by the evidence of Reuben Jones, who on the 8th day of April, 1899 (page 371 of the Record) swore to a statement that on the 11th day of April, 1899 (page 342 of the Record), flatly contradicted his previous oath. Moreover, the Rev. J. H. Shoaf swears (page 316 of the Record) that he was on the train that carried these colored witnesses from Selma to Stanton, and that he saw and heard them being coached to swear that they voted for Mr. Aldrich, and on page 317 of the record Mr. T. D. Kemp corroborates the affidavit of the Rev. Mr. Shoaf.

Were the rights of property in an ordinary suit depending upon the testimony of these "trained" colored witnesses, I make bold to assert that the court and jury would accept the evidence of Judge Thomas, the Republican inspector, who was introduced as a witness by Mr. Aldrich and who swore that the election was honestly conducted and the count fairly made, together with the evidence of the Republican marker, Keneely, and the other election officers to the same effect, in preference to the unreliable, untrustworthy evidence offered by Mr. Aldrich in this precinct to impeach the returns by witnesses who had evidently been tampered with and trained as to how to testify.

Orrville precinct is the next one under discussion, and in their treatment of it the majority performs some wonderful acts of political contortion. In this precinct the majority report counts no votes for either, although the report finds that Aldrich proved 5 votes and Robbins 75 by aliunde proof. They here follow the rule of rejecting a precinct for fraud, and refusing to count any of the votes proven, although in Valley Creek precinct, discussed just above, they counted for Aldrich and Robbins the votes they found were proven by the aliunde testimony for each. Upon what principle of law or justice this distinction is made we are unable to say. The counting of the votes in one precinct and refusing to count them in another precinct, to say the least of it, is remarkable.

This is one of the precincts in which the contestant's election manager, Deanes, ordered the Republican supporters of Aldrich not to come to the polls and vote, and although the election is proven to have been fairly and honestly conducted by the election officers, the entire vote is discarded. Verily, the majority here are playing a game of catch as catch can. Their actions recall the comical situations of the play called "A New Way to Pay Old Debts."

Next in order comes Lexington precinct. Here again the majority reject and discard entirely the official returns from this precinct and refuse to count the votes that were proven by aliunde proof for either party. It will again be observed that in this precinct the vote proven for Robbins by the aliunde proof far exceeds that of the contestant.

At this precinct there was appointed as the representative of the opposing political party Simon Armstrong, a colored Republican and supporter of Aldrich, who swears that he is a Republican; that he can read and write, and that he voted for Aldrich in this election: so the statement of the majority that Simon Armstrong, a colored Democrat, was selected to serve with W. W. Berry and J. M. Mosely, white Democrats, is not borne out by the testimony.

This is also a precinct at which Republican voters were instructed not to vote. It has been charged by the contestant that the name of one of the witnesses for contestee, B. F. Moseley, who testified that he voted for contestee, did not appear upon the poll list at this election. This is not true, because on the poll list for this district the name of B. F. Moseley does appear as No. 14.

The only other evidence offered by contestant relative to this precinct was by Van Perry and Mike West, who were offered in the time for rebuttal testimony.

To sustain the returns, contestee offered Simon Armstrong, the Republican inspector who voted for Aldrich, and who does sustain the returns in every particular. He swears that he voted for Aldrich, marked his own ticket for Aldrich, was present at the count, issued the tickets, wrote the initials of his name on the stubs, took the tickets out of the box, examined every ticket taken out of the box to see how it was marked; that he examined the tally sheets being kept, and that the number of ballots in the box corresponded with the poll list, and that the election was fairly and honestly held, the vote fairly counted, and the returns made accordingly.

Besides, contestee put up 36 witnesses, whose names appear on the poll list, who swore that they voted for him.

Now we must consider Cahaba precinct. Here again we have the majority of the committee shifting their rule as to precincts the integrity of which has been attacked and counting for the contestant the votes he is alleged to have proven and for the contestee the votes he is alleged to have proven. It is again to be remarked that when these votes proven by aliunde testimony are counted in this precinct, the contestant proves a large vote and the contestee a small number, according to the report.

The next precinct in dispute is Burnsville. Here it was that the Mr. Thompson of whom the majority "think so highly" was inspector. Thompson is the only witness of the hundreds put on the stand who swore there was any fraud in Dallas County. The majority calls him an "honest man," and yet this "honest man," on the day after election, swore that the returns of this precinct were honest, and after, on the stand, swore they were false. Does an honest man do that kind of thing? Is it fair for this House to unseat a man on the evidence of a man who thus contradicts himself in his oaths?

It is a fact to be remarked upon that this Inspector Thompson, whom the majority of the committee speak of as an honest man, signed the returns without protest or compulsion, freely and voluntarily, without suggesting or intimating to any one of the election officers that he had the night before counted the ballots and permitted what—if his testimony is true—was a wrong upon the man whom he had been appointed to represent to go unnoticed and unchallenged.

It is a familiar principle of law "that he who does not prevent a crime when he can is considered as participating in it."

To repeat the law Latin maxim: "Qui non obstat cum possit facere videtur."

This is called "a bold fraud" by the majority of the committee. The attention of the House is called to the fact that these Democratic election officers, contemplating and intending to commit a fraud, when the dispute arose as to the counting of the ballots, before the ballot box had been opened or the ballots examined, placed them in the keeping of the Aldrich inspector and left them with him in the ballot box, which had no fastenings, and was accessible to him or anyone else who might desire to go into it, at his house for the entire night. The ballot box and the ballots, from the time of the close of the election until the count began, were never in the possession of anyone except the Aldrich inspector. People who contemplate and conspire to perpetrate fraud do not thus act.

The aliunde vote of Union precinct shows Robbins to have received more votes than Aldrich, and of course it is rejected.

My time is growing short, and I want to turn to City precinct, 36, as it is the largest and most important precinct.

This precinct cast the largest vote of any in the county, being the precinct of the city of Selma, containing a population of 10,000 and more. The official returns gave—

Aldrich	79
Robbins	922

There are fully 1,300 registered voters, over four-fifths of whom are white Democrats. The returns of the precinct were attacked as fraudulent by contestant on the following grounds:

I charge and claim that I was denied full legal representation at said polling place, and that there were not more than 500 votes actually cast, and of that number I am entitled to not less than 250 and you less than 450 votes.

The witnesses offered by contestant to sustain these charges testified that the inspector he asked for, James Golson, was appointed and acted; at the request of the Republican chairman of Dallas County O. O. Moore was appointed marker, and at the time nothing was said as to appointing a clerk. The man appointed came with the Republican chairman, who made the request, and he was appointed marker. It is true that upon a typewritten list handed to the inspectors there appear the names of four persons from which it was asked that a marker and clerk be appointed, but none of them were present except Moore, and he was appointed marker, and nothing was said at the time as to a clerk by the Republican chairman, for R. D. Walker, one of the inspectors, swore that if any person had been presented to act as clerk he would have been appointed.

Besides, the managers were compelled to send up in the town to secure another clerk, only one being present. It should be remembered that contestant had an inspector at the precinct selected by him, who acted with the other two in this appointment, and who does not deny the evidence of the 10 Democratic inspectors, but who signed the returns and is not offered by contestant as a witness. We must conclude that contestant could not prove anything by him which would in any way impeach the returns.

There being no clerk presented for contestant, the two clerks, Milhous and Patterson, were appointed.

These requirements as to the appointment of clerks are not mandatory but are directory, and an unintentional failure to comply with them would not vitiate the returns. In order for the failure to do certain specified acts or the doing of certain prohibited specific acts to be fatal to the validity of the election, the statute must declare such acts or the omission to do such things as fatal to the election—that is, in order to destroy a return for the failure of the officers to perform certain requirements in the method of conducting the election the law must be mandatory—that is, it must declare that the failure to perform these duties avoids the election.

Ignorance, inadvertence, mistake, or even intentional wrong on the part of the officials should not be permitted to disfranchise the district, and unless the statute plainly shows that the legislature intended compliance with the provision in relation to the manner of procedure as essential to the validity of the election it is to be regarded as directory only. Nor are statutory provisions relating to elections rendered mandatory by the circumstance that the officers of the election are criminally liable for their violation. The rule prescribed by law for conducting elections is designed chiefly to afford opportunity for the people to exercise the elective franchise, and to prevent illegal voting, and to ascertain the true result. As such rules are directory, and not mandatory, a departure from the mode prescribed will not vitiate the returns of the election. (See Paine on Elections, 497, 498, and the notes thereto; see also Rinaker vs. Downing, decided by Committee on Elections No. 1 in the Fifty-fourth Congress.)

From these principles we conclude that the failure to appoint a clerk from this list for the contestant was a failure to perform a merely directory duty imposed by statute, and such a failure does not and can not vitiate the poll. Besides, the testimony clearly shows that the omission was not intentional, but a mere oversight, and that duty would have been performed and the provision complied with if the persons named on the list had been presented or had appeared. Besides, the list did not conform to the statute, in that it did not contain the number of names required; and, moreover, it is admitted by the proof and undisputed that O. O. Moore, the only person on this list that was present, was in fact appointed, as requested, and that the only reason another was not appointed was because none were present; and it would be unreasonable to demand that the election should have been delayed until these could be hunted up and produced by contestant's representatives.

See also 6 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law, page 325; McCreary on Elections, 190, and cases cited; and the case of O'Neil vs. Joy, views of the minority, which declares:

> No case has been discovered sanctioning the conclusion that the voter should be deprived of his vote by the omission of the election officers to discharge a duty imposed upon them by law. It is only when the statute has declared the ballot to be void or forbids it to be counted that the court have felt obliged to sanction its exclusion.

See also Paine on Elections, sec. 360-373, note 3; Quinn vs. Latimore (120 N. C.); Clark vs. Robbins (88 Ill., 498); Barnes vs. Adams (2 Bart., 764); People vs. Wilson, (62 N. Y., 190).

Therefore the conclusion of the majority to reject the returns because of the failure of the election officers to appoint a clerk from the list furnished, who was not present and failed to appear, can not be sustained under the well-settled rules of law; but they are in the face of the law. They, the majority, not only reject the votes, but reject the poll.

The conclusion of the majority of the committee to reject the precinct because there are alleged to be found on the poll list 80 persons who were not registered is equally untenable, and can not be sustained either by the text writers, decisions of the courts, or the precedents in Congressional contested-election cases. On the subject I cite the following: Paine on Elections, sections Nos. 359, 360, and 374, and notes. The case of Dale vs. Irwin (78 Ill., 170). This case arose under the Illinois statute, which provided that—

> No vote should be received at any State, county, town, or city election if the name of the person offering to vote be not in the said register made on Tuesday or Wednesday preceding the election, etc.

The supreme court of Illinois held as follows:

> It is claimed that as the others voted without having been registered and without any proof of right, their votes are invalid. It does not appear that these votes were challenged or any objections made to their voting, and the presumption must be that they were legal voters, and so known to the judges.

The court not only decided that rejection of unregistered voters did not invalidate the poll, but that the fact that they were permitted to vote unchallenged, and that the ballots were deposited in box and honestly counted, prevented the rejection of the votes.

In a later case the same court reviewed this case (see Clark vs. Robinson, 88 Ill., page 498) and decided—

> That the prohibition of the statute in this regard was but directory against receiving such a vote, and that the failure of observance of this direction would not invalidate such a vote which had been received by the judge of elections and deposited in the ballot box.

How much less would such conduct of election officers invalidate the poll. This last case from Illinois is quoted with approval by the Committee on Elections No. 1, in the Fifty-fourth Congress, in its report of the case of Rinaker vs. Downing, which was finally adopted by the House. The House has dealt with the question and has never held that the precinct should be rejected because unregistered voters are permitted to vote; but it has decided that the votes should not be counted, but be deducted from the candidate for whom cast. To this effect are the following: Paine on Elections, sections 362, 363; Finley vs. Walls, Smith Election Cases, 367; Bell vs. Snyder, Smith Election Cases, 247; McCrary on Elections, page 445.

I might multiply authorities, but I content myself by asserting that no respectable authority can be cited to sustain the conclusion of the majority that the entire poll should be rejected because voters whose names did not appear on the poll list were permitted to vote.

I insist that the credible and trustworthy evidence does not show that a much larger vote was cast for Aldrich than was returned for him.

According to the report of the majority, Aldrich proved that he received 136 votes, which is 57 more than he was given in the returns. Twenty-one ballots were so badly marked that they were not counted, evidently cast by ignorant voters for Aldrich. That would make only a difference of 36. Ten of contestant's witnesses swore they voted for him, who are neither on the poll list or registration list. Nine whose names are not on the poll list also swear they voted for him, which would leave only 7 votes, the difference between the vote which was returned for him and the votes he proved.

It is true that 102 witnesses testified that they voted for contestant and marked their own tickets, but of this number that did testify 86 can neither read nor write; and the proof is abundant that they were coached and drilled and instructed how to swear and what to swear; and when I find that a number of them are neither on the poll nor registration list, and view with that suspicion and caution I should the testimony of such witnesses, and remember that the statements were made by the voter as to how he voted months after the election, and when witness fees and mileage were to be earned, as well as a free ride on the railroad, he must indeed be a very credulous man who accepts such evidence as proof sufficient to destroy the solemn returns of election officers, one of whom was a partisan of contestant; and also in preference to the testimony of the election officers, who testify as to the correctness and truthfulness of the returns and the fairness of the election.

While it is true that some of the voters on the poll list who testified that they voted for Robbins are not to be found on the registration list, there are not as many as 80. A comparison shows that many names on the poll list which are alleged by contestant not to be on the registration list are on the registration list; yet the only result of this must be to deduct from Robbins the votes of those whose names can not be found on the registration list. I believe the most of these are clerical errors on the part of the clerks of the election in putting down the name of the voters as they are called out when voting, either getting the initials wrong, writing it down according to the sound, and in many instances the errors have been made in copying the poll and registration list.

Besides, the evidence is that many voters brought their registration certificates, and when these were shown the list was not consulted.

I believe the proof shows that the election was fairly and honestly held, the votes honestly counted as cast, and honestly returned.

The statement that many persons obtained their ballots illegally is not fully justified by the evidence, since it is evident that the witnesses confused this election with the previous primary elections, where the tickets voted were not issued officially, three primary elections having been held shortly before this one. The testimony of all the election officers is clear that no tickets were furnished illegally or in violation of the statute of Alabama, and I do not think that the entire poll should be rejected for that reason, but only the unregistered votes deducted. The majority of the committee, while they say that the testimony taken in rebuttal when it should have been taken in chief should not be considered, yet they undertake to prejudice the case by stating what this testimony shows, with caustic comment. I think that the precinct can not be successfully rejected upon the legal testimony taken in chief by contestant and contestee, and to decide to reject it on the testimony taken in the time allowed by statute for testimony in rebuttal only is both illegal, contrary to the statutes and precedents of the House, and at the same time manifestly unjust and unfair to the contestee, who has had no opportunity to meet it.

If the contestee were given time or opportunity to meet this evidence, he demonstrated to the committee that he could successfully meet this new testimony, without which, I repeat, this precinct can not legally or justly be rejected.

I conclude, therefore, with reference to this precinct, that the election was fairly and honestly held and the returns honestly and correctly made. There should be deducted from the contestee's vote the votes of those who voted for him who are shown not to have been registered. I have found great difficulty in verifying the exact number, but find 65 voters on the poll list whose names are not on the registered list who, it is claimed, voted for Robbins.

The evidence does not show for whom all these voted, but there were examined 28 voters who swore they voted for Robbins whose names do not appear on the registration list. If all these are deducted from Robbins's vote, then this precinct would stand:

Aldrich	79
Robbins	857

I therefore find that the precincts in Dallas County should stand as returned, except as follows:

	Aldrich.	Robbins.
No. 1	28	54
No. 2	32	80
No. 22	1	16
No. 36	79	857
The other precincts as returned gave the following vote	252	1,431
The votes in the other counties	5,296	4,477
Total	5,685	6,915
		5,685
This leaves as the result, majority for Robbins		1,230

To summarize the whole vote, then, Mr. Speaker, and to show the vote as the minority claims it should stand, I submit the following enumeration of the votes in each precinct of this Congressional district.

By the report of the majority the following precincts in Dallas County are counted as returned:

Majority for Robbins, 389.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to give an impartial résumé of this case. I hold that, with every contention of Mr. Aldrich granted, Mr. Robbins yet has a majority of 389. I hold that Mr. Aldrich should not be allowed to creep into a seat in this House through the knot hole of a contest for the third time. I believe this House should tell him that it is necessary to be elected to obtain a seat here. I contend that by every tenet of law, by every dictate of justice, by every rule of right, Mr. Robbins is entitled to the seat he now holds. To deprive him of that seat would be worse than robbery. It would be legalized theft. To deprive him of that seat would be an act of injustice rank enough to cause the statues of justice in this grand edifice to weep salt tears of bitter sorrow. In the name of justice I appeal to you members of this House to think, to feel, to do only the holy right, to cast partisanship aside and vote for Gaston A. Robbins to retain the seat to which he has been honestly elected. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The Puerto Rico Tariff.

SPEECH

OF

HON. WILLIAM D. DALY,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 23, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. DALY of New Jersey said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was not my intention to take part in this debate until I read the views of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means, in which report the following language was used:

As late as the 19th of January the chairman of this committee [Mr. PAYNE] declared by the introduction of House bill 6883, to which the pending bill is offered as a substitute, against the policy of this bill and in favor of free trade between the United States and Puerto Rico.

Now, will the gentleman from New York answer my question? Is it true that you introduced such a bill?

Mr. PAYNE. The files of the house will show. I think it was about the 19th.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. I am not asking about the date, but as to whether a bill of that character was introduced by the gentleman.

Mr. PAYNE. I introduced a bill for a tariff on goods imported from foreign ports into Puerto Rico, and by implication made it free between Puerto Rico and the United States, and also extending the internal-revenue laws to Puerto Rico.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. In this minority report it is stated, "We do not know why these sudden changes have occurred." Will the gentleman state why the changes have occurred?

Mr. PAYNE. "The gentleman" explained that fully in his remarks, which the gentleman from New Jersey can read in the RECORD.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. I have looked at the RECORD and have read your speech, and find no explicit statement of the causes that led to this change. I find nothing in the RECORD explaining that.

Mr. PAYNE. I am very sorry I did not get myself up and down to the comprehension of my friend. I had hoped, however, to do it.

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. I may be obtuse, but I do not think I am. The explanation is just about as satisfactory as those given by the members on your side of the House when a query is propounded. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman from New Jersey permit a question?

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. In your opinion as a lawyer, do you believe this bill constitutional?

Mr. DALY of New Jersey. I do not think I have risen to the height of a constitutional lawyer, but I certainly rank as high as some of the gentlemen who have discussed this question on the other side of the House. I believe the provisions of this bill are unconstitutional. [Applause.] Of course, it might require an extensive argument to convince either the minority or the majority of this House, but nevertheless I believe it is unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, by virtue of the Constitution of the United States the President is vested with that high and important prerogative to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. In line with that constitutional requirement, he, on the opening of the present Congress, made this pleading and touching suggestion for our guidance:

It must be borne in mind that since its cession Puerto Rico has been denied the principal markets she has long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under Spanish sovereignty. The markets of Spain are closed to her products except upon terms to which the commerce of all nations is subjected. The island of Cuba, which used to buy her cattle and tobacco without custom duties, now imposes the same duties upon her products as upon those from any other country entering her ports. She has, therefore, lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba without any compensating benefits in our market. Her coffee is little known and not in use by our people, and therefore there is no demand here for it. It is one of her chief products. The markets of the United States should be opened to Puerto Rican products. Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets.

In pursuance of the recommendation of the Executive, the Committee on Ways and Means reported to this House, as admitted by the gentleman from New York, a bill providing for absolute free trade with the island of Puerto Rico, and again, on the 24th of the same month, this same committee reported another bill to "regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, etc.," and among its provisions is found:

That on and after the passage of this act the same tariff customs and duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported into Puerto Rico from ports other than those of the United States which are required by law to be collected upon articles imported into the United States from foreign countries.

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act all merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico and coming into Puerto Rico from the United States shall be entered at the several ports of entry upon payment of 25 per cent of the duties which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries, and in addition thereto, upon articles of merchandise of Puerto Rican manufacture coming into the United States, customs duties equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax which may be imposed in the United States upon the same articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture, and upon articles of the United States manufacture coming into Puerto Rico, customs duties equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax which may be imposed in Puerto Rico upon the same articles of Puerto Rican manufacture.

In the language of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS]—

It does not provide for free trade between the islands and the United States, but fixes the rate of duty that shall be paid on all imports from Puerto Rico into the United States at 25 per cent of the duties charged on like articles from other foreign ports, and provides also that all articles imported into Puerto Rico from the United States shall only pay 25 per cent of the rate of duty imposed there upon like articles from other foreign countries, with this proviso: That on all articles imported from Puerto Rico into the United States, where internal-revenue duty is imposed in this country, that the custom duty shall be 25 per cent of the duty imposed on like articles from foreign countries plus the revenue tax levied and collected on the articles produced or manufactured in this country. It will thus be seen that under this bill the question is presented as to whether Puerto Rico and the Philippine Islands, under the treaty of peace entered into between this Government and Spain, become integral parts of the United States, or whether they can be treated as territory and separate and distinct custom laws and internal-revenue laws imposed there from what are levied, collected, and paid in the United States.

The attempt to impose this law upon the people of Puerto Rico is a departure by the Government from its recognized policy in dealing with newly acquired possessions since the date of the adoption of the Federal Constitution; in other words, since this country acquired its first territory outside of the original thirteen States. The policy proposed is foreign to the principles that have ever governed our country. Methinks that if a proposition had been made to levy a duty upon the products of the new acquisitions of Louisiana or Florida or Texas, it would have been impressed upon those who made the proposition that they were not free from guilt of treasonable utterance.

In the whole history of our country and its acquisitions it has never been suggested to the present time that this Constitution of ours was not intended for new acquired possessions as well as for the States. We insist that Puerto Rico is a part of and belongs to the United States, that no discriminating duty can be levied against her productions imported into the States, and that the Congress of the United States can not legislate against Puerto Rico any more than against the State of New Jersey in favor of New York.

Clearly Chief Justice Marshall was of the opinion that Territories have constitutional rights and are entitled to protection with other portions of the United States. In the case of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, page 319) this distinguished lawyer laid down the following proposition:

The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" for the purpose thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words, which modify the grant. These words are: "But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend.

The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised, throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania, and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises shall be observed in the one than the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

Upon the opinion of this great jurist we might rest our case with safety. Age commands for it veneration. Its reasoning is in harmony with the spirit of our institutions. But I go further and make my proposition impregnable by reference to a line of decisions which reaffirm the principles there enunciated.

Mr. Justice Brewer, in the case of Fong Yue Ting vs. United States (149 U. S., 738), in a dissenting opinion, said:

The Constitution has potency everywhere within the limits of our territory, and the powers which the National Government may exercise within such limits are those and only those given it by that instrument.

In the case of United States vs. More (3 Cranch, 160) Chief Justice Marshall laid down this proposition:

The Constitution was made for every citizen of the United States, and there is no citizen, whatever his condition, or wherever he may be, within the territory of the United States who has not a right to its protection.

In the decision in the Dred Scott case, reported in 19 Howard, 393, Chief Justice Taney declared:

The power of Congress over the person and property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our Constitution and form of government. The power of the Government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the Constitution itself. And when territory becomes a part of the United States the Federal Government enters into possession in the character impressed upon it by those who created it. It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it can not when it enters a Territory of the United States put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the Constitution has denied to it. It can not create for itself a new character separated from the citizens of the United States and the duties it owes them under the provisions of the Constitution. The territory being part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out, and the Federal Government can exercise no power beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved. * * *

In Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 346) Justice Harlan said:

That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

In Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S., 15) the court says:

The people of the United States, as sovereign owners of the national Territories, have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of the Government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms.

The force of these decisions exemplify the proposition that in legislating for the newly acquired territory Congress must be guided by the Constitution.

All the territory of the Union is the common property of all of the States. Every member—new and old—of the Union, admitted to partnership under the Constitution, has a perfect right to enjoy the territory which is the common property of all. Some of the property heretofore acquired, now States, was obtained by treaty with England, much of it by cession from other nations, and other by treaties with the Indians; still larger areas were acquired by purchase from Spain, France, and Russia, and paid for with money drawn through customs duties and taxes imposed upon the citizens of all of the States; large tracts were secured by the annexation of Texas, and the late war has added Puerto Rico and other properties, since which acquisitions these vast territories have been entered by the citizens of the United States and by those of Europe who choose to migrate thither, and no citizen of the United States was debarred from moving there with his property and enjoying the liberties guaranteed by the Constitution.

It is an astounding and monstrous proposition to suggest that one of our citizens, migrating to this new Puerto Rican territory acquired by our Government, shall enjoy there fewer privileges or have more burdens placed upon him than those enjoyed and borne by our fathers in the days of former territorial acquisition, and this in face of the constitutional provision that "duties, imposts, and excises should be uniform throughout the United States." The edict laid down by the Constitution that all men were equal and that no one part of our citizens, no matter in what part of the territory they should live, should stand in a position of vassalage to the Federal Government is as good to-day as when enunciated.

The distinguished gentlemen on the other side who have argued this proposition have declared that the provision of the Constitution that Congress shall have the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting territory, etc., invested them with plenary powers to legislate for such territory. It has never been denied on this side of the Chamber that the power was vested in Congress to legislate for the Territories, nor has it ever been questioned that Congress had the right to establish a permanent form of government; but we have always insisted that that power must be exercised according to the spirit of the Constitution. It can not be said with constitutional sanction that Congress can establish a little kingdom and give some one unlimited control over the people of that territory, and this for the plain reason that such an act would be repugnant to the intent and spirit of the Constitution.

The Constitution affords all necessary and needful authority for the proper legislation and rule of the Territories. The Constitution gives Congress power to legislate for the Territories in those matters which are of pressing importance, such as establishing courts of justice, providing means for local Territorial government, and the establishment of a system to pave the way to admit such territory into the United States. The Territories belonging to us are not dependencies, such as Australia and the Indies are to England, nor can any territory ever be acquired by us be such, for the superstructure upon which this Government rests is antagonistic to any theory looking toward dependencies or a colonial system. What we have are, and what we may acquire will be, integral parts of this country, entitled to take position alongside of the existing States as soon as they shall have sufficient population and other requisites of political existence. The Constitution intended to guarantee to each and every citizen of the Union the right to live and enjoy his property in any part of the Territory which he might select for his residence, and the imposition of discriminating burdens upon any class is clearly unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, I will not attempt to longer traverse the ground that has been so ably covered by the gentlemen who have preceded me, but aside from the constitutional question, I will, for a few moments, speak of the moral side.

The President in his message appealed for free trade, not from a constitutional standpoint, but from one equally as high, that justice be done these people; that they being a part of the autonomy of this country our gates should be open to them that they might enjoy the blessings of free trade between the people of one great country. He spoke of the markets of Spain being closed against her, and that she had lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba without any compensating benefits in our markets; that her coffee was little known and used by our people; and then with an ennobling sentiment declared, "It is our plain duty to abolish customs and tariffs and give her products free access to our markets."

This was a sentiment that should come from the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, and it indicated a spirit that was consonant with our institutions. Her fair fields had been swept by a hurricane, and his suggestions were in line with the feelings of a statesman and a patriot. The Secretary of War, too, viewed the conditions from a humanatarian standpoint, and rose to the height of the occasion and the dignity of the office he occupied when he pleaded that free trade be granted this beautiful isle of the sea. How touching when he says:

> They are left in hunger and absolute poverty; they will be discontented, intractable, and mutinous. The highest consideration of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectation of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Puerto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States, and that we should treat the interests of this people as our own; and I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between the people of Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

Again:

> Their products are, in the main, coffee, sugar, and tobacco. The prosperity of the island depends upon their success in selling these articles, and I most strongly urge that the customs duties between Puerto Rico and the United States be removed.

Aye, too, the great merchants' association of New York pleaded from the same standpoint that trade be opened up between them, and importuned the Congress of the United States to grant the request of the President. The people of the island ask not for charity; ask not for aid that they may rise from the ruins and devastation which are the result of the storm that swept over their land; but say, Give us free trade, give us local government, and we will become fit citizens of the great Republic to which through an accident of war we have allied our faith.

For these humane and moral reasons suggested by the President, the Secretary of War, the merchants, and the people of Puerto Rico, I ask that this bill become not a law.

Mr. Chairman, I am done. We can not afford to strike down the Constitution; we can not afford to violate the duty which by the ties of humanity and justice we owe these people. If this bill becomes a law, it will violate both, and the wrath of a liberty-loving people will certainly be visited upon your party.

Revenue for Puerto Rico.

It seeks not to hinder and oppress, but to help and bless.

OF

HON. JAMES T. McCLEARY,

OF MINNESOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. McCLEARY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: A problem well stated is half solved. What is the problem now demanding solution?

As the result of a war entered upon with the loftiest purposes and at the practically unanimous demand of the American people without regard to section, party, or creed, we find ourselves in possession of Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and other islands. These possessions bring to us new privileges and new responsibilities. These must be met in a spirit worthy of a great people.

THE PRESENT PROBLEM STATED.

With the transfer of Puerto Rico to the United States its former market in Spain was, of course, made less accessible. To add to its troubles a hurricane recently swept over the island, destroying many of the plantations. The people of Puerto Rico are in urgent need of relief. They need money and they need it at once!

Puerto Rico touches an especially tender place in the American heart. The island is small, being only about 80 miles long by about 40 wide. In the late war its people not only offered us no resistance but welcomed our soldiers with glad acclaim. They looked upon us and treated us as friends and deliverers. So their present need appeals strongly to the natural chivalry of the American people.

The present problem, then, is how to render the Puerto Ricans assistance most promptly and efficiently, with best results to them and with least embarrassment to the nation in the future.

My own first impression was that, of course, the kindest and best thing to do would be to proceed immediately to extend to Puerto Rico our fiscal system, giving her free access to our markets. But upon further investigation of the situation I have become satisfied that to give her immediate free trade would be to "keep the word of promise to the ear but break it to the hope."

THE ALTERNATIVES CONSIDERED.

Extending to Puerto Rico our fiscal system would indeed free the people there from tariff duties between them and us, but it would necessarily at the same time impose upon them our internal-revenue system. This would give them a system of taxation to which they are largely unaccustomed, and which at the present time would bear very heavily upon them, especially upon the poor. We must remember that in Puerto Rico there are operated in many of the homes of the poor people little cigar factories and other small industries, on which our internal-revenue system would be a burden almost intolerable. The importance of this fact in relation to the question at issue, Mr. Chairman, can hardly be overestimated. In fact, it should of itself practically decide the question.

Moreover, in the transition state from Spain's control to ours, having only a temporary military government, Puerto Rico lacks the machinery for laying and collecting taxes. And further, and most important, much time would necessarily be consumed before the required money could be available.

In view of these facts, the present urgent need would have to be met either by an appropriation out of our National Treasury or by an insular loan.

If it were necessary, I have no doubt that the people of the United States would cheerfully contribute as a national gift whatever might be required to relieve the suffering of the island. But if the present need can be met in some other and better way, it seems wise not to establish what might prove to be a bad precedent.

A very large majority of the people of Puerto Rico are badly in debt. Their plantations have been devastated by a hurricane. Their property is mortgaged. But the island itself has come to us from under the rule of Spain without a public debt. To be sure, it has few public improvements, much as it needs them. But it would hardly comport with our ideas of desirable action to signalize the beginning of our control by having the island plunge into debt and issue bonds.

Immediate free trade, then, necessarily implies great present hardship to the people. It would also necessitate either a gift from the National Treasury or a bonded debt for the island. The former would be humiliating to Puerto Rico, the latter to us.

The other alternative is that embodied in the pending bill. What is it? It is essentially this: To reduce the present tariff rates on goods carried between Puerto Rico and the United States by 85 per cent—that is, to charge only 15 per cent of the present rates—and turn over to Puerto Rico the entire proceeds of the collections at both ends of the line for the use and benefit of her people. Every other provision in the bill is inserted simply to protect the people of the United States from having their generosity abused by people for whose benefit it was not intended.

WHO WILL PAY THE MONEY?

Who will pay this money? Not the poor among the people of Puerto Rico. Not the small planters. Indeed, only part of it will be paid at all by inhabitants of Puerto Rico. Part of it will be paid by persons who sell goods to Puerto Rico and reap the profit of that trade.

The principal exports of Puerto Rico, in the order of importance, are coffee, sugar, and tobacco. In ordinary years coffee is by far the most important, being about three-fourths of the total export. Coffee is on the free list now and remains so under the pending bill.

As to the other two crops, it is important to remember that they are not now owned by the planters. They have been sold and are now in warehouses waiting to be shipped. It is important to remember also that the Dingley tariff law is still in operation between Puerto Rico and the United States as to goods coming into the United States.

When the shrewd brokers and exporters of Puerto Rico who now have these crops in their warehouses bought them from the farmers, they of course paid the farmers only such prices as would enable them to export the crops at a profit even under the full Dingley rates. We hold it, therefore, neither a hardship nor an injustice to these men, under such circumstances, to require them when exporting those crops to the United States to pay to Uncle Sam, as trustee, a part of the Dingley rates, the proceeds to be sent back to Puerto Rico for the benefit of the farmers from whom the crops were originally bought. This is practically a refund to those farmers of a part of that which they themselves in fact originally contributed.

Those who are urging immediate free trade are, unconsciously and with the best of intentions in most cases, urging a course which would enable these speculators to add to their profits the full Dingley tariff; urging a course under which none of these profits would be refunded to the people of Puerto Rico. This is what the Puerto Rican lobby now in Washington seem to want.

Already, under the pressure of widespread demand, the very reasonable amount of 25 per cent reserved in the original bill to be sent back to the people of Puerto Rico has been cut down to 15 per cent. I hope and trust that this House will have the courage to preserve at least this 15 per cent for the poor people in Puerto Rico, who have no lobby here and no money with which to send anyone to look after their interests.

Personally I would have preferred to leave the rate at 25 per cent of the present rates, as originally provided in the bill, or to fix even a higher rate for this year, because that would have given an income more nearly adequate to the needs of the island. I have some fear that the revenue produced by the rate prescribed in the bill as amended will not prove sufficient.

It is hoped and expected that if this bill becomes a law the reduction in the tariff rates will induce prompt selling of the crops now in the warehouses, and that thus will promptly be secured the means with which to relieve the suffering in Puerto Rico.

WHAT WILL BE DONE WITH THE MONEY?

Under section 4 of the bill, every dollar collected, not only that collected in Puerto Rico itself but also that collected here on goods coming from that island, will be put into a separate fund for the sole benefit of Puerto Rico. How will it be used? In the building of roads and schoolhouses and other public improvements, and in such other ways as in the discretion of the President may seem wise and kind. How will this afford the help now needed? Many of the people will find direct employment in the construction of these improvements. These people will thus have the means with which to buy food and other necessaries, the demand for which will give employment to other people; and so the beneficent work will go on, touching and helping all the people, renewing their courage and giving them strength.

Even this necessarily brief review of the case will, I think, show that the pending measure is the kindest of the courses open to us for helping the suffering Puerto Ricans. I believe that it is also the wisest, whether considered in its immediate consequences or in its ultimate effect.

BRIEF ANALYSIS OF THE BILL.

Turning now, for a moment, to the text of the bill itself, a copy of which I shall append to my remarks, we note that the preamble states the purpose of the bill. Section 1 defines the territory to which the bill applies. Section 2 provides that on goods carried to Puerto Rico from countries other than the United States the same duties shall be paid as would be paid if the goods were brought to the United States, the object being to prevent foreigners from evading our revenue laws by bringing goods here via Puerto Rico. Section 3 is intended to prevent the evasion of our internal-revenue laws by the transfer from the United States to Puerto Rico of industries upon which internal revenue is here required to be paid. Section 4 provides that all revenue collected in the operation of the bill shall inure to the benefit of Puerto Rico. And section 5 fixes the utmost limit of time in which the provisions of the bill shall be effective.

A TEMPORARY MEASURE.

As is shown by the preamble and by section 5 of the bill, it is merely a temporary expedient to meet a present emergency. It is not to remain in force after March 1, 1902, at the latest. Before that time shall have come it is expected that a plan of civil government for Puerto Rico will have been devised, generous in its aims and suitable in its provisions. I see no reason to doubt that among those provisions will be one for free trade with the United States. It is hoped and expected that by that time the condition of Puerto Rico will be so much improved as to make that the kind and safe policy to be pursued.

The question, then, is not in any sense whether Puerto Rico shall have free trade with the United States, but whether, under the circumstances, it is best for her to have it immediately. The committee especially charged with framing this legislation believes the proposed temporary arrangement to be both kinder and safer than immediate free trade, and in that opinion I concur.

As 15 per cent of the average Dingley rate is only about 6 per cent ad valorem, and as all the money collected under this bill is to be used for the benefit of Puerto Rico, it will be seen that the rate is not for protection but for revenue, and that in spirit the bill is in entire harmony with the humane recommendation made by the President in his last annual message.

THE "TRUST" CRY.

The cry has gone forth that this bill is favored by the sugar trust and the tobacco trust, and that therefore it should be defeated. Who sent forth that cry? How do those who utter it know that they are telling the truth? Does the fact that some one has started the rumor establish its truthfulness?

It gives me pleasure, sir, to say right here that I do not believe that there is a man on either side of the Chamber who is consciously or intentionally working in the interest of any trust.

The Democratic party has, of course, a very obvious motive in putting forth this "trust" cry. Its foresight and statesmanship are discredited in the eyes of the country. Nothing has happened which in 1896 it declared to be inevitable; everything has happened which it declared to be impossible. It finds the country prosperous beyond any former experience, and sees that its only hope of success lies in getting the people to act on impulse rather than on deliberate judgment. Its principal work now is to rock the boat and try to get up a scare. But, sir, it will again find that it has underestimated the intelligence of the American people!

And who can say that the cry is not being urged by agents of the trusts themselves? If men charged with the solemn responsibilities of legislation for this great country are to become stampeded by such a cry, is it not apparent that in any matter in which a trust might really be interested it could easily work its will by creating the impression that it wanted a certain course when in fact it wanted the opposite course? Is it not clear that in that case a timid man could easily be made to play into the hands of the trust? Is it not evident, sir, that one's only safe course is to keep his mind clear and his conscience void of offense, strong in the resolution to do the right as God gives him to see the right?

Now, let us look at this matter and see what reason tells us. What would be the natural position of the sugar trust and the tobacco trust as to immediate free trade with Puerto Rico?

They naturally wish to buy as cheaply as they can. They buy their material in large quantities and no doubt plan to save, so far as possible, all expense for middlemen. They would naturally, therefore, buy their raw material as directly as possible from the producers themselves. It is probable, therefore, that most of the raw sugar and tobacco now in Puerto Rican warehouses belong to the trusts or their brokers. But if they have already bought the sugar and tobacco now in the warehouses of Puerto Rico, it would be manifestly to their interest to have these products admitted to the United States free of duty. In no way that I can see could it be profitable to them to have a tariff on these products. Reason dictates, therefore, that if these trusts have any interest in the matter at all they would naturally favor immediate free trade.

Now, let us see what the record shows. Here on page 32 of the hearings recently had on S. 2264, a bill to provide a government for the island of Puerto Rico, appears the following statement made by General Davis, the military governor of the island:

The American Tobacco Company has lately bought the largest manufactory here, and the new management is understood to be arranging for a larger trade with the United States, the product of manufacture to be in the form of cigarettes.

The American Tobacco Company is, I understand, the organization commonly called the tobacco trust. Since it has bought the largest manufactory in Puerto Rico, it has probably bought also the tobacco crop. If this be true, it has a very evident interest in wiping out the present tariff and securing immediate free trade.

So far, then, Mr. Chairman, as I can discover, both the sugar trust and the tobacco trust, if they have any interest at all in this matter, would naturally favor immediate free trade with Puerto Rico. If so, what more natural thing could they do, knowing the great feeling against trusts in the United States, than to cause to be scattered broadcast the idea that they are against immediate free trade?

THE REAL QUESTION CONSTITUTIONAL.

But, Mr. Chairman, since this debate began the real question at issue has, by the course of the opposition, become a constitutional one. Our opponents are not satisfied to give Puerto Rico free trade on the ground stated by the President, namely, humanity. They contend that the people of Puerto Rico have a constitutional right to free trade with the United States, because, as they contend, the Constitution ex proprio vigore—that is, of its own force, without legislative enactment—extends to all territory belonging to the United States. They seek to make that doctrine popular by shouting that "the Constitution follows the flag." They hope that by using this sugar coating they can get the people of the United States to swallow the pill which a generation and more ago was urged upon them and rejected.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that is the doctrine invented by John C. Calhoun when in 1847–49 he was endeavoring to extend slavery into the territory acquired from Mexico, the doctrine which Daniel Webster so strongly antagonized, the doctrine which was the basis of the Dred Scott decision, the doctrine to oppose which the Republican party was born, the doctrine which Lincoln combated and which the soldiers of the Union shot to pieces on a hundred battlefields, the doctrine which was one of the things surrendered at Appomattox! [Applause.]

Our political opponents, under cover of pretended solicitude for Puerto Rico, would like to galvanize that old doctrine into life again. And why? Because, sir, if they could do that they might hope to thwart our purposes in the Orient, if not absolutely to destroy our whole protective system; because, sir, behind a victory in this House to-day their fancy pictures a victory in the nation next November!

THE CONSEQUENCES OF THE DOCTRINE.

If it be true that by its own force without Congressional enactment the Constitution spreads over all the territory belonging to the United States, it is already in the Philippines. If the Constitution carries with it to Puerto Rico the right to free trade, it carries that right with it to the Philippines also. But by one of the provisions of the treaty of peace recently negotiated with Spain that country is to enjoy in the Philippines for ten years the same trade privileges as the United States enjoys. It follows, therefore, under the doctrine advocated by our opponents, that Spain also is entitled to free trade in the Philippines.

But we have treaties with all the leading nations which guarantee to them in all United States territory trade privileges equal to those enjoyed by the most favored nation. So, under the doctrine of our opponents, all of these nations are entitled to free trade with the Philippines. But if all these nations are entitled to free trade with the Philippines and at the same time the Philippines are entitled to free trade with the United States, it follows logically and inevitably that all the leading nations of the earth are to-day entitled to free trade with the United States via the Philippines. In other words, sir, if the doctrine of our opponents be correct our whole protective tariff system is already undermined. This is the Barmecide feast to which Republicans are invited! Who among us will accept that invitation?

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

It is our contention, sir, that the Constitution is an instrument of government for the Union, which is composed of States, and that the power of Congress over the territories is and ought to be plenary. Congress has never abused that power. It never will. As was said by Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case of Mormon Church vs. United States:

> Doubtless Congress, in legislating for the Territories, would be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are formulated in the Constitution and its amendments; but these limitations would exist rather by inference and the general spirit of the Constitution, from which Congress derives all its powers, than by any express or direct application of its provisions.

That spirit will direct our deliberations and guide our actions. Congress will protect the rights of all the inhabitants of our territory to religious and personal liberty, and will justify always the proud boast that "Freedom follows the flag!" [Applause.]

Across the main aisle, sir, I see our political opponents standing in solid phalanx behind the proposition that the Constitution of its own force extends over all the possessions of the United States. They are hoping anxiously, desperately, that to-day they may in some way secure enough Republican votes to defeat the pending measure. If on this last day of winter they could secure from a Republican House of Representatives apparent legislative sanction for their contention, the morrow's sun which ushers in the spring would indeed rise on a season of hope for them. If the vote which will be taken now in a few minutes should sustain their view, they will in large measure have justified their past and brightened the outlook for their future.

What sophistry can mislead, what threat can intimidate, what flattery can beguile any Republican Representative to give aid and comfort to our opponents at such a time and on such an issue? Let us stand with Daniel Webster against John C. Calhoun, with Abraham Lincoln against Jefferson Davis! When the roll shall be called, let us show our faith that now, as always, the Republican party is thoroughly competent to meet its great responsibilities, abundantly able to guide the nation along the pathway of high and honorable achievement! [Applause.]

CONCLUSION.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not propose a permanent policy for Puerto Rico; it is simply a temporary expedient to meet a present emergency. It does not impose tariff duties on Puerto Rico; on the contrary, it greatly lowers those already in operation. It does not seek to take money from Puerto Rico; on the other hand it aims to assist her to raise, in the way easiest for her, money for her present need. It seeks not to hinder and oppress, but to help and bless. Like the wonder-working and beneficent sun, which from the lakes and the seas takes up moisture which is afterwards deposited in refreshing and life-giving showers upon the parched and thirsty earth, this bill collects from those who are well able to bear the burden, and who at the same time may justly be called upon to do so, the means with which to give employment and hope to the poor and the needy.

There is one kind of statesmanship whose watchword is "popularity." There is another whose watchword is "duty." Mr. Chairman, I have an abiding faith in the might which comes from right, and a similar faith in the sober second sense of the American people.

Imperative demands upon my time in other lines of official duty have deprived me of the opportunity of investigating this subject as fully as I would like. But from the information that I have been able to gather in an earnest effort to learn the truth I sincerely believe that, all things considered, the pending measure is the wisest and kindest of the courses open to us. I shall therefore vote for the bill, with the hope that it may speedily be enacted into law, to the end that the Puerto Ricans may at the earliest possible moment have the relief which they so much need. [Applause on the Republican side.]

(TEXT OF THE BILL AS IT PASSED THE HOUSE.)

A bill temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Whereas the people of Puerto Rico have been deprived of markets for a large portion of their products and have lost property and crops by severe and unusual storms, whereby they are impoverished and are unable to pay internal-revenue and direct taxes; and

Whereas temporary revenue is necessary for their schools, their roads, and their internal improvements, and the administration of their government: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of this act shall apply to the island of Puerto Rico and to the adjacent islands and waters of the islands lying east of the seventy-fourth meridian of longitude west of Greenwich, which was ceded to the United States by the Government of Spain by treaty concluded April 11, 1899; and the name Puerto Rico, as used in this act, shall be held to include not only the island of that name, but all the adjacent islands as aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act the same tariffs, customs, and duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all articles imported into Puerto Rico from ports other than those of the United States which are required by law to be collected upon articles imported into the United States from foreign countries.

SEC. 3. That on and after the passage of this act all merchandise coming into the United States from Puerto Rico and coming into Puerto Rico from the United States shall be entered at the several ports of entry upon payment of 15 per cent of the duties which are required to be levied, collected, and paid upon like articles of merchandise imported from foreign countries; and in addition thereto upon articles of merchandise of Puerto Rican manufacture coming into the United States and withdrawn for consumption or sale upon payment of a tax equal to the internal-revenue tax imposed in the United States upon the like articles of merchandise of domestic manufacture; such tax to be paid by internal-revenue stamp or stamps to be purchased and provided by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and to be procured from the collector of internal revenue at or most convenient to the port of entry of said merchandise in the United States, and to be affixed under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe; and on all articles of merchandise of United States manufacture coming into Puerto Rico, in addition to the duty above provided, upon payment of a tax equal in rate and amount to the internal-revenue tax imposed in Puerto Rico upon the like articles of Puerto Rican manufacture.

SEC. 4. That the duties and taxes collected in Puerto Rico in pursuance of this act, less the cost of collecting the same, and the gross amount of all collections of duties and taxes in the United States upon articles of merchandise coming from Puerto Rico, shall not be covered into the general fund of the Treasury, but shall be held as a separate fund, and shall be placed at the disposal of the President to be used for the government and benefit of Puerto Rico until otherwise provided by law.

SEC. 5. This act shall be taken and held to be provisional in its purposes and intended to meet a pressing present need for revenue for the island of Puerto Rico, and shall not continue in force after the 1st day of March, 1902.

The Puerto Rico Tariff.

REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD WAYNE PARKER,
OF NEW JERSEY.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey submitted the following in extension of his remarks:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is a subject of amazement to find that we are thought by some to be working against the interests of Puerto Rico when we give her the benefit of a tariff even as against ourselves to provide Territorial revenue and some measure of protection to her own industries. This measure is one that is dictated by world-wide experience. England has given to almost all her colonies the right to impose such a tariff. Australia and Canada have insisted upon making such tariff protective. The schedule which I annex as part of my remarks shows the large proportion of revenue which was raised by customs in 1896 in a number of English colonies. Of course, in many of these colonies the tariff was laid for revenue only, and so as to favor English productions. But in Australia and Canada these tariffs are distinctly for the benefit of their own industries; and they are the most successful of all, most loyal to the country of which they are the territory, most happy and contented.

On the other hand, where duties are laid merely for revenue, or the taxes are raised mostly by excise or land tax, they have been reduced to a purely agricultural condition, and there is the utmost discontent. Examples of this are found in the Cape of Good Hope and in India. We may almost appeal to Ireland as a like example. It is acknowledged to be generous for England to allow her colonies to raise their revenue by duties. But by this bill we do more than England ever did, and give much more than Canada ever had; for we give to Puerto Rico a preference in our own markets over every other country to the extent of 85 per cent of the Dingley tariff, while we allow her to raise a revenue by placing a small duty even on our own productions.

The small duty which is put upon what she sends to us is nothing but an export tax on her behalf, for it goes back to her; and this export tax on agricultural products is really such a land tax as is raised in every Territory for local purposes, but will be paid much more easily, without the expense or difficulties which attend the assessment and collection of a land tax. The law is exactly the same in its effect as if Puerto Rico had a Territorial government and had exercised a privilege to levy import and export duties on goods sent to us, and obtained from us, to the same per cent of the Dingley tariff. If she had a Territorial government now, and we should give the privilege, she would certainly find it to her advantage to exercise it.

The fact that these duties are for her local and Territorial benefit is the key likewise to the constitutional questions. A local territorial tax for the benefit of the Territory is subject to no rules of uniformity, such as govern taxes laid for United States purposes.

When the Constitution was adopted, it was agreed by all that it was only fair that the States should contribute to the general expenses of the General Government by some uniform law, and hence it was provided by the Constitution that Congress should have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" for general purposes—that is to say, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." But in order to see that no State was unfairly treated, the section proceeded:

> But all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

And further:

> No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken.

These taxes so provided for, and which must be uniform, are United States taxes for United States purposes.

Local taxes for Territorial purposes can not be uniform any more than those of a State, but are measured and adjusted according to the needs of the Territory. Such local taxes are not levied under the section above mentioned, but under the further power given by the Constitution to govern each Territory for its own benefit. If local Territorial taxes for local purposes were to be uniform throughout the United States, the Territory could not put taxes upon its lands unless the same taxes were laid throughout the United States. If Territorial excises must be uniform throughout the United States, neither the District of Columbia nor the Territories of Arizona, Oklahoma, or New Mexico could lay any excise upon a saloon license unless the same excise were imposed throughout the United States.

The District and the Territories have always laid these excises without objection, because they were local and for local purposes and not a general excise for general purposes. In like manner local duties, whether export or import, for the local purposes of the Territory, can be imposed so as to give local revenue and to save, in this case, the prosperity of the island of Puerto Rico. The requirement of general uniformity as to duties, imposts, and excises is just as strong as to imposts and excises as it is with reference to duties. All three of them must be uniform for money that goes into the United States Treasury; neither of them need be uniform as to money which goes into the local treasury. Loughborough vs. Blake, and all the cases cited, were, as to general taxes, etc., imposed for the general purposes of the General Government. There is not a case that holds that Territorial duties, imposts, and excises can not be imposed for Territorial purposes, as is the case here.

It is amazing to hear so much argument as to other questions not involved in this bill, the great questions as to whether the guaranties of human liberty are not carried by the Constitution wherever the United States has sway. Many of them are expressly so carried. All think that the great principles of liberty go with any dominion of the United States. But these are different and greater questions than those of local taxation. If need be, I believe that the United States can protect itself from the immigration of Chinese from the Philippines just as it does from China itself, and just as it now segregates an Indian tribe. But this bill raises no such question. It is a measure to provide local revenue for Puerto Rico, while it opens to that island a preference in our own markets and gives a preference in their market to ourselves, and at the same time protects their own local trades from a competition which would certainly be hurtful if too suddenly introduced.

Some measure to relieve this island must be adopted, and now. Better free trade than to leave things as they are. But better yet to give to the island some local independence and the power to raise necessary revenue without oppressing these people.

The Puerto Rico Tariff.

SPEECH
OF
HON. WILLIAM ASTOR CHANLER,
OF NEW YORK.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, February 28, 1900.

On the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANLER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: This bill is manifestly an unfair one. From the Puerto Rican point of view the island enjoyed a full measure of autonomy, enjoyed nearly unrestricted suffrage, had her markets in Spain and Cuba, when in the war for humanity we invaded the country, cut off the Spanish and Cuban markets, which now charge duties on Puerto Rican products. In return we have not opened our own markets as we did in the case of California, New Mexico, and all other territory formerly acquired by cession consequent to a war or by purchase.

In the cases of California and New Mexico the Administration declared that from the moment of interchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace with Mexico the territory became part of the United States, and our revenue laws were extended to it. This view of the Polk Administration was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Cross vs. Harrison. It is now sought to distinguish the case of Puerto Rico from that of California because of the phraseology of the treaty of Paris, but the real motive is that certain interests desire to place a protective tariff, like a Chinese wall, around our country, as it existed before intervention.

In order to hide the real motive the assertion is made that the people are not yet capable of being given a Territorial government. The real objection is that if we declare a full-fledged Territory, free interchange of commodities with the rest of the Union would follow without further legislation.

As for the question of self-government, Spain had accorded it to Puerto Rico; and is this great liberating and liberal Republic going to deprive a people of rights and privileges accorded them by monarchical Spain? Are we now going to uphold the principle of nonrepresentation? In our hearts we may be afraid that in giving the Puerto Ricans full American citizenship we may have to do the same with the Filipinos, and so the Puerto Ricans must suffer—the loyal Puerto Ricans can hope for no more consideration than the rebellious Filipinos. Such is the reward of virtue.

Coming back to the tariff question, Puerto Rico is a purely agricultural country, and when we deprive them of their markets we are starving the Puerto Ricans to death. Nothing can make the island flourish but free trade with the United States. To-day a workman earns 50 cents in Puerto Rican money, equivalent to 30 cents in United States money. Nearly everything but the products of his own soil is taxed in the custom-house. The planters can not and will not raise the daily wage unless with the advantages of free trade they are enabled to sell their products in the United States.

There is in the island, especially since the hurricane, a general feeling of utter hopelessness. We never hesitate in our tariff revisions to protect one section of our country, even though another would object, provided it was for the general good. Why should we ruin a loyal, friendly people because they, too, produce tobacco and sugar, and because some producers in another section of the Union object for selfish motives? The general welfare will not suffer by free trade with the island, and the island will become the richest section of the United States. Besides, we will be saved the spectacle of crushing a million people to the dust so that a handful of sugar and tobacco planters may be content.

What great hopes we hold out to the Filipinos! What a reward for their acceptance of American rule!

On the whole, it is not so much a question of fact as a question of principle. Putting ourselves in the place of the inhabitants of Puerto Rico we would do everything but fight to become vested with the rights of citizenship, and perhaps we might even be driven further by necessity.

At all events we must be prepared for strifes and all sorts of trouble in the island, disloyalty and professional pauperism, unless we take down the "Chinese wall."

The Loud Bill.

SPEECH
OF
HON AMOS J. CUMMINGS,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, March 22, 1900.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 6071) to amend the postal laws relative to second-class mail matter—

Mr. CUMMINGS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: This is the fourth time this bill has appeared in the House of Representatives. I have opposed it every time in the interest of every man, woman, and child enjoying the blessings of cheap literature. It is a blow at every typesetter, every bookbinder, every stitcher, every papermaker, every stereotyper, and every feeder and pressman employed in New York and other cities of this Union. It ought to be the policy of the Government to increase rather than decrease labor. The passage of this bill will throw thousands out of employment and prove of no advantage to the Government.

I was surprised at the attack made upon my friend, F. M. Lupton, on the floor of this House. He has been called a lobbyist, and is hauled over the coals here for daring to send to members of the House circulars explaining the situation so far as it affects his own business and that of other publishers. I look upon Mr. Lupton as a public benefactor. He has printed an edition of the works of Charles Dickens in twelve volumes, which were sold for 48 cents in this country and in Canada. This was done under the rates prescribed for second-class mail matter. He himself says that if you pass this bill the price of these books will go up over 200 per cent. This 200 per cent is to be taken from the pockets of farmers and others whose children throughout the country buy this cheap literature.

Mr. Lupton sold David Copperfield at 3 cents a copy delivered at any town in the Union, and the works of Thackeray, Bulwer, and others at 4 cents apiece. These are prices that will be wiped out by the passage of this bill. Those who have denounced Mr. Lupton for his earnest protest ought to have answered his arguments against the passage of the bill. Manufacturers of all kinds are daily appealing in circular letters to Congressmen for relief.

Some want the beer tax removed; others are aggrieved because alcohol is not free; druggists complain of the war tax; shipbuilders are opposed to the proposed eight-hour law; yet no one has had the hardihood to denounce them as lobbyists because they are defending their own interests. Let us see what Mr. Lupton says concerning the Loud bill:

SOME REASONS WHY THE LOUD BILL SHOULD NOT PASS.

I submit the following reasons why the bill relating to second-class mail matter (H. R. 6071), introduced by Mr. LOUD, should not become a law:

1. As to "books and reprints of books:" Up to the year 1876 cheap books, as they exist to-day, were unknown. In catalogues of that time I find standard works in paper covers, noncopyright, by such authors as Dickens, Bulwer, and Thackeray, listed at $1 each. The same works can be bought to-day for 10 cents per volume. The first move in the direction of cheap books for the masses was made by Donnelly, Lloyd & Co., of Chicago, who issued in 1876 a publication known as The Lakeside Library, a reprint of standard novels and other works in pamphlet form, at from 10 to 20 cents per volume. This was followed in 1877 by The Seaside Library, issued by Mr. George Munro, in New York, and later by The Franklin Square Library, issued by Messrs. Harper & Brothers. This was the beginning of popular low-priced literature of the better class.

From its inception the necessity of the periodical rate of postage was recognized, and the Post-Office Department, appreciating the educational value of these serials, almost immediately admitted them to the mails as second-class matter. This action on the part of the Department gave to the work the stimulus and encouragement it required, and as a result almost every important work of fiction and of science has been issued in low-priced editions and made available to persons of the most humble circumstances, residing in the most remote and sparsely settled localities.

By reason of the fact that I have been permitted to mail these publications as second-class matter, I have been enabled to sell a set of Dickens's works in 12 volumes for 48 cents (4 cents per volume), delivering the same, at this low cost, at any post-office in the United States or Canada. I have likewise sold certain of the works of Bulwer, Scott, Thackeray, Hawthorne, and George Eliot at 3 cents each. For this I claim no credit, although my work is often commended by customers and others.

I am not engaged in philanthropic work. I publish these books at these low prices because it pays me to do so, and I merely quote these instances to show what has been and is being done in the dissemination of literature of the better class among the masses of the people solely by reason of the low rate of postage that has prevailed. That such literature can not be sold to the public at the present or even double the present prices should the Loud bill become a law will be readily understood when the fact is appreciated that the increase in the rate of postage of from 1 cent to 8 cents per pound, contemplated by the bill, is more than the present total cost of this literature, delivery charges included.

If the object of the Government in carrying second-class matter at the low rate that has been accorded to it is the education of the masses—and there can be no other object—what class of literature has a greater educational value than the works of the standard authors—works of permanent value as distinguished from those merely ephemeral in character?

The principal ground upon which this feature of the bill is urged is that so-called pernicious literature obtains admission to the mails under the operation of the present law; therefore, it is proposed to crush both good and bad in order to get rid of the bad.

A more absurd proposition could scarcely be conceived. If it is desirable to legislate against pernicious literature it is quite simple and easy to do so, and there is no need of sweeping along with it all that is good and manifestly beneficial. As well pass a law to exclude all weekly newspapers from the second-class rate of postage because we now admit Police Gazettes and others that are considered, and probably are, demoralizing.

But I will go further and attempt to show that the language of the bill, while excluding the better class of literature, still permits the objectionable class to enjoy the second-class privilege. That which is termed the objectionable class by the advocates of the bill, and which they appear to be so anxious to exclude, consists of the detective and Indian stories published in what are called "Boys' Libraries." These publications are neither "books nor reprints of books." It is true they contain a complete story, but these stories are either original or a reprint from one of the so-called "boys' papers." They are in no sense "reprints of books." They are not books, for they have neither the form, shape, or character of books.

Hence, while Pilgrim's Progress, David Copperfield, and The Virginians, being both "books and reprints of books," are excluded, Deadwood Dick and The Boy Detective, being neither the one nor the other, may be allowed to pass. They may be excluded by arbitrary ruling of the Department, but the language of the bill does not exclude them.

2. As to sample copies: The exclusion of sample copies is urged by the promoters of the measure upon two grounds only: First, that the service is being abused under existing law, and, second, that such exclusion would be in the line of economy, tending to reduce the deficit in the postal revenue.

Anyone who will study the present law and the rulings of the Department will readily see that ample remedy is provided for any abuse of the sample-copy privilege. "After a publication has been admitted to the second-class rate," says one of the rulings, "the continuous mailing of sample copies in numbers exceeding the issue to regular subscribers will be deemed evidence that the publication is primarily designed for advertising."

Here is ample remedy already upon the statute books and only requiring enforcement for every abuse that is complained of. Why, then, is it necessary to exclude sample copies altogether, making it almost impossible for a new publication to start and gain a foothold, and depriving legitimate publications of the most valuable means they have of adding to and maintaining their circulations?

But the promoters of the measure say they expect to save the Government several millions of dollars annually by its enactment. They reason that if they can succeed in throwing out so much second-class matter, which, as alleged, is carried at a loss, the Government will be just that much in pocket. They are in the position of a merchant who should reason that he could save so much by discharging half his salesmen, expecting his business to go on just as well without them. Why? Because the class of periodicals that most extensively use the sample-copy privilege are those whose business is transacted almost exclusively by mail.

The publishers of these periodicals receive enormous numbers of letters, and send out vast quantities of circulars, letters, and merchandise, as premiums to their subscribers. Not only that, but these publications are filled with that particular class of advertisements that invite correspondence, and every order received means the mailing of some article of merchandise. This is not true of the class of advertisements that appear in the leading monthly magazines or in the daily and Sunday newspapers, as a comparison will readily show; and yet the magazines and Sunday papers produce the great volume of weight as second-class matter, and their circulation returns to the Government no compensation for the loss thereon, while publications of the other class referred to are comparatively light in weight, and whatever loss there may be upon the carriage of the same is fully offset by the profit upon letters and merchandise that directly or indirectly result from their circulation. Second-class matter of the class referred to is simply a vehicle for the circulation of first and fourth class matter, and it is from these two classes that the Government derives all of its profit.

The loss upon the one is offset by the gain upon the others, and if one is curtailed the other is reduced. So, therefore, by excluding sample copies the only class of periodicals whose business is profitable to the Government is destroyed, while the class that is manifestly unprofitable is retained. At the same time all other expensive and unprofitable branches of the service are continued. It is plain that such legislation could not possibly effect what its promoters claim for it. Instead of producing an increase of revenue, it must inevitably result in a greater deficiency.

3. As to "returns" from news agents. That provision of the bill which increases the rate of postage upon the return of unsold copies of all periodicals from 1 cent to 4 cents per pound is a direct blow at the small news dealer. These men are poor, and their business is small. If deprived of what is known as the "return privilege," their already scanty incomes must be alarmingly curtailed or they must go out of business altogether.

4. As to the separation of second-class matter. The bill gives the Postmaster-General power to compel a publisher to separate second-class matter "into United States mail sacks or bundles, by States, cities, towns, and counties." All large publishers have been and are willing to expedite the work of the postal service by separating second-class matter by States, but the further requirement that the same shall be separated by cities, towns, and counties is calculated to work no small hardship, inflicting upon every publisher the expense of maintaining a miniature post-office.

Such are the principal objections to H. R. 6071 as I view them. I know that the enactment of the measure will result in making good literature less plentiful and much more costly to the public. I do not believe that it will result in any saving to the Government. I fully believe that if second-class matter could be given full credit for the revenue derived from matter of the first and third classes which it indirectly produces, no loss would be shown.

F. M. LUPTON.

Nos. 23, 25, and 27, City Hall place, New York, March 15, 1900.

These are facts, Mr. Speaker, that can not be gainsaid. They speak louder than words. The blow is not only leveled at the news publishers and those who enjoy cheap literature, but it strikes the country newspaper and the news agents. There are at least 75 news agents here in Washington, the most of whom will be driven out of business by the passage of this bill. Many of them are poor women driven out of the thread and needle business by the department stores.

Ten years ago you would find a little thread and needle store on most every block; to-day you may roam the city and not find one. The poor women who have conducted these little stores have become news agents. They sell candy, tobacco, and newspapers. The passage of this bill would prevent the return of the unsold newspaper. It would not be prudent for them to order a specified number of each newspaper and magazine because the unsold copies would remain upon their hands and become a dead loss to them. Under the system as it is to-day they are relieved from this risk.

Now, listen to the protest of T. S. Hoyt, manager of the Northern News Company, in Troy, N. Y. He groups his objections to the bill as follows:

Because it diverts the attention of Congress and the public from the actual causes of the constant deficits in the Department, which have amounted, as made up by Treasury grants since the enactment of the present law, 1873-1899, to $158,895,552.05. The most operative of these causes is the extravagant overpayment for railroad transportation of mails. On every route on which the daily weight is 5,000 pounds and over the Department pays yearly $171 (or $68.40 per ton) per mile for that 5,000 pounds.

Beyond 5,000 pounds the yearly payment is $21.37 per ton for the excess over 5,000 pounds for each mile. This means a difference of $117.57½ on every such mile, such difference amounting, on the more than 64,900 such miles of the last year, less the 20 per cent off for land-grant roads, to more than $7,310,000. Why should there be two prices for the same daily avoirdupois? The elimination of this element alone would extinguish the deficit of last year and leave a surplus of $700,000.

For each daily ton beyond the first 5,000 pounds the railroads are paid a yearly $21.37 per mile. A ton of matter New York-Buffalo costs on the railroad $21.37 multiplied by 440 miles divided by 365—$25.74. The express carries second-class matter over the same route for $10 per ton, which includes collecting and receipting, transportation, and delivery and getting receipt. The express gets for its service less than two-fifths of what the railroad gets for transportation alone of the mails. The express may be slower, and that must be taken into account.

If the railroads received for the mails one-half the price they now get for the excess over 5,000 pounds, it would pay them on as high a scale as their other business. Deducting from the thirty-two millions the railroads are now paid for transportation the seven millions already indicated, and halving the remaining twenty-five millions, we have a reduction of twenty millions.

Because the bill attempts to discourage a most prolific stimulus to first-class matter. Second-class matter, and especially those parts affected by the Loud bill, originate a vast amount of letter writing. If they did not, men would no longer publish them. The deficit of 1899 was $9,610,779.75; that of 1897 was $11,411,779.65. The receipts were, in 1899, $95,021,384.17; those of 1897, $82,065,462.73. This improvement in finances has come from the greatly increased receipts. Second-class matter, paid and free, went up from 365,480,182 pounds in 1897 to 414,044,972 in 1899.

The advance in pounds of second-class matter in the two years was 14 per cent, and that in total receipts 15 per cent. The fall in the price of printing paper has done this by stimulating the numbers and weight of second-class matter, and the Post-Office has raked in the proceeds from increased first-class matter thus created. On whatever this bill would drive out of the mail the Government would lose trade that, under good business management, would be profitable. The first-class matter arising from this source the Post-Office would still get. A certain amount would be discouraged out of existence and with it its quota of first-class matter.

Because it implies what the Postmaster-General boldly asserts. He talks of the "enormous wrongs which have grown up in the perversion and abuse of the privileges accorded by law to second-class matter." The price set for such matter is no more a "privilege" than the price set on first. Whoever sends second or any other class matter through the mails does so by paying the price set by law, as interpreted, as long as that interpretation rules. The price for second-class matter is not a low one. It is double what it need be under common-sense management. Why should Congress discriminate against its own business and discourage what ought to be a source of revenue at half the present price?

Because not only are the descriptions of second-class matter it affects entitled to be carried on paying the price, but they are equally worthy in the intent of that law. The Postmaster-General makes the policy of that law to be to encourage "the dissemination of public intelligence" and "the promotion of enlightening influences." The matter menaced in the Loud bill falls as certainly in this category as that which is called "legitimate."

Because the bill opens the way for espionage and caprice. The Post-Office should have no business with any quality of second-class matter except its weight or the space it occupies. The rulings which the Postmaster-General denounces are the rulings, and are much more in harmony with the law and common sense than those he or this bill would substitute. Endless vexations have arisen in which Post-Office officials have postulated differences where no real difference is.

There is a bill before Congress now to reimburse a publisher more than $30,000 extorted from him under rulings which excluded his publications from pound rates while allowing others of the same kind to travel in the mails unmolested. From such decisions, no matter how unreasonable or capricious, there is practically no appeal. No more star chamber for us, if you please.

The railroad incubus. How is it that Congress allows and enacts this overpayment for railroad transportation of mails to go on year after year? A little spasmodic outcry is occasionally heard in Congress, but each year the new and larger appropriation goes through, and nothing is done. What is the pull? With the national conventions coming in the early summer, will the postal commission be ready to report in time for Congress to act before adjournment? If not, the old extravagance will probably be reenacted, but on a larger scale.

There should be no tinkering with comparatively minor matters till the question of fair rates for railroad transportation and the gathering in of all second-class matter is settled. Other questions should wait for these. The Postal Commission is now in its second year, and its conclusions are in order. Whether the standard be weight or space, the pay of railroads for transportation should agree with what they receive for similar service in their immensely larger outside business.

He shows that by the passage of this bill you are killing the hen that lays the golden egg. It is actually going to prove a loss to the United States instead of a revenue. His figures show that under the rates for this second-class mail matter the deficit is being lessened each year, and as the years go on, taking the average of the last five years, the Postal Department will be established upon a paying basis in 1903.

This morning I received a circular by mail. If the arguments of some of those who advocate the passage of the bill are correct, this man ought to be horsewhipped for daring to send a circular to a member of Congress. I know that, under the orders of the Postal Department to-day, no letter carrier, no clerk in a post-office, no railway postal clerk is allowed to come to Washington even during his vacation and talk to his member of Congress concerning bills in which he is interested; but the Postal Department itself can always be heard.

At one time, as I am assured, the letter carriers were forbidden to even write to a Representative concerning such matters. The order from the Postal Department forbade it. This circular shows that hogs are carried from Chicago to Philadelphia at $5 per ton. The Loud bill increases the rate of second-class mail matter to $80 per ton. This would make the cost of freight for literature fifteen times as much as that for hogs. Here is the circular:

LITERATURE AND HOGS—AN APPEAL FOR LITERATURE.

The rate for hauling hogs and sample hogs from Chicago to Philadelphia is $5.00 per ton in large or small quantities, one hog deep, and the hogs have to be fed and watered on the way, the sick ones doctored, and the dead ones thrown out. The hogs are weighed in bulk. The distance is a little over 800 miles.

The rate publishers pay for second-class matter—sample copies of newspapers and serial books—is $20 per ton (average postal haul being a little over 800 miles), and the mail bags do not have to be fed or watered, none get sick or die on the way, and may be piled two or three deep.

It is proposed by the Loud bill to increase the rate of the latter class to $80 per ton, over fourteen times as much as hogs and sample hogs pay; each individual piece and fraction of a piece to be stamped; and nothing at all is said in the bill about increasing the rate on hogs or sample hogs, nor of requiring each hog or fraction of a hog or sample hog to be stamped, and there is no difference in the rate between hogs and sample hogs.

Why this partiality for hogs? Why this discrimination against literature? Is it fair, is it right? Upon what glorious principle of honor and patriotism can it be justified? None whatever—it is all wrong. The next step will be to give hogs free passes to go and come anywhere and everywhere, while books and newspapers will not be allowed to travel at all. This is class legislation pure and simple, and therefore inimicable to the Declaration of Independence and antagonistic to the Constitution of the United States. It certainly is.

Seriously, gentlemen, let it not be said of us that we enter the twentieth century as a people who show favors to swine, whatever the breed, but that we love literature better than hogs.

Very truly,

WILMER ATKINSON.

PHILADELPHIA, March 31, 1900.

Here is a letter from the editor of Cheerful Moments, published at 154 East Twenty-third street, New York City:

MARCH 13, 1900.

Hon. AMOS J. CUMMINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We do most respectfully protest against the enactment of the Loud bill (H. R. 6071) for the following reasons, to wit:

1. It excludes from the mails as second-class mail matter all "sample copies" of newspapers, thus depriving them of one of the most valuable means not only of extending their circulations, but of securing new subscribers to take the place of those who die or drop out for various causes. It therefore will cause the general depletion of newspaper circulation by subscription.

2. It permits the mailing of periodicals at the pound rate to subscribers only, and defines subscribers as those who "voluntarily order and pay, or agree to pay, for the same." Under this definition a person whose subscription has lapsed and has not been renewed is not a subscriber, and copies of a periodical sent to other than advance-paying subscribers could be excluded. This is a direct blow at the local country newspaper.

3. It will throw out of employment hundreds of thousands of workingmen and women engaged in the printing, paper making, electrotyping, and allied trades, entailing distress and calamity the extent of which can hardly be estimated.

4. Mr. LOUD maintains that the purpose of the bill is to reduce the deficiency in the postal revenues. He claims that there is a heavy loss to the Government in the carriage of second-class matter. This claim is untenable, because whatever loss there may be upon the carriage of second-class matter is fully offset by the gain upon the carriage of the two profitable classes, the first and fourth, which are a direct outgrowth of the mailing of the second-class matter.

Every publisher receives large numbers of letters and mails large quantities of "premiums" (fourth-class matter) to his subscribers and club raisers, and almost every advertisement is a bid for correspondence by mail and the consequent mailing of merchandise in filling orders. There are other causes than the carriage of second-class mail matter to account for the annual deficiency in the postal revenues, which would still be operative should the bill become a law. How, then, could the enactment of this measure reduce the deficiency?

5. Lastly, it creates a virtual censorship of the press by giving to post-office officials the absolute right to determine what newspapers and periodicals shall have the advantage of the rates of second-class mail matter. It confers on the post-office the power to determine what is and what is not a periodical: and since there is not a single newspaper or magazine published in the United States which, in some issue, is not amenable to this authoritative discrimination against advertising, supplements, premiums, extra editions, and extra free matter, and which, therefore, may be relegated to mail matter of the third class, it literally places them at the mercy of any postmaster's mandate.

Trusting you will give the above objections to this bill the consideration to which you may deem them entitled, and that you will vote against its enactment, we remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

GEO. W. WILLIS PUBLISHING COMPANY,
GEO. W. WILLIS, President.

All these statements, Mr. Speaker, should have been answered before an attempt was made to crowd this bill through the House. Personal abuse is no answer.

It is a blow at trade newspapers. Here is an extract from a letter written to me by M. T. Richardson, editor of the Boots and Shoes Weekly, printed at 27 Park Place, New York:

The last time I met Mr. LOUD in connection with that bill was at a meeting of some association here in this city more than a year ago, and he especially mentioned a paper published in Maine, called Comfort, that was a great offender against the Government in the matter of sending out sample copies. This paper was supposed to have a million circulation. I have seen it, and it is pretty well filled with small advertisements requesting people to send for circulars or catalogues of something or other, or to remit small sums of money, from 10 cents up, for certain articles. There may be, perhaps, two hundred or more such advertisements in each issue.

Let us assume that each sample copy of Comfort sent out causes somebody to write one letter. That would produce a million letters to be transported through the mails at 2 cents each and bring in to the Government an income of $20,000, but it is much fairer to assume that each copy of Comfort not only causes one person to write a letter, but it may cause several people to write several letters each. I think it would be a fair and very conservative estimate to suppose that each copy of this paper produces five letters on the part of people receiving the paper. That would mean 5,000,000 letters, or $100,000 income to the Government from the letters produced by a single edition of Comfort.

As a matter of course, the people to whom the letters are addressed must pay the Government a big revenue of postage on circulars and catalogues sent, to say nothing of letters which these people themselves write back to those making inquiries of them.

When you come to consider that this is only one paper out of large numbers that appeal to people in a way to cause them to write letters, it can be easily inferred that the Government's income from letters as the result of sample copies sent out must run up into millions of dollars a year.

As to the effect of the passage of the bill upon wage-workers, I read the following letter from Street & Smith, publishers, who give work to over a thousand employees in their great establishment in William, Rose, and Duane streets, New York. They say that "thousands of your constituents are dependent upon these industries for their daily bread, and your opposition to the measure would win the heartfelt gratitude of all the wage-workers in this line of industry." Here is their letter:

ESTEEMED SIR: It has possibly not occurred to you what enormous interests will be affected by the enactment of this measure as a law and what great injury will result to the wage-workers of all large cities. The passage of this bill will render it impossible to mail the bulk of publications which now enjoy the privileges of second-class matter at 1 cent a pound unless the prices of the same are increased to the public to cover the extra postal charges which will be involved under the proposed law, and of course increased prices to the public will necessarily mean a large curtailment in the output.

This affects not only the publishing interests of large cities, which are great, as you are aware, but it will also affect the workers in the allied trades—bookbinding, typesetting, stereotyping, lithographing, paper making, and kindred trades—throughout the country. These trades give employment to many thousands of people, including, no doubt, a great number of your constituents. The curtailment of product that will necessarily result from the passage of this bill will throw a vast number of these deserving people out of work, causing great distress and hardship.

The only plea that is urged in favor of this measure is that it will do away with the annual deficiency in the Postal Department. Examination of statistics will show you that this deficiency has been gradually becoming less each succeeding year without any change whatever in the law, till it now amounts to less than $4,000,000 per annum, and at the present rate of decrease there will be no deficiency whatever in 1902 and succeeding years. The facts fully considered, is it advisable to adopt such drastic measures, bringing hardship and poverty to the working class?

There are other good reasons why this bill should not become a law, which we give herewith.

If enacted, this bill will not prove a saving to the Government, but will cause loss and embarrassment to all publishers. It gives the Postmaster-General absolute power to exclude from the mails, as second-class matter, any publication that he may choose to call a book, no matter how often it is published, or whether it complies with the present statutes.

The Loud bill further prohibits any publisher from sending more than 500 copies of any issue of his periodical as samples for the purpose of increasing circulation. At the same time the bill gives to trade unions, benevolent or fraternal societies or orders organized under the lodge system, the privilege of sending an unlimited number of samples of all their periodical publications, published at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, enabling them to be used for advertising purposes to an unlimited extent, while restricting samples of all legitimate periodicals to 500 copies of any one issue.

This bill compels news dealers to pay four times as much postage as they now pay on all copies of periodicals that they may have to send back and return to news companies from which they are purchased, thereby limiting the news dealer in his trade with the public to actual advance orders for all publications. At the present time the news dealers of the country are enabled, by the liberality of the postal laws, to maintain agencies in every community, where the popular journals and magazines can be procured, a convenience which can scarcely be estimated highly enough to the residents of the small towns, full of intelligent and reading people, scattered over the Eastern, Western, and Southern States. Any blow at these news agencies is a blow at the cheap magazines, the daily press, and the illustrated journals, which, outside of great cities, make their way to the homes of the people through the local agents and the mails.

The loss to the Government in the diminished circulation of these journals would come chiefly through the diminished receipts from first-class mail matter. It is therefore through the advertising of the publishers of second-class mail matter that the enormous volume of letter postage is due. It is an unassailable fact that the receipts of the post-office increase in proportion to the circulation of this matter. No one can appreciate better than yourself the large amount expended by publishers themselves in letter postage in the direct work of maintaining the circulation and other necessary correspondence in connection therewith. It is to the interest of all publishers that these changes in the present law, initiated and contrived to limit the circulation of periodicals, should be defeated.

For the reasons above stated we urge you to cast your vote against the passage of this measure, assuring you that you will thereby earn the gratitude of thousands of citizens of your district, as well as the consciousness that you have not stood in the way of the literary progress and enlightenment of the great American people, who have become a nation of readers and thinkers very largely through the influence of the present postal laws relating to second-class matter, which were framed to create the very enterprises which the proposed measure seeks to destroy, and which enable the residents of the most obscure hamlets to secure their reading matter at low prices, the same as those in the great centers.

We assure you that this appeal does not represent the single publishing house of Street & Smith, as in this movement the press and publishers of the entire country are almost a unit with us in opposing the measure. The limited time that will elapse before the consideration of the bill renders it difficult to secure as strong an expression of public opinion as could otherwise be shown, but we need only point to the determined protest which arose from the whole American people when a measure almost identical to this one was proposed in Congress two years ago and defeated by a large vote.

Yours, respectfully,

STREET & SMITH.

Hon. AMOS J. CUMMINGS,
Washington, D. C.

I add to this a letter from Samuel S. Blood, manager of the International News Company, of 83 and 85 Duane street, New York:

MARCH 8, 1900.

DEAR SIR: This bill is, in its spirit and purport, distinctly opposed to the interests of the people and to the purpose for which the Post-Office Department was instituted. It imposes unnecessary and harsh restrictions upon the circulation of popular literature for the masses, and thereby tends to obstruct the progress of the people toward a higher plane of intelligence. They will be quick to mark and condemn these obnoxious features of the Loud bill if it becomes a law.

The main purpose of the postal service is to facilitate the intercourse of the people of all sections of the United States through the mailing of printed matter, as well as written correspondence. This should be the primary consideration rather than that of a revenue for the Government. The people have made no complaint about a too low rate of postage, nor are they likely to do so in the future. They want increased facilities, not higher rates.

In view of these facts this bill ought, in my judgment, to be rejected, and I urgently invite your influence, efforts, and vote to that end.

Yours, truly,

SAMUEL S. BLOOD, Manager.

Hon. A. J. CUMMINGS;
Washington, D. C.

As a supplement to this statement, I append a letter from Ormond G. Smith, a well-known publisher in New York:

DEAR SIR: This bill compels news dealers to pay four times as much postage as they now pay on all copies of periodicals that they may have to sell back and return to news companies from which they are purchased, thereby limiting the news dealer in his trade with the public to actual advance orders for all publications.

At the present time the news dealers of the country are enabled, by the liberality of the postal laws, to maintain agencies in every community where the popular journals and magazines can always be obtained, a convenience which can scarcely be estimated highly enough to the residents of the small towns, full of intelligent and reading people, scattered over the Eastern, Western, and Southern States. Any blow at these news agencies is a blow at the cheap magazines, the daily press, and the illustrated journals, which, outside of great cities, make their way to the homes of the people through the local agents and the mails.

The loss to the Government from these proposed changes would come mainly through the diminished receipts from first-class mail matter. It is through the advertising contained in second-class mail matter that the enormous volume of letter postage is due. It is an unassailable fact that the receipts of the post-office increase in proportion to the circulation of this matter. Only those directly interested know the enormous amount now expended in letter postage by the public in the necessary correspondence in connection with business growing directly out of the circulation of newspapers and periodicals. It is to the interest of all business men, as well as publishers, that these changes in the present law, initiated and contrived to limit the circulation of periodicals, should be defeated. Hence we urge you, as a representative of a commercial community, to use your influence to prevent the passage of this bill.

In view of the rapidly augmenting revenues of the Post-Office Department, and the probable early disappearance of the deficit, the proposed legislation is without extenuation or excuse. As this steady increase of receipts is largely due to the circulation of periodicals that carry advertising, any restriction of the rights and privileges of periodicals is adverse to the monetary interests of the Post-Office Department, as well as destructive of the business of thousands of merchants.

To one feature of existing conditions in our great business and monetary world especial notice should be given by every observant member of Congress. Trusts and monopolies having now so multiplied as to run small competitors to the wall, any scheme to protect the man of limited means and assure him of a market is eminently commendable. In the advertising pages of our great magazines and newspapers and trade journals the men of small capital, the inventor, manufacturer, or industrial investor, in every section of our country, finds the widest field of trade open to him, that no trust, no combine, no monopoly can rob him of.

Not a trust, combine, or monopoly in the country but what would rejoice to eliminate this advertising competitor. Therefore to in any manner restrict or restrain the province of these mediums is to cater directly to the interests of monopoly, and just as directly against the livelihood of small capitalists and mechanics and producers and tradesmen in all sections of the United States.

Outside of the Post-Office Department there is no demand for the passage of this bill. It would restrict the distribution of a large amount of valuable educational matter and of standard novels, constituting the best literature which passes through the United States mails. Mr. LOUD's contention that the mail service costs $30,000,000 more than it would if conducted at the same rates by private parties argues that the source of the postal-revenue deficiency is not in the quantity of any kind of matter carried.

James S. Metcalfe, the editor of that brilliant weekly, Life, printed at 19 and 21 West Thirty-first street, New York, sends me the following:

NEW YORK, March 9, 1900.

MY DEAR MR. CUMMINGS: We are against the Loud bill simply because it gives local postmasters greater power to inflict, by arbitrary action, annoyance and damage to publishers. It is bad enough as it is, as is shown by an experience of our own, in which one of our Christmas numbers was held up on a technicality under the present law, and was afterwards released upon appeal to the Department.

Hon. AMOS J. CUMMINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Frederic L. Colver, president of the Frank Leslie Publishing House, 141 Fifth avenue, New York, sends me the following letter:

NEW YORK, February 20, 1900.

Hon. AMOS CUMMINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: May we ask that you will oppose the Loud post-office bill, which, we understand, is soon to be presented for your consideration?

This bill very unjustly discriminates against the rights of Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly and all other legitimate periodicals, especially those published in the Eastern States.

While we recognize the necessity for some revision, and more strict laws regulating second-class matter, we believe the proposed Loud bill is not the proper remedy. In our opinion, more care should be exercised by postmasters in admitting publications to the benefits of the second-class rate. The mails are often burdened with tons of literature, published in the form of so-called "libraries," which publications are nothing more than lengthy stories which should be published in book form.

We think you will agree with us that a periodical—weekly, monthly, or quarterly—which disseminates literature on a variety of topics interesting and useful to the people should have the benefit of the second-class rate of 1 cent per pound within the limits of the United States, Mexico, and Canada, as heretofore; but this Loud bill proposes to make the honest publishers suffer, while the object should be the curtailing of privileges granted to some dishonest ones.

We are particularly opposed to that clause of the Loud bill creating 1,000 miles as a zone limit for the present second-class rate of 1 cent per pound. The periodical publishers of a city like Chicago or St. Louis would have an immense advantage over the publishers in the East. We presume you are aware that the great majority of widely circulated periodicals are issued in the Eastern States.

But, Mr. Speaker, here is a letter from the chancellor of the New York University. Listen to him:

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY, UNIVERSITY HEIGHTS,
New York, March 19, 1900.

MY DEAR SIR: Please favor the cause of colleges, schools, and general education by opposing the Loud bill (H. R. 6071) or causing it to be amended so that college and school publications may still be sent through the post-office as second class matter. As a worker for education for a generation, I know that such periodicals are very useful and are seldom or never self-supporting, but are maintained by students as a rule at considerable cost. It is very unwise for the Government to discourage such papers when it is so liberal in its postage rules in various other directions.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY M. MACCRACKEN, Chancellor.

Hon. A. J. CUMMINGS,
House of Representatives.

I have also the following letter from R. W. Massey, president of the Massey Business Colleges, of Columbus, Ga.:

COLUMBUS, GA., March 9, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I would respectfully call your attention to the inclosed circular letter, which refers to the Loud bill. Should this bill pass in its present form, it would strike a severe blow at the cause of education. We believe that our worthy educational institutions are certainly entitled to the same privileges granted to trades unions and lodges.

Please consider the excellent reasons stated in the circular letter.

Very truly, yours,

R. W. MASSEY,
President Massey Colleges.

Hon. A. J. CUMMINGS,
Washington, D. C.

An appeal to friends of education—The Loud bill (H. R. 6071) strikes a blow at the cause of education.

To Members of Congress.

GENTLEMEN: Permit me to call your attention to a matter of great concern to the educational interests of the United States. On the 20th instant the Loud Bill (H. R. 6071) comes before your honorable body. Section 7 of this bill repeals the Manderson-Hainer Act absolutely, while section 4 protects benevolent and fraternal societies, trade unions, and lodges, to the exclusion of the school and other beneficiaries of the act of July, 1894.

This is a great injustice to educational institutions, and one I am sure should be prevented. The bill should be amended so as to give educational institutions the same privileges that are granted benevolent or fraternal societies, trade unions, and lodges.

I call your earnest attention to the following facts:

1. Pound-rate postage exists to facilitate the spread of intelligence among the people. It gives the public cheaper newspapers, and if it is accorded to the schools it will tend to popularize and cheapen education.

2. Every good school, public or private, is distinctly beneficial to the general public. The school paper furthers the interests of the school, and, therefore, of the general public. It is a potent influence in persuading our young people to become educated. It is not a self supporting private enterprise, as is the ordinary newspaper; it is an adjunct of the school and a part of the school's work. It, therefore, does not appeal to support through personal subscriptions, and could not, as a rule, be thus supported. It asks for the cheap mailing privilege in behalf of its educational mission, and the fact that it is issued to the public gratis all the more entitles it to this privilege.

3. Mr. LOUD urges that all periodicals, school papers along with the rest, should be required to have regular paid subscribers; but he departs from this rule in the case of trades unions and lodges. Upon what theory of policy or justice does he grant the cheap mailing privilege to these organizations and not to the schools? Is not a school with its hundreds of students quite as much a public enterprise as is a lodge or an association of carpenters or tailors? Under Mr. LOUD's proposed measure, an organization of bartenders, or distillers, or cigar makers can distribute their literature through the mails at pound rates, while a college or academy would have to pay the Government twenty times as much for the privilege of sending the school literature to its students and patrons. Is not such discrimination a direct blow at the educational cause?

4. Nearly all school periodicals have local circulation only, being distributed in the immediate vicinity of the school. The cost of distribution is therefore a mere bagatelle as compared with the cost of mailing papers which go to all parts of the country. In nearly all cases the charge of 1 cent per pound actually pays the Government the full cost of transmission. In the case of the country weekly newspaper, the Government effects this local transmission through the mail free. Under these circumstances, to charge the schools 1 cent per copy, or more than 20 cents per pound, is to burden the school with a tax as unjust as it is impolitic. If the Government transmits the country newspaper free, should it not at least carry the school paper at actual cost? It transmits the Police Gazette and all other classes of immoral and sensational publications at pound rates under circumstances that cause a direct loss to the postal revenues of millions of dollars annually, yet Mr. LOUD's proposed bill refuses to carry educational literature at cost, and proposes to tax our worthy institutions of education, while it pays a bonus to thousands of sensational and advertising sheets that, so far from benefiting the public, are positively harmful in their influence.

5. The schools that issue periodicals in the interests of their educational work are, for the most part, the schools of the common people, situated in small cities and villages, and devoted to supplementing the work of the public schools with more advanced courses of general or special education. They are attended by students who can not afford to attend distant colleges or universities. They consist mainly of academies, normal schools, industrial and business schools, etc. Their rates of tuition are low, and they are not backed by large endowments or public funds. They afford to the farmer or mechanic an opportunity of giving his children technical or preparatory training near at home and at a moderate cost. Surely it is not unreasonable to ask that the Government foster these worthy popular schools to the extent of transmitting their periodicals through the mails at cost.

6. But it is urged that if the pound-rate privilege be allowed to the schools, this privilege will be abused by certain schools that will take advantage of it to circulate advertising matter in no way related to education. In reply to this it may be said that the objection is equally pertinent in the case of periodicals issued by lodges, etc., and of the general newspaper itself. It would be an easy matter to insert a clause in the law restricting the advertising functions of the school paper and other periodicals; but this objection has never been raised in the case of the country newspaper, which often consists almost wholly of advertisements, but which, as before stated, is transmitted through the mails entirely free of charge. Why, then, should this advertising bugaboo be raised up in the case of the school paper?

7. In all the reports of Postmasters-General, and in all the literature sent out by the advocates of the Loud bill, it has not once been charged that the schools have anywhere been guilty of abusing the pound-rate privilege accorded to them through the wise and beneficent act of 1894. We therefore urge that the present attempt to debar them from this privilege is unwarranted, unwise, and entirely unsupported by public sentiment, which is everywhere favorable to the largest and most liberal encouragement of educational interests.

Yours, truly,

RICHARD W. MASSEY.

I have also a letter from E. L. Kellogg & Co., educational publishers, 61 East Ninth street, New York. Here it is:

MARCH 21, 1900.

DEAR SIR: We wish to make a strong protest against many features of the Loud bill, and it is herewith inclosed.

Our periodicals for teachers are widely known in educational circles, and have reached a circulation of over 100,000 copies. We have paid for postage during the last four years $50,000, only one-third of which is postage on second-class matter. Besides this, our correspondents spent at least $25,000 on postage and fees on money orders to be sent us. And all this is a business you may never have heard of, but which is doing, we believe, a great work for the advancement of education and raising the standard of teaching and teachers.

You run the risk of crippling this work and many other reputable, responsible publishers in all parts of the country by passing the present Loud bill.

We respectfully protest against the enactment of the above-entitled measure for the following reasons:

1. It excludes from the mails as second-class mail matter all "sample copies" of newspapers and periodicals, thus depriving all publications of one of the most valuable means not only of extending their circulations but of securing new subscribers to take the place of those who die or drop out for various causes. It therefore will cause the general depletion of newspaper circulation by subscription.

2. It permits the mailing of periodicals at the pound rate to subscribers only, and defines subscribers as those who "voluntarily order and pay or agree to pay the same." Under this definition, a person whose subscription has lapsed and has not been renewed may be construed as not being a subscriber, and copies of periodicals sent to other than advance-paying subscribers might be excluded. This is a direct blow at the local country newspaper, the religious and educational papers.

3. It requires publishers who are permitted to mail matter of the second class to separate the same, before mailing, into United States mail sacks or bundles, by States, cities, towns, and counties, as the Postmaster-General may direct, thus forcing every publisher to establish in his office a minature post-office, and entailing great extra expense.

4. It will throw out of employment thousands of working men and women engaged in the printing, paper-making, electrotyping, and allied trades, entailing distress and calamity, the extent of which can hardly be estimated.

5. The advocates of the bill maintain that its purpose is to reduce the deficiency in the postal revenues. They claim that there is a heavy loss to the Government in the carriage of second-class matter. This claim is untenable, because whatever loss there may be upon the carriage of second-class matter is fully offset by the gain upon the carriage of the two profitable classes, the first and fourth, which are a direct outgrowth of the mailing of the second-class matter.

Every publisher receives large numbers of letters and mails large quantities of fourth-class matter to his subscribers and club raisers, and almost every advertisement is a bid for correspondence by mail and the consequent mailing of merchandise in filling orders. There are other causes than the carriage of second-class mail matter to account for the annual deficiency in the postal revenues, which would still be operative should the bill become a law. How, then, could the enactment of this measure reduce the deficiency?

6. Lastly, it creates a virtual censorship of the press by giving to the post-office officials the absolute right to determine what newspapers and periodicals shall have the advantage of the rates of second-class mail matter. It confers on the post-office the power to determine what is and what is not a periodical; and since there is not a single newspaper or magazine published in the United States which in some issue is not amenable to this authoritative discrimination against advertising, supplements, premiums, extra editions, and extra free matter, and which therefore may be regarded as mail matter of the third class, it literally places them at the mercy of any postmaster's mandate.

Hoping you will give the above objections to this bill the consideration to which you may deem them entitled, we are,

Very respectfully, yours, E. KELLOGG CO.

Hon. A. J. CUMMINGS, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Speaker, these are selections from over a hundred circulars, letters, and dispatches that I have received making protests against the passage of this bill.

Now, in reply to what some gentleman has said about the fact that a ton of an edition of Sapho had recently been sent through the mails from the city of New York, I want to say that you of Congress have fastened upon New York City Anthony Comstock, a well-known and respected official, whose duty it is, if this book is pernicious and meretricious in its tendency, to see that its sale is stopped. It is not necessary to pass the Loud bill to do this. You can do it now under the law. I see the performance of Sapho by Olga Nethersole is stopped: and if this is right, the same power invoked might stop the sale of the book. If you favor the Loud bill, why do you not pass a bill preventing all theatrical exhibitions whatever, because a police justice says Olga Nethersole has overstepped the bounds? [Laughter.] I protest against punishing honest men, who are giving us cheap literature under the law as it now stands, because some publisher of pernicious literature violates the law and takes advantage of this second-class rate. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the city of New York pays net every year to the Postal Department over $5,000,000. This money is distributed throughout the country for the benefit of post-offices unable to meet their running expenses. Two years from now the city will be adding two millions additional to the revenues of the Government under this second-class mail system. I submit that it is a gross injustice to thousands of her workingmen and working women to repeal this law. You should foster their interests instead of attempting to destroy them. If you want to reduce your postal expenses, strike yourselves rather than the poor mechanics. Renounce your franking privilege and save the Government untold millions.

"Mutton, sir! Mutton! Mutton in the market! Seven and a half cents per pound! Price pinned on the back!" is what Col. Tom Benton used to say whenever a measure with a venal taint came before Congress.

Mr. Speaker, are the railroad and express companies in the mutton trade? Are they purchasers? If so, who furnishes the mutton?

Late Representative Sydney P. Epes.

REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM A. JONES,
OF VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 24, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. SYDNEY P. EPES, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia.

"Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased"—

Mr. JONES of Virginia said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Whilst there is little to be added to what has been so justly and beautifully said of my departed friend and colleague, I am unwilling that this occasion, specially set apart for the commemoration of his life and virtues, shall pass without some brief expression of my estimation of his character and worth and of the deep personal loss which I have sustained in his untimely death.

My acquaintance with SYDNEY P. EPES was neither so long nor perhaps quite so intimate as was that of some others who have participated in these commemorative exercises. I met him for the first time some four years ago, although by reputation he had, of course, been known to me before our personal acquaintance began. For this reason I shall leave to others, more capable of performing so pleasing a task, the recital of the story of his brief yet well-rounded life.

With the opening of the Fifty-fifth Congress commenced that daily intercourse which soon ripened into the fruition of an unfailing and enduring friendship. Although our homes were widely separated, a fact which precluded that social intercourse so largely a part of life in Virginia, it so happened that the early youth of his father and mine had been spent in the same section of the State, and that between their ancestors had existed ties of blood and of friendship in which we both felt a common interest and a pardonable pride. This naturally drew us into a close companionship, and I recall with feelings of no little pleasure the conversations upon what to both of us was a topic of unfailing interest. How often do I remember that he spoke to me with love and veneration of his parents; and were I asked to name the crowning virtue in the life of SYDNEY P. EPES, I should declare it to have been the filial affection which he ever manifested toward the aged father and mother to whom he owed his being and whom he so greatly honored.

He was a man of sterling integrity and unflinching devotion to his friends, and it is no exaggeration for me to say that of all those whom I have known since my service in this House began no one of them possessed in a greater measure or in a higher degree than did he those personal attributes of mind and of heart which drew other men to him and which bound them to him as with hooks of steel in the bonds of an everlasting friendship. He was one of the youngest members of this body, and his service here was of comparatively brief duration, and yet I venture to affirm that not one of the many who, since I have been a member of this House, preceded him upon that journey which leads to the great hereafter left behind him those who mourned his death with a more sincere or profound sorrow.

The mysteries of life and of death are, indeed, unfathomable. It is not for us who are permitted to linger yet upon life's stage to question the wisdom of Him who ordaineth all things and doeth all things, when He removes from these earthly scenes one so full of health, of strength, of vigor, and of young and promising life. But of all my acquaintances in this body it has seemed to me he would be almost the last upon whom the icy hand of Death would be laid: for he was, indeed, the perfection of manly form, and his health always appeared the most robust. In my memory he will ever dwell as one radiant with health and glowing with life and brightness. It is difficult to realize that one so full of hope and strength and life, which gave promise of a repleteness of long years of usefulness, has been so suddenly stricken down.

His character was most engaging, and his disposition as gentle as that of a woman. His manners were courtly, but unaffected, and his bearing was ever chivalrous and manly. He had few, if any, enemies, and his friends were legion. His popularity in the district which he so faithfully represented upon this floor was deservedly very great, but the sincere esteem and deep affection in which he was held by those among whom he lived, those who had known him longest and best, is the highest tribute to an honorable and upright life.

Those of us who accompanied his remains to their last resting place may never forget the sadness and sorrow pictured upon the countenances of the companions of his youth and the associates and friends of his maturer manhood. The solemn and impressive services held at his home were attended by the entire community, and the tearful faces of all betokened the sincerity of their admiration and the depth of their affection.

They laid him to rest in a quiet, peaceful spot, not far distant from the home where dwell those whom of all the earth he held most precious, whose grief is unspeakable and whose loss irreparable. May Heaven protect that disconsolate home, and may the loving hand of the living God sustain his grief-laden widow and guide the inexperienced footsteps of his five fatherless children.

Overthrow of the Carpetbag Government in South Carolina in 1876.

SPEECH

HON. B. R. TILLMAN,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the Senate of the United States, Friday, March 23, 1900, at the close of the debate on the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9080) appropriating, for the benefit and government of Puerto Rico, revenues collected on importations therefrom since its evacuation by Spain and revenues hereafter collected on such importations under existing law, Mr. TILLMAN asked and obtained leave to have the following speech printed in the RECORD.

SPEECH OF HON. B. R. TILLMAN, OF SOUTH CAROLINA, BEFORE THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF THAT STATE, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1895, PRINTED AS PART OF HIS REMARKS IN THE SENATE, MARCH 23, IN JUSTIFICATION OF THE DISFRANCHISEMENT OF THE ILLITERATE NEGROES IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TILLMAN said:

Mr. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION: I regret that my physical condition is and has been such since Tuesday morning, coupled with enforced attendance upon this convention, as to render me unable to arrange the data and prepare such a speech as I think the occasion requires. I also feel my inability in a physical way to accomplish what I shall undertake, but I will simply do the best I can.

It has been well said that this is a momentous issue; that this convention of the people of the State to deal with the question of suffrage will mark an epoch in our history. I may further say that the question of suffrage and its wise regulation is the sole cause of our being here. The prosperity, happiness, and progress of this people depend upon its wise solution. The very life of the State is involved in the wisdom or the unwisdom of our action. Why do I say this? When the Southern Cross went down in battle and the hopes of the Southern Confederacy were laid in the grave of the "lost cause," when we had struggled for four years with a bravery and patriotism and self-sacrifice unparalleled in history for the right of self-government, and for our rights under the Constitution as we conceived and understood them, what came to pass? President Johnson appointed a provisional governor, and ordered a constitutional convention to be convened to prepare the way for the State of South Carolina to reenter the Union.

That convention assembled and adopted a constitution. Under it legislation was enacted; the "Black code," of which we have heard so much, was part of that legislation. Whatever may be said as to the "Black code," it gave the Black Republicans, Thad Stevens and his negrophilist allies, excuse for their reconstruction deviltry. It was the only pretense they wanted, because these hellhounds, actuated by hate for the Southern people, were determined upon degrading us to the lowest level possible, and they had right at hand an instrument which the most fertile imagination, if it had been given a thousand years to concoct a scheme of revenge, could not have surpassed it. It was the presence among us of our exslaves set free by the results of the war.

Actuated solely by the purpose to perpetuate the rule of the Republican party, and with the hellish purpose of venting their rage and hatred upon a conquered people, they passed the reconstruction acts and came very near impeaching Johnson because he had been moving forward contrary to their will. And then they put in motion the forces of the Army, which were already here, to depose the civil government which we had established, to overthrow the fabric which we were trying to reerect, and to put in its place the rule of the negro over the Anglo-Saxon. Canby, the major-general in charge of this department, issued his orders calling for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention. And in effect he said to the Southern white men: "Attend to your material interests, the Army will take care of your government; your help is not wanted, nor will your interference be tolerated." And the radical, ringed, streaked, and striped carpetbagger convention of 1868 assembled.

The constitution which they gave us was submitted to the vote of the people—to the negroes, in fact. All our then leaders, without exception, took the position that this action on the part of Congress and the United States Army was outside of the Constitution and must fall. They advised our Southern white men to remain at home and pay no attention to it; that it would drop of its own illegality; and the consequence was no white man participated in the election to ratify the constitution. It was pushed through at the polls, guarded all over the State by bayonets, and we were placed under the rule of our ex-slaves. A legislature was elected under that constitution, and an ex-Army officer, Robert K. Scott, was elected governor. The statehouse was filled with the minions of Black Republicanism, officered and led by white thieves, who came here for the express purpose of getting rich at the expense of our impoverished and fallen people.

The first legislature under the radical and carpetbag régime met in November, 1868. It was composed in both branches exclusively, except the members from two or three white counties, of carpetbaggers and negroes. I have attempted to get the figures as to the number of negroes in the four legislatures which met during those eight years of misrule. I have not been able to do so, but my recollection of the statements made in the public press at the time is that there was a small majority of white men in the first, and in the second and third a large majority of negroes. I have the figures as to the fourth—1874–75—when there were 15 senators who were colored and 61 colored representatives, about half.

Now, sir, to give a clear idea of the results of the rule of those people during those eight years of misgovernment and robbery, I must beg your pardon while I read some figures gathered by the investigating committee appointed by the general assembly, which, in 1877, took up this question and gathered such testimony as would place on record for the benefit of future historians the facts as to the hellish work accomplished through Canby and his carpetbaggers, who had been foisted upon this people by the bayonet. The witnesses were almost wholly officeholders under the carpetbag government.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The amount of the public debt July, 1868, when the Radicals went into power, was $7,162,231, including bills of the bank of the State. This was the honest debt of the State contracted prior to the war; and I do not hesitate to say here that before 1868, and up to that time, there was no State in this Union whose credit was superior to that which this State enjoyed in the money markets of London and New York.

Now, sir, prior to 1868, under the system of government which had obtained and been in effect here from 1790, during the latter years, in the forties and fifties, the average expenditure of our State government for all purposes per annum was $400,000. Let us make some allowance, if you please, for the inflation of currency just after the war and the increased value of articles which had to be purchased, and, if you wish, let us add 50 per cent to that as an average and reasonable estimate as to what it ought to have taken to carry on the government honestly; that would make during the eight years, if you estimate $600,000 as necessary to carry on the State government, $4,800,000.

What did these carpetbag thieves and negroes collect in cash? I will only give the aggregate items here. I hope the reporters will get them and print them for the benefit of the people of this State, as well as people of the other States. The total amount for the eight years collected in cash by these men was $10,165,114. If you subtract $600,000 annually, it will make $4,800,000. If you please, put it five millions, and you will see they collected an excess of $5,000,000 over and above the necessary expenses of the government. Did they stop there? Let me read you a brief letter which our State treasurer, who is more familiar with this matter than I am, wrote me in answer to the inquiry I made yesterday:

Hon. B. R. TILLMAN.

DEAR SIR: Under the conversion act of 1869 the Republicans issued $5,965,000 of conversion bonds in excess of old bonds surrendered, and there were no vouchers whatever for this excess. These fraudulent bonds are listed on the New York Stock Exchange to the shame, injury, and disgrace of the State to this day.

They are quoted in every price list you see now as nonfundable South Carolina bonds at 1 cent on the dollar. When the State treasurer and myself went to New York three years ago and endeavored to refund our debt, we were met by Henry Clews and his agents—Clews had been Kimpton's partner in his scheme of robbery—and they dogged us all over New York City with the cry, "Here, pay this debt which bears the seal of South Carolina, or you can not get any recognition in this money market."

They also fraudulently issued $1,000,000 bonds in 1868, ostensibly to pay interest on the public debt. The act authorized the issue of one million, but they issued two million, one of which was fraudulent. Another fraudulent issue was one million for the relief of the treasury in 1869. The assets of the Bank of the State and the railroad shares held by the State in 1867, amounting to $7,069,674, disappeared after the first negro legislature met in 1868, and the State had to issue $1,259,100 bonds to redeem bills of the Bank of the State in addition to the large amount of these bills received for taxes. For a statement of these frauds see pages 316, 317, United States Census, 1880.

The plunder and destruction of the public funds and property by the negro legislature and reconstructionists that came into power under the auspices of the Federal Government is perhaps without parallel in the history of civilized countries. Money was raised by any and every means found available, with reckless disregard to cost and in violation of every principle of honesty and justice, not to be expended for legitimate public uses, but squandered and embezzled in a manner that defies description and is almost incredible.

This iniquity was accomplished by increased taxation upon onerous assessments of property, the issue of bonds, stocks, and certificates in the name of the State by the legislature, governors, treasurer, and speakers of the house of representatives, and financial agents, and by their sale and hypothecation at frightful reductions in value; by the payment of account for unnecessary public printing for the enrichment of publishing companies; for bills for legislative service; for wines, groceries, and dry goods (these last alone amounting to $543,232); by the reproduction and repayment of warrants and coupons that had already been paid, but had never been canceled, and even by the "raising" of checks on public account by interpolation and alteration of figures, etc.

Respectfully, W. T. C. BATES, State Treasurer.

Now, this is a long story, Mr. President, and I shall not attempt to rehearse it in all of its details. I shall only attempt to jump from one mammoth and gigantic steal to another. I will not attempt to take them up chronologically. I have not had the time to arrange the data. I will read here, for the benefit of this convention, an extract from the report of the investigating committee, of which my distinguished colleague, Governor Sheppard, was a member, so you may see and learn some of the infamies practiced by these legislators and those in control of our affairs.

The committee says:

The legislative pay certificate was the fountain head and nursery of many of the frauds, forgeries, and perjuries exposed in this report. Through this source the most flagrant violations of law were committed, whereby the State was annually robbed of amounts ranging from $200,000 to $1,000,000, including fraudulent printing certificates, which were collected and divided between the officials, senators, members of the house, and political hangers-on of the administration. To perpetuate the power and influence of the Republican party it was necessary to have a ready and unfailing reservoir of funds.

No simpler or easier way suggested itself than the issuing of pay certificates by the speaker of the house and the president of the senate. Thus it became not only possible, but practicable, to perpetuate the numerous frauds in the public printing and supplies to which we have already referred. Indeed, this, like the famous hydra, threw out its hundred heads, encircling and poisoning every department of the government, and giving comfort and support to local leaders, in its trail following the low, despicable forgeries and perjuries necessary to effect the end proposed. It is not surprising that the poor and ignorant members of the general assembly fell into these practices, when they were conceived and brought forth by such adroit swindlers as those who led. This immense fund produced and nurtured a bond ring, a printing ring, and this legislative ring—the most popular and at the same time most unscrupulous. It is evident from the testimony, that such a source of revenue as this was indispensable to silence any complaint, and to pacify the fears of the timid and the greed of the avaricious whilst the other great rings were in successful progress.

Among the many remarkable and famous leaders in this enterprise, without at all intending to disparage the claims of others, your committee must mention the names of F. J. Moses, who issued and sold, and John J. Patterson, who became the purchaser. Those two stand out in bold relief, as twin stars, shedding a baleful light upon all who approach them. The evidence which we append will fully justify the conclusion which your committee has reached. The table submitted with this report shows, among other things, that in one session there was issued $1,168,255 in pay certificates (not including printing certificates), every dollar of which was a robbery, except about $300,000 due the members of the senate and house and regularly elected and appointed attachés of the general assembly.

The evidence of more than one witness shows that it was a race between the bond ring, composed of a limited number, and the general assembly as to who should receive the most of the money raised by taxation and the sale of bonds. It was decided that the greatest good could be accomplished by distributing the money to the greatest number, and members of the general assembly, therefore, became the beneficiaries. An unlimited number of certificates were issued on the written or verbal orders of the presiding officers and the chairmen of standing or special committees.

LEGISLATIVE SUPPLIES.

Now, sir, I will take up the question of supplies furnished the legislature. I beg again to read:

The committee respectfully invite attention to the evidence and vouchers submitted with this report, under the head of "supplies." The abuses have been so great and of such a palpable nature that the most credulous person would hardly believe that such frauds should be perpetrated under the forms of legislation. History fails to cite an instance which can be compared with such a carnival of fraud and extravagance as has been held in South Carolina by and through the purchase of supplies for the members of the general assembly.

Under the head of "supplies," says Josephus Woodruff, clerk of the senate, was embraced anything that a senator chose to order. These orders were generally given through the clerk, and the accounts were rendered against the clerk of the senate. At first the orders were moderate and included only stationery and postage stamps, but they gradually increased until they assumed gigantic proportions. In the commencement of this business of furnishing members they gave orders on the clerks to deduct the amount from their pay, but very soon the orders largely exceeded their pay, and the accounts were then included in the report of the committee on contingent accounts and pay certificates thus issued for almost every description of merchandise.

In addition to this, pay certificates were drawn and turned over to the chairman of the committee on contingent accounts for collection and distribution. As the matters became common, the senators claimed that all their expenses should be paid by the State, or, in the language of Senator C. P. Leslie, "The State had no right to be a State unless she could pay and take care of her statesmen."

C. P. Leslie, I believe, was a negro.

A DELEGATE. No; he was a white man.

Senator TILLMAN. He was so much the bigger rascal, then.

Mr. WIGG (a colored delegate). All those you are reading about are white men.

Senator TILLMAN. I will find you plenty of "nigs" after a while, Wigg. [Laughter.]

The committee further say in their report:

A room in the State house was fitted up wherein to serve "wines, liquors, eatables, and cigars" to State officials, senators, members of the house, and their friends, at all hours of the day and night. Woodruff's evidence is that the largest bills were rendered for refreshments, including the best cigars and liquors, which were served up in a room adjoining that of the clerk of the senate, and kept open at all hours, and was visited daily by State officials, judges, senators, members of the house, lawyers, editors, newspaper reporters, and citizens generally, irrespective of party, and that they discussed matters, State and national, in the most agreeable manner over their sparkling glasses.

Not satisfied with the establishment of a barroom in the capitol, they employed a porter, who had charge of the "refreshment" room. The porter states that for six years the statehouse barroom was generally opened at 8 o'clock in the morning and kept open until 2 to 4 the next morning; that during that time some one was constantly there eating, smoking, or drinking, and that Sunday formed no exception to the rule.

Now, sir, to show you the rapid development of taste and the extravagance of our statesmen of both colors, here is a table of contrasts as to what they thought they ought to have in 1869–70, and what they considered necessary to their comfort in 1871–72:

1869–70.	1871–72.
In 1869–70, $5 clocks satisfied them	But in 1872 clocks went up to $600.
40-cent spittoons in 1869	As against $8 cuspidors in 1872.
$4 benches	As against $200 crimson plush sofas.
Straw beds	As against sponge mattresses and oriental pillows.
[Laughter.]
$1 chairs	As against $60 crimson plush Gothic chairs.
$4 pine tables	As against $80 library tables.
25-cent hat pegs	As against $30 hatracks.
$8 desks	As against $50 desks.
$10 office desks	As against $80 to $175 office desks.
50-cent coat hooks	As against $100 wardrobes.
Cheap matting	As against body brussels carpeting.
Clay pipes	As against the finest Habana cigars.
Cheap whisky	As against champagne.
$4 looking glasses	As against $600 mirrors.
$2 window curtains	As against $600 brocatel curtains, lambrequins.
$5 cornices	As against $80 walnut and gilt cornices.

Then follow itemized bills of legislative "supplies," showing everything and anything that merchants anywhere ever bought and sold. Well, I reckon that is enough of that; I must move on. I am in so much filth that it is nearly up to my neck, and I do not want to get buried in it or tire your patience.

The next subject I take up is the public printing. I will give you some statistics collected by this committee from the official records, showing the amount of printing, the money expended for printing during those eight years of negro domination: Sessions 1868–69, $21,124; 1869–70, $45,000; 1870–71; $152,465; 1871–72, $173,000; 1872–73, $450,000. That is the highest point reached.

We come down to the next session, which cost $385,000, and then having got broke, having destroyed the credit of the State, having exhausted all means of bamboozling and fooling anybody to trust them, they got back to $50,000 a year for the last two years they were in power, during which period, as the gentleman from Beaufort said, Mr. Cardozo brought in his reform financial measures. The aggregate in the eight years is $1,326,589. This committee tabulated from the archives of the State the amount expended by the State of South Carolina from 1790 to 1868 for public printing, and it aggregated only $609,000 for the seventy-eight years, showing an excess of cost of printing during the eight years of Republican administration over the seventy-eight previous years of $717,589.

I told you a moment ago that in 1872–73 the amount expended for public printing was $450,000. The committee also prepared another table of statistics, gathered from official sources by correspondence, showing the cost of printing for one year in the States of Louisiana, North Carolina, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Georgia, Texas, Missouri, Maryland, Virginia, Arkansas,

Kentucky. They aggregated $278,241 for their public printing, as follows:

Public printing—year 1877.

Louisiana	$40,528.71
North Carolina	18,281.31
Mississippi	18,439.85
Florida	19,669.35
Alabama	17,000.00
Tennessee	11,402.00
Georgia	12,906.00
Texas	31,163.47
Missouri	27,000.00
Maryland	25,000.00
Virginia	29,812.00
Arkansas	13,040.00
Kentucky	13,999.71

Leaving a balance against our negro and carpetbag rulers of $171,759 necessary to defray the expenses of public printing.

Now, sirs, how was this brought about? Here is the testimony of Josephus Woodruff, clerk of the senate, who, with A. O. Jones, clerk of the house, and with Neagle, comptroller-general, were copartners in the firm of the Republican Printing Company. Woodruff says:

When it became necessary to get appropriations through we became aware of the absolute necessity of paying for the passage, and we added the estimate for these expenses to the amounts of our accounts in order to save ourselves from loss. One-half or more of the total amount of appropriations for the Republican Printing Company was paid to State officials and members of the general assembly.

There were no specific appropriations then, and printing claims were paid out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated. Even then it was almost impossible to obtain payment of our claims direct from the treasury. On presentation of the claim Mr. Parker would refer us to Mr. Neagle, who was the only party he knew had money. In this way we discounted our claims, frequently selling them at 25 and 30 cents on the dollar in order to carry on our work, which was very heavy. As an alternative we had to take Neagle into partnership.

I submit here copy of partnership agreement, dated July 1, 1872, between Woodruff, Jones, and Neagle, witnessed by Le Grande Benedict. When Cardozo took possession of the office of treasurer, I endeavored to perfect the same arrangement as to percentage that I had with Parker. He said that he had decided not to pay out any money for an object unless there was a specific appropriation. That necessitated the introduction of a bill for the payment of our claims before the legislature. An itemized bill was accordingly made, presented, passed upon by the committee in both houses, and an appropriation of $250,000 made for the payment of the claims of the Republican Printing Company. Governor Moses was paid $20,000 to sign the bill.

In this connection it pains me to have to read, Mr. President, a document to be found in the senate journal, 1873, which is as follows:

SENATE COMMITTEE ROOMS, Columbia, S. C., October 30, 1873.

The committee on printing of the senate, to whom was referred a bill to make appropriations for the payment of the expenses of printing, have had the same under careful consideration, and beg leave to report:

That the work ordered by concurrent resolution of the general assembly at its last session is of the highest importance to the State, not only because of the information that it affords the immigrant, but as furnishing a valuable record in history. The committee examined specimens of the portion of the work now in progress, and, after a patient hearing of the clerks of the two houses as to the time, labor, and expense involved, believe the appropriation asked for this purpose to be just and reasonable.

In regard to the appropriation for the payment of the printing of the supreme court decisions, the committee, on reference to chapter 104, page 495, revised statutes, find that while the comptroller-general is authorized to draw his warrants for the publication of these decisions, no appropriations have been made for the payment of the warrants, thereby rendering further legislative action necessary to authorize the treasurer to pay for the work.

With reference to the last item of appropriation asked for by the bill, the committee find that in the reassessment of property for the fiscal year 1873–74 the comptroller-general ordered the reprinting of the blank tax assessments, tax returns, and other necessary papers for carrying out the act passed at the last session of the general assembly providing for a reassessment of the taxable property of the State, and the committee are perfectly satisfied of the justness of this claim.

The committee, in justice to the State printers, also beg leave to state that they have carried on their work, as shown your committee, at heavy sacrifices on account of the State treasurer's inability to meet the former appropriations made by the general assembly. Their contract has been faithfully observed and their work well and promptly executed. The committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

The same Woodruff testified, and he brought his bank checks, and the committee, in searching, went to the bank and found certificates of deposit to prove that he had issued checks to bearer for the following amounts paid to senators, beginning with Moses, the governor, who was a native South Carolinian, $20,000; then to Neagle, who was their partner, $40,000; Melton & Chamberlain, $10,000; F. L. Cardozo, $12,500, and, coming on down through a lot of senators, $5,000 each, we find the name of Robert Smalls, and so on, aggregating $112,550 that they paid to that wing or branch of the general assembly. A. O. Jones testified that he paid the house $55,000; so it seems that the house sold itself disreputably cheap as compared with those that presided at the other end of the capitol.

But listen again. They found that the $250,000, after paying out one hundred and eighty-odd thousand of it, would not work, would not go around, so they made up a bill of deficiencies, amounting to $231,000. And Woodruff goes on and says:

For the payment of this amount certificates of indebtedness, which I have already alluded to, were ordered to be issued to the company. In order to effect this, as against the bitter opposition of the other ring, I again interested the senators and paid them the following sums.

And here follows another list of $5,000, $2,000, and $1,000 down to $500 to this same blessed set of statesmen, aggregating $57,200, in addition to the $112,000 they had already received. No wonder that the printing account was $450,000 that year! I can produce the proof, for it is here, the testimony of the cashier of the bank as to the deposit of a certain check on a certain day by Robert Smalls. I have here on my desk his pardon by the governor in 1879, but it is unnecessary to exhibit it. He disputes and denies his guilt. It is natural that he should. These people have forced me, by endeavoring to claim that it was white men and not negroes who did these wrongs, to unearth these records from our archives and bring them here and let the world know that these men who stand here and clamor for justice for their race perpetrated these damnable robberies as well as infamies when they were in power.

PRINTING STEALS AND SMALLS'S CONNECTION WITH THEM.

There are transactions between Josephus Woodruff and Robert Smalls in the matter of public printing.

One in the fall or the winter of 1870. In connection with this we quote from Woodruff's testimony, page 215, Report on Frauds:

He swears: "In the fall or winter of 1870 the Carolina Printing Company was organized by Messrs. J. W. Denny, R. K. Scott, N. G. Parker, D. H. Chamberlain, J. W. Morris, and L. Cass Carpenter. 'This company owned the Daily Union, of Columbia, and the Charleston Republican. Senator Leslie told Woodruff that 'the friends' in the senate thought that, as this was a matter of senate patronage, they should have a percentage of the profits from the printing. In order to carry out the wishes of 'the friends,' Mr. Leslie proposed that pay certificates for various amounts, ranging from three to five thousand dollars, for current printing be drawn, and one-third or one-fourth of the amount realized be given to the chairman of the committee on printing for division among 'the friends,' including some 15 or 16 senators. This system was carried out as long as moneys could be paid out of any sums in the treasury not otherwise appropriated, and was only checked and stopped when the law for specific appropriations and payments was enacted.'

"The certificates were usually counted at the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, of which bank Governor R. K. Scott, Treasurer Niles G. Parker, and Attorney-General Chamberlain were stockholders. The checks in the hands of the committee are but a portion of the amounts paid during the time of the above arrangements. The money was deposited to the credit of the printing company, and sometimes, according to the witness, division or gratification checks were drawn against deposits in the Carolina National Bank and Central National Bank, which checks, he supposes, are still held by these banks. The testimony of Woodruff, corroborated by the checks in the hands of your committee, shows that the following-named persons received the amounts severally annexed to their names under said arrangements.

Here are mentioned the names of twenty-eight senators and representatives who received amounts ranging from $50 to $5,000. Among them Senator Smalls received two checks, amounting to $250.

L. N. Zealy, who was connected with the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company (page 354, A Report on Public Frauds), swears:

I have also examined the following checks, payable to Robert Smalls or order and R. Smalls or order, signed by J. Woodruff for Republican Printing Company, and find that they have been paid by the South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, and charged to the account of J. Woodruff for the Republican Printing Company, indorsed by Robert Smalls, one bearing this additional indorsement: "Pay to the order of J. C. Roath, esq., cashier." Nathan Ritter, cashier, which indorsement indicates that it has passed through the bank in Charleston for collection:

"No. 19.] COLUMBIA, S. C., April 3, 1871.

"South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, of Columbia: Pay to Robert Smalls or order $300.

"J. WOODRUFF,
"For REPUBLICAN PRINTING Co.

"(Endorsed: Pay to the order of J. C. Roath, esq., cashier. Nathan Ritter, cashier. Robert Smalls. Also the figures 138.)

"No. 41.] COLUMBIA, S. C., July 5, 1871.

"South Carolina Bank and Trust Co. of Columbia: Pay to R. Smalls or order fifty dollars ($50).

"J. WOODRUFF,
"For REPUBLICAN PRINTING Co.

"(Endorsed: Robt. Smalls)."

THE FIVE THOUSAND DOLLAR FRAUD.

The second transaction between Josephus Woodruff and Robert Smalls was pertaining to the appropriation of $250,000 to the Republican Printing Company.

The senate committee on printing, of which Robert Smalls was chairman, and Thad. C. Andrews, H. J. Maxwell, C. D. Hayne, and B. F. Whittemore were members, recommended that "the bill do pass." (Page 263, report on frauds, as quoted above.)

Josephus Woodruff testified (page 265, report on frauds):

"I can enumerate but a portion of the amounts paid on the passage of the appropriation of $250,000." He here mentioned a list of 30 senators and others receiving sums ranging from $50 to $40,000, among whom is Senator R. Smalls, $5,000.

Josephus Woodruff continued: "The above, which foots up a total of $112,550, does not include payments made by Mr. Jones to members and officers of the house, a reference which I feel sure would make at least $30,000 more. Add to this amount the then existing liabilities of the company, $80,000, and it will be seen the whole amount paid out of that appropriation was $217,550, leaving a balance of $32,450 for the support of the printing establishment and work of the session of 1872–73. The work of this session was enormous. It is true that additional appropriations of $50,000 for the current printing and $50,000 for the permanent printing of that session were made; but the amounts were not paid, nor provision made for payment, until the session of 1873–74, when certificates of indebtedness receivable for taxes were ordered to be issued to the printing company in payment of their claim."

*Robert Smalls was a member of the constitutional convention then sitting.

Now, here is the evidence which fastens the bribery on Smalls:

ZEALY'S TESTIMONY.

Lawrence N. Zealy, being recalled says (pages 360-361, report on frauds): "I have examined the following check, No. 17, payable to cash, signed by J. Woodruff, amounting to $5,000.

"No. 17.] "COLUMBIA, S. C., January 19, 1873.

"South Carolina Bank and Trust Co. of Columbia: Pay to cash or bearer five thousand dollars.

"$5,000. "J. WOODRUFF.

"(Indorsed 'A,' and the figures 584.)"

And find on reference to the Journal "A," page 437 of books South Carolina Bank and Trust Company, on Saturday, January —, 1873, a check for $5,000 charged to J. Woodruff. The check bears date 19th January, 1873, and, the necessary amount of funds being to the credit of J. Woodruff, was charged to his account on Saturday, the 18th of January, 1873, Sunday being the 19th January, 1873. I also find in individual ledger, page 584, as designated on margin of Journal "A," page 437, the same amount charged to J. Woodruff, and that said check appears by following deposit slip, viz:

SOUTH CAROLINA BANK AND TRUST COMPANY.
Columbia, S. C., January 18, 1873.

Deposited by Hon. Robert Smalls.

Gold
Currency
Checks W	$5,000
Total

The above having been placed to the credit of Hon. Robert Smalls, for, upon examination of Journal "B," page 437, Saturday, January 18, 1873, I find the following entry: "Hon. Robert Smalls, credit $5,000." And by reference to the following number (875) on said page 437 of Journal "B," which number (875) refers to the number of the page on which the account headed "Hon. Robert Smalls" appears, the following entry is found:

"1873. Jan. 18. By deposit (No. 437), $5,000. (Individual ledger.) Said deposit check, referred to above, bears the letter 'W' after the word 'check' on same line which indicates that the deposit made was a check; and it was the habit of the officers of the bank when a check was deposited by any person to place the first letter of the maker of the check's name upon the deposit slip. From the appearance of the letter 'W' and the entry in the books I have no hesitation in saying that it refers to the check of J. Woodruff, charged on the same day to J. Woodruff's account and placed to the credit of the Honorable Robert Smalls."

It has been claimed that as January 19, 1873, was Sunday, there is a mistake. It is evident, however, that this was simply a clerical error likely to be made in any transaction, for the books of the bank show that the money was deposited on January 18. However, it is conclusive from the testimony of Zealy that Smalls did receive the check and that the check was fraudulent.

LEGISLATIVE EXPENSES.

The next thing, after passing from this matter of printing, to which I will direct your attention is the table prepared by the same committee from the record covering legislative expenses. I will not attempt to tire the patience of this body by going over the figures; I will pick out items here and there and print the whole for the information of those who shall read this exposé. The number of clerks employed in 1870-71 was 349 (we have been wrangling here to-day about keeping seven poor little fellows who came here to do clerical work); 1872, 176; 1873-74, 126, and so on through the list. They had 124 pages one session [laughter]. One for every member of the house [laughter]. They had 144 messengers one year and 212 another. The total amount expended under the head of legislative expenses during the first two years was $822,000; during the next year, $1,533,574; the next year, $908,855, and the next year, $922,536. The table referred to is as follows:

EXHIBIT J. O. H.—Showing the expenditures on account of legislative expenses for the several sessions of 1870-71, 1871-72, 1872-73, 1873-74, and the number of officers and attachés employed under Republican administrations, as contrasted with like expenditures, sessions 1876-77, under Democratic rule.

GIGANTIC SWINDLES.

Now, not satisfied that the taxes were five millions more than were necessary, you will recall that the State treasurer spoke of the disappearance of seven millions of assets belonging to the State, being the assets of the bank of the State and the stock of the State in different railroads which she had lent her credit to. Here is what the committee says about it:

Since the day of the coming of this man to South Carolina there has been perpetrated upon the people of the State a series of frauds, great and small, many of which have been already made the subject of comment and all of which mark out together an era challenging comparison for its infamy with any history within the period of modern times. In each case the familiar footprints of this man are to be seen and measured, and most to be found in the forefront of the mottled army of plunderers, as "the years of good stealing in South Carolina" have come and gone.

That was one of his bonmots which he got off, I suppose, in the statehouse barroom when he remarked that there were "five more years of good stealing in South Carolina." This is the only record he has left here in the memory of these people. In a general way, if you ever hear his name mentioned, some one speaks and says: "Oh, yes; John J. Patterson is the one who said that there were five more years of good stealing in South Carolina."

The committee says further:

At that time the State owned large amounts of stock in various railroad companies in the State which had been acquired in consideration of public bounties conferred upon these corporations, and also other property of various descriptions which for the moment was not productive of income. The most direct method of securing the controlling interest was to procure legislation to authorize the sale of the stock held by the State in the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and to this end the act was passed creating the sinking fund commission, composed of Governor Scott, Attorney-General Chamberlain, Comptroller Neagle, the chairman of the committee on ways and means of the house, and the chairman of the committee on finance of the senate, and authorizing them to sell all unprotective property belonging to the State. Ostensibly the purpose of this act was to dispose of the damaged granite and marble and other material lying around the statehouse grounds.

The real purpose was consummated by the sale of 21,698 shares of stock in the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company—which cost the State $20 per share, aggregating $433,960—at $2.75 per share, aggregating $59,909.50 This was followed, of course, by a sacrifice of the interest of the State in all other corporations and the accumulation of a fund, all of which (in gross violation of the letter of the act) was transferred to the financial agent and lost. The evidence hereto appended is conclusive that this act was passed by bribery, the means for which were furnished by H. H. Kimpton. The stock was sold without advertisement on the day after the bill was passed and approved, and without any action of the commissioners either authorizing its sale or limiting the price at which it should be sold, and was paid for by Kimpton's receipt as financial agent in New York for the amount of the bid. No money passed, and the fund transferred to Kimpton's books was "sunk" beyond recovery in the devious processes of hypothecation and general bond swindling.

After a majority of the stock in the company was obtained by this arrangement and by purchases from private parties, and the ring thus placed in control of its affairs, the scheme which was the objective point of the operation was brought into play in the shape of a "bill relating to the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company," prepared by Attorney-General Chamberlain, and on the 17th day of February, 1871, introduced by Timothy Hurley, one of the ring, for the purpose of a further issue of bonds and giving them a value in the market. In the fifth section of this act will be found the gist of the matter. The State then held a lien for indemnity against her indorsement upon one million and a half of guaranteed bonds of this company, so that subsequent bonds would be of little or no value and could not be sold by the ring. By this section the lien was postponed to bonds to be issued under a second mortgage, thus enabling the ring to divide and put their bonds on the market, while the only security held by the State was swept away and a contingent debt of $1,500,000 fixed upon the State without indemnity.

Who were the partners in this swindle? "The financial board was composed of Governor Scott, Treasurer Parker, and Attorney-General Chamberlain. Kimpton paid out of the proceeds of the sale of State bonds the money for a share and a half for Neagle, comptroller-general, who had the general supervision of the bonded debt; one share for Crews, who was chairman of the committee on railroads in the house; one quarter share for Cardozo, secretary of state, who had the sealing of all the bonds; two and a half shares for Waterman, for Governor Scott; one-half share for Attorney-General Chamberlain, and two shares for Kimpton himself, and one share for Leslie, land commissioner." These are the men who stole all the State's interest in the Greenville and Columbia Railroad. Then had the legislature, after they had gotten control of the railroad, to steal the balance from the widows and orphans and other stockholders of the State. They got their power to do these infamies through the members from Beaufort and other negroes, who misrepresented our people in those days under bayonet rule and carpetbag government.

THE IMPEACHMENT SWINDLE.

The next steal to which I will direct your attention briefly is what is called the "impeachment swindle," and again John J. Patterson shines out with an immoral preeminence as the prince of scoundrels.

Again let the investigating committee speak:

The second noteworthy achievement of John J. Patterson, following that connected with the Columbia and Greenville Railroad Company, was in quite a different field of action. The investigations made into the management of the issuing, sale, and hypothecation of State bonds made it plain that the financial board, composed of Governor Scott, Treasurer Parker, and Attorney-General Chamberlain, had fraudulently and illegally issued several millions of State bonds, and it was determined to bring these parties to trial by impeachment. C. C. Bowen, then a member from Charleston, on the 18th of December, 1871, introduced a resolution to impeach R. K. Scott of high crimes and misdemeanors.

This was Patterson's opportunity. With the assistance of Worthington he gave encouragement by day to the friends of the measure and by night worked upon the credulity of Scott, "running with the hare and holding with the hounds." When the scheme was ripe, and Scott became thoroughly alarmed, he engaged the services of those worthies to buy up a majority of the members of the house, and issued to them for this purpose three "armed-force" warrants, in blank as to amounts and names of persons to whom payable, leaving these important matters to be attended to by Patterson. In 1869 the joint resolution was passed authorizing the governor to employ an armed force for the preservation of the peace, "the expenses of which were to be paid out of any funds in the treasury not otherwise appropriated."

It was from this convenient fund, then ready to hand, that the warrants were drawn—one filled up with the name of John Mooney for $25,545, another in the name of John Leggert for $10,000, and the third in the name of David H. Wilson for $13,500. All of these names are fictitious, but were nevertheless indorsed on the warrants. The two first were collected by F. S. Jacobs, who was cashier of Hardy Solomon's bank and Patterson's confidential friend. The third order was collected by Hardy Solomon, president of the bank. The financial arrangement thus concluded, Patterson and Worthington did their work faithfully, and with the money of the State bought for Scott and Parker immunity for their crimes.

In the progress of this double-dyed villiany it became evident that if an adjournment over to the holidays could be effected and the members then permitted to return to their homes, where the sentiment of the people was unanimous against the thieves, it would require more money to purchase the recusant members than the State treasury could afford.

Another source of annoyance to the financial ring was the report of the joint investigating committee, which was already printed and ready for delivery, and which fully established their guilt. Whipper had the floor, and intended to speak until the hour of adjournment had arrived, and unless he could be seated the vote could not be had before adjournment. In this emergency the services of the speaker, F. J. Moses, jr., were secured by the payment of a large sum of money out of the militia fund, whereupon Samuel J. Lee, a ready tool of the ring, rose to a question of privilege, upon which Moses ruled promptly, and thus removed Whipper from the floor.

Meantime Governor Scott had issued a proclamation convening the general assembly on the day following the day fixed for adjournment, on the dignified ground that it was "neither decent nor proper, and is injurious to the State, for the general assembly to adjourn from the 22d of December, 1871, to the 5th of January, 1872, whilst the governor and treasurer are charged with high crimes and misdemeanors." The high and chivalric tone of these two worthies, who could steal the money of the people by the millions and yet could not brook the indignity of remaining under a threat of impeachment for a week, even for the sake of the joyous festivity of Christmas, ought to have redeemed a multitude of sins. Under such threats and persuasions and preliminary trickery further debate was cut off, and the resolution of impeachment was defeated by an overwhelming vote—63 to 27. In this controversy R. B. Elliott bore a prominent part in behalf of the persecuted officials, and received warrants on the "armed-force fund" to the amount of $10,500, which were fully paid to him out of the treasury in January and February, 1872.

And then they go on and show how the warrants were paid. I notice here the name of W. J. Whipper, another delegate on this floor, whose pathetic appeal and eloquent portrayal of the consequences of our act should we pass the suffrage plan has been sent broadcast. Whipper's name appears in a good light in the impeachment swindle. He was among those who were endeavoring to impeach Scott. He was on the floor, and the hour for adjournment was fixed by resolution. Speaker Moses took him off the floor after he had received $10,000 for doing it. And the negroes, who had been bribed in the meantime—Patterson got enough of them, buying them up cheap, paying the big ones $500 and $300, etc., and the small ones a less amount—voted down the impeachment resolution.

I am sorry now I have to pay my respects to the gentleman from Beaufort in another aspect. I believe, judging from his speech, which he made extemporaneously, he is the ablest man of color I have ever met. But the proof lies here, overwhelming and undeniable, that he, too, on divers occasions, was a bribe taker, and that, in addition to that, while secretary of the sinking-fund commission, he perpetrated a scheme to get some of the State's money. He sold State property for $7,000, then he brought a bill for services as attorney for $8,000, pocketed all he had sold the property for, and brought the State out in debt to him. [Laughter.]

I am sorry to have to bring this fact out on a member of this body, but that member stood here as a representative of the negro race and threatened us with direful consequences if we pressed forward to secure to our posterity immunity from such danger in future. I am forced, in self-defense and as a vindication of our action, to bring out the fact that while he was a representative of the people he participated in this wrong and robbery and stealage, and he must appear in the eyes of the world as simply wanting a possible return of John J. Patterson's "five years more of good stealing."

TESTIMONY AS TO W. J. WHIPPER'S VARIOUS DEFALCATIONS.

Regarding the contract for furnishing the statehouse, he says he never had any contract at all to do the furnishing. Says that in the summer of 1870, when Moses was speaker of the house, Moses asked him if he would like to make the purchase of the furniture for the hall of representatives and the committee rooms in the new statehouse, which was fast being completed. He replied he would like to do so. Speaker Moses gave him an order to furnish the necessary articles for fitting up the representative hall and committee rooms.

On the strength of this order witness contracted with M. H. Berry, of this city, to furnish the desks, chairs, and everything that came in his line. Mr. Berry then proceeded to New York with him and took him to the manufacturers, where selections were made. Mr. Berry's bill amounted to, as near as can be remembered, about $12,000. He purchased of Messrs. Stewart, Stephen & Co., of Brooklyn, N. Y., the carpets, lambrequins, cornices, etc., that came within their line, and of Messrs. Nicol, Davidson & Co., chandeliers, cuspidors, etc., that came within their line. Does not remember the exact amount of their bills, but thinks the three accounts of Berry, Nicol & Davidson, and Stewart, Sutphen & Co. aggregated about $40,000.

Byars, from Orangeburg, moved for a committee of nine to be appointed for the purpose of investigating the furniture account, which motion was carried, and he (Byars) became chairman of it. (Page 190).

When the call for reports from special committees was made Byars rose and reported that the committee had carefully considered the accounts for furnishing the house of representatives and committee rooms, and recommended that they be paid ninety-two thousand some hundreds of dollars (does not recollect the exact amount), and that the account of W. E. Rose for $190 for board of some of the workmen engaged in putting down carpets and putting up chandeliers, etc., be not paid. After this came a question as to how the certificates for payment of the $92,000 should be drawn. Byars being afraid if they were drawn to the merchants who furnished the goods that they would not indorse and hand over the certificates in excess of the amount due them.

It was finally decided to draw them all in favor of witness and let him take the amounts and hand over to the parties who furnished the goods, and indorse all of the others and they could be distributed among the friends of the $92,000 report. To this witness consented, thinking in that way he could prevent the payment of all of the certificates except those justly due to parties who had in good faith furnished the goods. This was done; and witness went to Governor Scott and told him what he had done, and if he (the governor) would now assist in having paid the amount actually and honestly due to the parties who furnished the goods, the amount being only about $40,000, that he (witness) would then go before any court and swear that the excess in the hands of the members of the legislature was a fraud and ought not to be paid. Governor Scott said he could do nothing about it.

The witness testified that among the 40 members amongst whom the certificates were divided "W. J. Whipper received a certificate for himself for $3,000." (Pages 190, 191, and 192.)

Later on (page 843) John B. Dennis further testified:

I think I have mentioned in my previous testimony that the amount of pay certificates given to Whipper was $3,000. I remember distinctly that some time afterwards he complained that the warrant was less than he was to have received.

F. E. Wilder, being duly sworn, deposed and said (page 844):

I reside in Beaufort County, in this State. I was treasurer of that county from the early part of 1871 to the latter part of 1872, and from some time in 1876 to the early part of 1877. In the spring of 1872 (I think some time in the month of March) I cashed several legislative pay certificates for W. J. Whipper, who was member of the general assembly from that county. I do not remember how many of them I cashed, but I think the amount was over $3,000.

House certificate, dated March 1, 1872, in favor of Paul Brown, for $1.80), for amount of account for legislative expenses; house certificate, dated February 29, 1872, in favor of Patrick Dunner, for $1,000, for amount of account for legislative expenses; and house certificate, dated March 13, 1872, in favor of W. J. Whipper, for $36, for per diem for attending as a member of the house of representatives—all fastened together, and the latter, indorsed "1748 S. E. Wilder, $2,836, March 29, 1872," being shown to witness, he says:

"I think these are the certificates or part of the certificates I have mentioned I cashed for W. J. Whipper. I turned in these certificates to the State treasurer as cash on account of taxes on the 20th of March, 1872. I know that is the date I turned them in, because that is the date of my receipt to the State treasurer for the amount of them. I have this day examined my receipt at the State treasury. My receipt in the State treasurer's book is numbered 1748, corresponding with the number on the back of the certificate in favor of W. J. Whipper. I am entirely satisfied I got all these certificates from W. J. Whipper, for this reason, amongst others: That the only persons whose claims I cashed that spring were Smalls, Myers, Bascomb, Nehemiah, and Whipper, and none of these certificates were amongst the claims I cashed for the first four persons. Smalls's claim was a treasurer's duebill; Myers's claims were pay certificates, all drawn in the name of Myers; Bascomb's claims were two pay certificates, one drawn in his own name, and both amounting to only $300 to $400, and Nehemiah's claim was a pay certificate drawn in his own name—according to my impression it was drawn in his own name—and was about for $900. I received no such certificates, such as those now shown to me, from anybody but Whipper, and therefore I say I am entirely satisfied that I got all of them from him.

"(Signed) F. E. WILDER."

THE FURNITURE STEAL.

John Williams, being duly sworn, deposes on oath as follows: "I acted as sergeant-at-arms of the house of representatives while F. J. Moses, jr., and S. J. Lee, esqs., were, respectively, speakers of the house. It was part of my duty, under a resolution of the house, to purchase supplies for the house of representatives by order of the speaker.

"While Moses was speaker I purchased some bedroom sets and delivered them at the building of Mr. Greenfield, at the corner over Muller's store, and furnished eight rooms. Two of them were occupied by Gen. W. J. Whipper." (Page 171.)

"I know that large quantities of furniture were furnished by Mr. Berry each session; that as soon as the general assembly adjourned the furniture disappeared, and that I was compelled, under the order of the speaker or some committee chairman, to refurnish all the rooms as soon as the legislature met. I was told that it was my business to furnish the rooms; that after that I had nothing more to do with them or the furniture in them; consequently it was, in my opinion, stolen by parties who had charge of it."

SINKING FUND FRAUDS.

The joint investigating committee makes this report pertaining to the sinking fund commission and frauds therein (page 850, Report on Public Frauds):

But for brazen effrontry we call attention to the transactions and testimony of W. J. Whipper, at one time a member and secretary of this remarkable commission. He admitted in his testimony, with shameless audacity, that he had received certain State bonds and money which he appropriated to his own use. It seems that he was employed by the commission at one time to negotiate the sales of some public property. He not only negotiated certain sales, but he converted the proceeds unlawfully, and perhaps feloniously, to his own use, and when pressed for settlement appears with an account current, which, we venture, cannot be equaled in any business transaction. He sold property amounting to $6,517.99, and credits himself with $7,033.33 for professional services, although the evidence shows conclusively that he was never employed as attorney for the commission.

Gen. W. J. Whipper being sworn, says (page 851): "During the legislative terms embracing the sessions of 1870-71 and 1871-72 I was chairman of the house committee of ways and means and ex officio a member of the sinking fund commission. I was secretary of the commission for a portion of that time, succeeding J. L. Neagle as such. I have some bonds of the sinking fund commission in my possession and one paper, the latter being a receipt of D. H. Chamberlain, then attorney-general, for a note of J. B. Dennis (receipt produced and turned over to the committee). The bonds are only constructively in my possession. They are in possession of Gen. William Gurney as collateral for a loan made to me. I got the bonds in payment for a tract of land situate in Charleston, sold to Henry Bischoff by me as secretary of the commission.

"I do not remember what class of bonds they were, except that they were State bonds of one of the issues since reconstruction. The amount of them was $4,500, or about that amount. General Gurney has had them since the summer of 1872. They were put up with a number of other collaterals to obtain a running loan. I was then doing business with General Gurney, who was my factor at that time. I deem it proper to state that I was at that time secretary and also attorney for the commission, both when I received the bonds and when I pledged them as collateral. The loans were for me individually. I have not seen General Gurney about the bonds nor endeavored to procure them. * * * I claim a balance in my favor of $1,638.63, for which I hold the bonds above named. I have not with me the itemized particulars of my claims against the commission. I claim nothing as secretary or member. My claim is for actual expenses and as attorney's fees, and amounts to $8,156.62."

J. L. Neagle, the predecessor of Whipper as secretary of the sinking fund commission, swears (page 855): "W. J. Whipper was authorized, as secretary of the sinking-fund commission, to sell some real estate in Charleston. He was never employed as attorney for the commission to my knowledge."

I leave it to all disinterested men to judge of Whipper's guilt or innocence.

THE BLUE RIDGE STEAL.

There is next the Blue Ridge steal. The State had a mortgage on the Blue Ridge road, having advanced large sums of money in the effort to reach the Northwest by a railroad through the Blue Ridge Mountains, and held practically the title to the road—that is, the State and Charleston jointly. We have $4,000,000—$4,200,000, I think—of Blue Ridge scrip issued fraudulently, and there is a lawsuit now pending in the United States court to force this State to pay the Blue Ridge scrip issued by that legislature in defiance of the law and now held as an obligation by a gentleman in New York, who claims that it was hypothecated with him as security for money, and it seems to me that we are never to be rid of the consequences of this misrule. The penitentiary down here cost $900,000; that is the sum added together here as the amount appropriated during those years of Radical government.

I will pass on, Mr. President, merely mentioning that a large sum—about $500,000—was spent for the militia; and you all remember that during those dark days of 1872, 1873, and 1874 there was hardly a Saturday night of the year that a drumbeat of some negro militia company was not in the earshot of each one of you, while threats were made by these negro soldiery that they intended to rise up and exterminate the white men from the face of the earth and take this country.

A PREEMINENT SCOUNDREL.

I have shown you by the records and the report of this committee that of all the thieves and scoundrels and villains who fastened their fangs upon the throat of this State and sucked its lifeblood John J. Patterson must be given preeminence.

What did they do for Patterson—these negroes? He bought enough of them to send him to the United States Senate as a representative in that august assemblage of this grand old State, to occupy the chair that has been graced by Calhoun and Hayne. Here is what the committee says about it:

In conclusion, the undersigned respectfully report that the election of the Hon. J. J. Patterson to the Senate of the United States on December 10, 1872, was procured by corruption and bribery.

They would further remark that the legislature of 1872-73 was largely composed of new members, and that they were most solemnly pledged to a correction of past abuses and to the inauguration of real reforms. Some of the members may have been unfit for the discharge of the important duties of legislation by reason of ignorance, yet came to Columbia with a desire, in an humble way, to do what was right. John J. Patterson enjoys the unenviable position of having been the first to place before them the poisoned chalice of temptation and to corrupt them with its enticing drafts. Need we wonder that they were intoxicated and fell? Then followed a wild saturnalia of public plunder, the record of which furnishes nothing which is at all pleasant to investigate or to perpetuate in history.

This report is signed by John R. Cochran, chairman, a Republican; Henry A. Meetze, of the senate; Gerhard Muller, J. C. Sheppard, and S. Dibble, of the house.

Now, I have alluded to the fact of this villainy, anarchy, misrule, and robbery, and I can not, in any words I possess, paint it. There is no man on this floor living in the country who dared during that dark period to leave his fireside without dread that when he returned he would find some harm to his family; and he dared not go forth without being armed, fearful of robbery. The sky was lit almost every night by the glare of burning dwellings and ginhouses. Our courts of justice were filled with bribe takers, and the judges themselves were not free from bribery. How did it come about, and who must bear the blame? We are told the negroes did not do it. "Oh, we didn't do it," they say. [Addressing the negro delegates.] You blindly followed and obeyed the orders of the Freedman's Bureau and the Union League and ignored the appeals of your former masters, who treated you with kindness and furnished you with your daily bread.

I myself can testify that appeal after appeal was made by me, and by almost every white man in this State, with the negroes with whom he came in contact on his plantation: "Stop! come back! help us free ourselves from this burden!" But every one of you, almost up to 1876, blindly followed wherever these white thieves ordered. Was it negro government? The negroes furnished the ballots, and that is what we are dealing with. The negroes put the little pieces of paper in the box that gave the commission to these white scoundrels who were their leaders and the men who debauched them; and this must be our justification, our vindication, and our excuse to the world that we are met in convention openly, boldly, without any pretense of secrecy, to announce that it is our purpose, as far as we may without coming in conflict with the United States Constitution, to put such safeguards around this ballot in future, to so restrict the suffrage and circumscribe it, that this infamy can never come about again.

The negroes were the tools of designing white men, I acknowledge—participators and willing tools. The poor, ignorant cotton-field hand, who never reaped any advantage, nor saw anything except a pistol, blindly followed like sheep wherever their black and white leaders told them to go, voted unanimously every time for the Republican ticket during that dark period, and these results were achieved solely and wholly by reason of the ballot being in the hands of such cattle. Is the danger gone? No. How did we recover our liberty? By fraud and violence. We tried to overcome the 30,000 majority by honest methods, which was a mathematical impossibility. After we had borne these indignities for eight years life became worthless under such conditions.

Under the leadership and inspiration of Mart Gary, because he planned and brought about the straight-out movement of 1876, in spite of the low-country fighting on this floor against those who opposed putting Chamberlain forward as a compromise candidate—under his leadership and through his magnificent courage (for Edgefield alone gave us the excuse to claim the governorship) we won the fight. We had a legal right by her majority, but then Grant's bayonets were here to prop Chamberlain in the governor's chair. We were held in suspense from the meeting of the general assembly in November until Hayes's title had been settled by the electoral commission in March. The whole State was like a powder magazine. The people had sworn to have their liberties or to die.

How did we bring it about? Every white man sunk his personal feelings and ambitions. The white people of the State, illustrating our glorious motto, "Ready with their lives and fortunes," came together as one. By fraud and violence, if you please, we threw it off. In 1878 we had to resort to more fraud and violence, and so again in 1880. Then the registration law and eight-box system was evolved from the superior intelligence of the white man to check and control this surging, muddy stream of ignorance and to tell it to back, and since then we have carried our elections without resort to any illegal methods, simply because the whites were united. If we were to remain united it would still be desirable that we should guard against the possibility of this flood, which is now dammed up, breaking loose, or like the viper that is asleep, only to be warmed into life again, and sting us whenever some more white rascals, native or foreign, come here and mobilize the ignorant blacks. Therefore the only thing we can do as patriots and as statesmen is to take from them every ballot that we can under the laws of our National Government.

I read a moment ago from the report of the committee that good government can only rest on intelligence and good morals. I will go further and say that good government and the very life of republics rest on virtue, patriotism, and intelligence. The chief amongst the three is intelligence. It has been said, and it must be apparent to any one who thinks, that even if we restrict the suffrage as we propose, with 40,000 conservatives and 40,000 reformers, divided and striving for mastery, and 15,000 illiterate white men disfranchised, the negroes are still here in sufficient numbers to control us.

Are we so besotted, so forgetful and oblivious of the record which I have just read to you? Have our memories grown so callous that we as a white race—kinsmen, brothers, common inheritors of the glorious past and of the freedom transmitted to us by our forefathers—have we got to the point where we can not unite as brothers, throwing aside the petty bickerings and animosities that have been engendered in the last five years, and without regard to personal ambition or partisan advantage to anybody, can we not provide so that we will not have to appeal to these people as arbiters of our fate? Can we not rise to the necessities of the occasion and put into this constitution such an article in reference to suffrage as will guarantee, as far as the law can guarantee, to future generations that they shall have the blessings of Anglo-Saxon civilization and liberty in this State? How pitiable, how puerile, ineffably, unutterably contemptible appear the personal ambitions and petty spites of men alongside of this grand and glorious purpose!

I am sorry that I feel constrained briefly to touch upon this matter now from a different standpoint. I shall be as brief as the subject will permit. I feel almost willing to stop now and leave unuttered any word in answer to what has been said this morning, and to leave it to the patriotism and wisdom of this body to move forward and not hesitate. We were told something about perfect equality of white men; that the poor tenant who has nothing but his wife and children, who labors for his daily bread from year's end to year's end, gathering no property, is equal to the highest man in this State. I grant it. It has been my cardinal doctrine as a public man that all white men, as far as the enjoyment of the privileges of government and the emoluments of office are concerned, should be equal in this State, and that the majority alone should govern. But that doctrine can not be brought in here as a reason why we must stop and pause and falter in our purpose to secure to our posterity good government, unless you carry it further; and if you are going to bring in the universal brotherhood of man as an argument here, then are not the blacks as much entitled to that consideration as anybody? The logical conclusion is inevitable.

On this question of suffrage it is said that some men's right to vote will be jeopardized. If there was any way under high heaven by which we could do more than we have done, in God's name I would glory and honor the man, and bow down and submit to his leadership, if he would show us. What do they offer us? A continuation of the existing conditions and perpetuation of fraud or fraudulent methods; and the sword of Damocles suspended over our heads by a single hair swings, and swings, and swings; and all that is necessary to bring about chaos is for a sufficient number of white men, actuated by hate, or ambition, or from any unpatriotic motive, to climb up and cut it loose, mobilize and register the negroes, lead them and give them a free vote and a fair count under manhood suffrage.

Some men have seduced themselves into believing that the best white men, the so-called better class, of which we have heard so much within the last few years, could form an alliance with this black substratum, and that our liberties would not be endangered. What folly! The point can not be controverted that whenever enough white men go with that class and bring them forward, the so-called best white men may get in office once, twice, or thrice by means of the negro majority led by the white minority, but the struggle for the control of that vote will just as invariably debauch, demoralize, and lower and finally corrupt and make rotten the public morals as that the sun shines in the heavens.

The men who sink nearest to their level in social equality, as Moses, Chamberlain, and those scoundrels did, can always command their support. And you will always be confronted with the possibility, the probability, and even the certainty of it coming to pass at some time, until you shall have reduced their voting strength so that there will never be enough of them to do more than to put either one white faction or the other in control of the government. And even that, which we can not help, stands here as fixed as the law of the Medes and Persians by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments—and yet you hesitate to make the evil as small as possible and minimize the danger!

Allusion has been made to the fact that several prominent gentlemen met in this city to see if there could be any terms of amity, any treaty of peace between the warring factions in this State, and the words "ingrate" and "traitor" have been used in connection with my name as a participant.

What was the condition? The minority faction had opposed almost to a man the calling of this constitutional convention. Demagogues of a certain stripe had used the newspapers of the State to threaten and terrify the poor whites with the possible and probable loss of their ballots if the constitutional convention was called. Spartanburg, which had never suffered from negro domination and which can never suffer in its local affairs from negro domination, voted overwhelmingly against the constitutional convention. When the fight seemed almost lost and those of us who had struggled for ten years or more, in season and out of season, whenever an opportunity offered, to urge upon the people the wisdom and necessity for calling a convention and taking care of our posterity by limiting the suffrage, when we felt that the fight was desperate, in October a meeting was called at Ridgeway. The governor and myself and the chairman of the Democratic executive committee, who has let his tongue run so loosely, were invited and promised to go there and discuss the question.

The people sent us here, and they elected numbers of you without regard to your factional differences in the past; they sent you here as patriots; they have sent you here although you have opposed them in politics, and I thank God for it, because it has been demonstrated on this floor that we are all actuated by high and noble purposes except where our personal ambitions are concerned, and we vote here as free men and equals, at no man's dictation. They say I have been shorn of my strength and my influence; that I have been measured here by my logic and my capacity to argue; that I have been turned down time and time again. I thank God that if I have it has proved to others here that I am no more than anyone else. I am simply trying to do my duty, and will always try to do it as I see it. I am not infallible, and do not claim to be. While I have never claimed that wisdom will die with me, I do say that it is my honest purpose and patriotic desire to advance the welfare and interest of this Commonwealth without regard to anyone who has opposed me in the past.

It has been charged, directly or indirectly, that the agreement entered into is still to be carried out, and the evidence is brought forward in the matter of the appointments of the committees and their chairmen.

As a matter of fact, which seems to be forgotten, the members of the Charleston delegation are representatives of the recalcitrant, irreconcilable faction there. Did they not turn Hemphill and Barnwell down in their convention and send straight-outs square from the shoulder like men? Where, then, is the connection, the bond of union between those of us on the reform side who participated in that conference and the representatives from Charleston? Barnwell could no more control his people for peace, unity, and harmony than I [Tillman]. Mitchell, Barker, Farrow, Bryan, and the rest of them came here as the representatives of public opinion in Charleston, and they do represent it. They have excited no bitterness here. If they have any feeling of resentment they have hid it like patriots.

The gentleman from that city who has been associated with me on the committee on suffrage has shown a high patriotic purpose, a complete willingness to cooperate in saving the right of suffrage for the poor and illiterate white men as far as he could. His consummate legal ability has been of incalculable benefit to the committee. He came into the committee possibly with prejudice against me. I acknowledge I went in it with prejudice against him, because he has been fighting the dispensary. [Laughter.] We have come to know each other better, and I feel warranted in saying that we will part with the highest mutual respect, if not friendship. And so I trust it will be with all of us. We will return to our homes with a higher purpose and a broader view, and if we must differ we will differ like decent white men, and go into the forum of reason and try to convince our constituents as to which man is right, and when the voters have spoken at the Democratic primary, as white men, we will present a united front to the remnant of the black cohorts whom we have come here to reduce and paralyze.

We have been told had we dared hint to the people that it was our purpose to incorporate an educational qualification in this constitution we would not have been sent here; that we would have been run off the stump. I spoke at Edgefield, Barnwell, and elsewhere. I concealed nothing. How do you propose to get around the Chinese wall, the impassable bulwark which the fifteenth amendment throws around the negroes, except by an educational or property qualification.

The desire has been on the part of the gentleman from Laurens to perpetuate the understanding clause, keep up the present system, the eight-box law, the registration law, and all. You can not do it, gentlemen. The people do not want it any longer; they are tired and sick of it unto death. With existing conditions there is nothing left; no man's ingenuity can contrive or conceive of anything to do except to put an educational or property qualification, or both. The property qualification straight would disfranchise 30,000 people, white men, who own nothing in their own names, and it is contrary to all my ideas of principle, fairness, and right, because some of these very men are the most intelligent of our citizens. I said last night that the chalice was poisoned. Some have said there is a fraud in this understanding clause. Some poisons in small doses are very salutary and valuable medicines. If you put it in here that a man must understand, and you vest the right to judge whether he understands in an officer, it is a constitutional act. That officer is responsible to his conscience and his God—he is responsible to nobody else. There is no particle of fraud or illegality in it. It is just simply showing partiality, perhaps [laughter], or discriminating.

Now, to return to the gentleman from Laurens. If you look down the vista or the pathway which he asks you to take, you see no signs of light or rays of hope. You see nothing there but the dire alternative that some time in the near future we shall have white men struggling to get possession of the negro vote and a continuation of the present iniquitous system. I desire to say this for the benefit of his constituents more than his. Let this convention reject our scheme or modify it or not, it is written as we want it passed. We are responsible for it, all except Mr. Henry, who has disclaimed any paternity of the educational and property qualification, and I am ready to rise or fall by it and to meet the gentleman in Laurens or Spartanburg or any other county in this State and show to the people that I have not betrayed them, that I have not broken any pledges, that I am not an ingrate, that I am not a traitor, that I have acted as their best friend, and have stood squarely by all the pledges I ever made and have endeavored to rise to the height of a statesman. I will go to Spartanburg, where the 2,000 majority on the other side is. I am not afraid to meet him anywhere, because right is right and truth is truth, and with these two bucklers I am ready to face any man that God ever made where my public acts or my private life are brought in question.

The bugaboo of possible injunction against the understanding clause is brought in here to throw discord among us and to terrify timid men. Well, now, any lawyer, the merest tyro in the profession, who knows anything about it, knows that no one can go into court and get an injunction unless he alleges personal damage or wrong, and the man would go there under this law simply to get his own rights, and not to keep other people from being registered, and the court, if the question was brought up, might ask what harm had come to him by refusal to register under the understanding clause, and the court might say it was unconstitutional, but it would go from one court to another, and by the time it was decided, as Mr. Bryan has said, we would be on firm ground with the educational qualification pure and simple, and our suffrage plan would be based on a rock.

A few more words, Mr. President, and I will conclude. I believe this is about the longest speech I ever made in my life. I shall briefly discuss the resolution of the gentleman from Marlboro as to striking out the money clause—the $300 clause. Now, he said that to allow one illiterate who had $300 to register and vote and to prohibit another illiterate who did not have $300 was an unjust discrimination. Mr. President, the millennium has not yet come, and I am afraid it will not come in this day and generation, if ever. Perfect equality before the law in taxation or anything else is an impossibility. That theory is in our law and in our Constitution, but it has never been put in practice in any court in any county in this State. I would like to ask him, as he pleads so strenuously against the injustice of having one illiterate with property to register and another not, why did he forget to mention the injustice of allowing a man who is educated to register and the man who is not to register? You did not say anything about it; you took mighty good pains to leave it untouched.

Mr. ROGERS. I will answer the question. I recognize as fair and right the principle that an intelligent ballot is the safeguard of any community, but I can see no reason, and you can show no reason, why two illiterate men, both standing on equality in every other respect, one should be given this privilege over the other simply because of the fact that he has a few dollars.

Senator TILLMAN. The very fact that he has a few dollars is a sufficient reason of itself to show that he is probably a better citizen, is more industrious, thrifty, has accumulated something on which to pay taxes; and taxes without representation is repugnant to American liberty. By means of the $300 clause you simply reach out and take in some more white men and a few more colored men.

I can not see for the life of me why we should not go forward and not pander and cringe before people who do not understand that this does not restrict one single ballot—only gives it to a few more. That is the whole subject in a nut shell. If there is inequality in giving a man of property the ballot and prohibiting another who has none from voting, there is inequality in giving it to a man who can read and write fairly but has not got as much intelligence as his neighbor who can not. There are men in my neighborhood who came out of the war penniless who can not read and write because they never had the opportunity of going to school, yet they are good citizens and have accumulated property, are well to do, sending their children to school, but if they should not be able to read and write, under your restrictive purpose, if this convention should yield to you, they and similar men will be barred in the future from voting.

So far as I am concerned, and so far as the committee is concerned, we knew this thing would create a howl among a certain class. But what is the use to pander to the notions of these people? We are told it would be said: "Here is John Smith" (for instance), "a negro with $300, who can vote, and you can not because you have not got $300, and BEN TILLMAN, who was on the committee on suffrage, did it for you." I am ready to take the consequences. The convention can vote it down if they please, but I will never deny anywhere my connection with it, and I am ready to go to the people on it.

[NOTE.—The disclosures of the corruption and malfeasance in office on the part of the Republican officeholders, of which only a very small part is given in this speech, necessitated indictments in the State courts against almost every State and county officer in the State. On the other hand, the action of the white men who had participated in the Hamburg and Ellenton riots had resulted in the indictments in the United States court for intimidation, murder, etc., of probably 500 citizens. After one or two postponements in both courts, an agreement was reached in Washington by which indictments against all parties in both courts were nolle prossed, thus settling the matter of punishment by turning everybody loose.]

HON. DAVID A. DE ARMOND,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, March 24, 1900.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. SYDNEY P. EPES, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia.

"Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased"—

Mr. DE ARMOND said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Early in his Congressional career I became acquainted with SYDNEY P. EPES; and I was a member of the committee which attended his remains on the sad journey back to his Virginia home, where we laid away all that was mortal of him, for its long rest, in a modest graveyard in the shadow of the pines. I was not as close to him as some other friends were, but I knew him well enough to esteem him living and to remember him most kindly now that he has gone to that—

Undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns.

The sudden taking off of this young man in his prime must remind us forcibly of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death. With him death did not lay siege to the citadel of life and approach slowly through the years, undermining one defense after another, and finally, in the winter of age, take the ruin which none remained to defend and which had sunk into such a state of decay that nothing was left to be defended. In this case the assault was sudden, unexpected, irresistible. In the flush and bloom of health, in the sunny hour of the approaching noontide, when the sky was cloudless and the air resonant with hope, and the landscape bright with promise, the end came almost before the note of alarm could be sounded. In the shock of the sudden affliction, however, we are not without the comfort of beholding our friend, on the canvas of memory, in the cheerful garb of the young instead of the somber vestments of decrepitude.

Our departed friend may appropriately be spoken of as a Virginia gentleman. A Virginia gentleman! What a proud title of nobility. How much does it imply? Gentleness, courtesy, and hospitality blended with courage as daring and fortitude as abiding as flesh and blood, dominated by soul, ever knew. Kings have conferred titles of nobility, and vanity has paraded itself under their insignia; but such nobility as is the birthright of the Virginian gentleman emanates from a higher source than any earthly throne.

The politeness that is for the lowly as well and as full as for the most favored; the hospitality that is as natural as the balm of May and as genial as the sunshine to the opening flower; the courage that laughs in the blaze of the cannon and flinches not from the bayonet; the fortitude which adversity can not daunt or defeat dim—these great things are embedded by the Creator in the Virginia gentleman beyond the power, I verily believe, of even death to destroy. And our friend that has left us was a Virginia gentleman.

A pathetic incident came to our notice when we were on the sad mission of the funeral party—the very day that we buried the dead man was the day that he had expected to pass with his family in their quiet home. Instead of the fond husband hastening home to the loving wife, we bore a corpse to the desolate hearthstone of the stricken widow. The little children who waited in the happy hopefulness of young hearts for the kisses of the returning father dropped their orphans' tears into the new-made grave of the father whose lips had the death seal upon them.

Lovable and loved while living, we leave thee, dead friend, returning to our duties—the duties that rest upon the living. Thy work is done. And in the soil of old Virginia, so rich in the mold of statesmen and patriots and heroes, in the long, dreamless sleep into which all some time must sink, reposes the body of another Virginia gentleman, whose memory we fondly cherish.

Puerto Rico Tariff.

SPEECH

OF

HON. OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, March 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) to regulate the trade of Puerto Rico, and for other purposes—

Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Before the commencement of the Spanish-American war, under principles recognized by all nations as to the ownership of the territory over which they exercised national sovereignty, the Spanish Crown exercised exclusive sovereignty over the island of Puerto Rico.

Being thus possessed of the legal title to the island, Spain had the right to cede it to us, and the United States possessed an equal right to acquire the title to the island, especially when it was done with the consent of the inhabitants of the island.

The treaty of Paris was the contract by which the two nations respectively passed and acquired the title to the island, and there can be no question that from the moment the treaty was formally ratified by the two signatory powers the complete sovereignty of all the land in the island of Puerto Rico was vested in the Government of the United States, as much so as we have possessed the sovereign title to Alaska for a third of a century; and the inhabitants (except those who desired to retain their allegiance to the Spanish Crown under one clause of the treaty) became citizens of the United States. The ninth article of the treaty declares that the Spanish-born residents of the ceded islands who shall not elect to retain their old allegiance within a given time shall be deemed to have adopted "the nationality of the territory in which they may reside."

Puerto Rico possesses no government except that which we prescribe for it, and has no position in the house of nations except through the sovereignty of the United States. Then, of necessity, "the nationality of the territory" of Puerto Rico must be of the United States, and the inhabitants must be subject to the sovereign powers of our Government as against all other governments and therefore citizens of this country.

As to whether their rights and privileges as citizens are in any way different from that of the people of the several States I propose hereafter to discuss.

It must be remembered that the sovereign proprietorship of Alaska, the Indian Territory, New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma, Hawaii, and Puerto Rico are absolutely identical. This being true, the ultimate destiny of government, whether they will ultimately become States in the Union or not, is merely conditional upon the accidental results of Congressional legislation, and can not affect the sovereign proprietorship or the present status of their inhabitants.

The President of the United States has evinced a great anxiety to rule the people of Puerto Rico without constitutional restrictions, and the leaders of the Republican party have advanced ingenious arguments to prove that the Constitution is as foreign to this island as it was before the sovereign title to it was ceded to the United States by Spain. Their arguments show an anxiety to meet certain political conditions, rather than a determined purpose to now solve these constitutional questions from the standpoint from which they must ultimately be decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The most fallacious of these arguments is that which contends that rights granted to the citizens by the Constitution are not effective until Congress has by express legislation carried the Constitution into the new territory. This is probably due to the fact that heretofore Congress, as a matter of precaution in acts organizing new territory, has prescribed that they should be governed under constitutional restrictions.

It can not be denied that what Congress has the power to enact it has the power to repeal. Yet who will contend that Congress has the power to withdraw the protection of the Constitution from Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, or Alaska?

Indeed, in the case of Thompson vs. Utah (170 U. S., 343) the Supreme Court has declared that the right of trial by jury in that Territory was established by the Constitution, and not carried there by act of Congress.

Again, it is contended that a treaty provision is a law unto itself, and fixes the status of the new territory acquired and of its inhabitants; but the Supreme Court of the United States has disposed of this contention, in the case of Fing Yue Ting vs. United States (149 U. S., 698) and United States vs. Old Settlers (148 U. S., 427), in which it was held that if Congress passes a law inconsistent with a treaty pledge the law will be enforced and not the treaty.

In the case of the Cherokee Tobacco (11 Wallace, 616–620) the Supreme Court said, "It need hardly be said that a treaty can not change the Constitution or be held valid if in violation of that instrument. This results from the nature and fundamental principles of our Government;" and in Thomas vs. Gray (169 U. S., 264) the same court held that treaties are subordinate to the Constitution of the United States.

By some it is contended that the law of the Constitution does not extend beyond the States in the Union, but in the case of Callars vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540) the Supreme Court held the contrary doctrine.

In the cases of Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 317), Scott vs. Sandford (19 Howard, 393), Banks vs. County of Yankton (101 U. S., 129), Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., 1–67), Slaughterhouse Cases (16 Wallace, 36–72), McAllister vs. United States (141 U. S., 174–188), Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S., 15–44), and Capital Traction Company vs. Hof (174 U. S., 1) the Supreme Court have recognized the doctrines that the Constitution extends beyond the several States in the Union.

It can not be disputed that the Constitution contains some clauses which expressly or by implication relate solely to the States, but unquestionably the rights guaranteed to the individual citizen by the Constitution are operative wherever the sovereign power of the United States exists, be it in Virginia, Arizona, Alaska, Ohio, or Puerto Rico.

We now come directly to the constitutional questions raised in the bill before the House. Under its provisions a tariff duty of 15 per cent of the existing law is imposed on goods and merchandise brought from Puerto Rico into the Territorial limits of the United States as they existed before the Spanish war, and a like duty on goods and merchandise carried from this country into Puerto Rico.

Heretofore Congress has never attempted to impose new or extraordinary duties in new territory, but has contented itself by extending the existing tariff laws to the new territory. But the present Administration contends that the constitutional provision that "all duties, imports, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States" does not apply to Puerto Rico, and has, in violation of the Constitution, and without warrant of law, by an arbitrary act, maintained a war tariff in the islands, and now Congress is expected to follow the unwarranted precedent set by the President. The Secretary of War, in his last report to Congress, goes so far as to say:

> The provision of the Constitution, prescribing uniformity of duties throughout the United States was not meant for them—
> The Puerto Ricans—
> but was a provision of expediency solely, adapted to conditions existing in the United States upon the continent of North America.

The able lawyer who made this statement overlooks the fact that the provision of the Constitution I have last quoted is a guaranty to the individual citizen, a limitation of the power for his benefit; and as the power of taxation is an express grant to the Federal Government, I can not conceive how it is possible to extend the power, expressly derived under the Constitution, to Puerto Rico unless the limitations on the power goes with it.

Unless it is contended that the island of Puerto Rico, though subject to the sovereignty of this Government, is not a part of the United States as defined by the Constitution, to reach such a conclusion the decision of the Supreme Court in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheaton, 317–319) must be ignored, when the court says:

> Our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other.

This decision was rendered by Chief Justice Marshall, the expounder of the Constitution, and will probably be considered by the great tribunal that must ultimately try this case as of more weight than the opinion of the Secretary of War; and in the case of Cross vs. Harrison (16 Howard, 164–199) the Supreme Court held in the case of California, but then ceded to this Government by Mexico, and at that time occupying the identical position that Puerto Rico does now, that no import duties could be levied in California on articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, as no such duties can be imposed in any other part of the United States on the production of California.

But it is useless to further argue the law of the case; "none are so blind as those who will not see," and those who believe with me, that the guaranteed rights of the individual citizens in the Constitution are the greatest protection the common citizen has as against the overthrow of his rights and liberties by the concentration of power and wealth, will stand with the interpretation of the Constitution as given by the great judges who have adorned the Supreme Court bench, and will not become followers of the new school that can assert in December that "our plain duty is to abolish all custom tariffs between the United States and Puerto Rico, and give her products free access to our markets," as did the President, and in February declare that the Puerto Ricans had no rights that we were required to respect.

I have always recognized the Republican party as an opportunist party, ready at all times to abandon any position if it conceived that party advantage could be derived from the change; but never, in the wildest flights of my imagination, did I ever imagine that the Republican party would dare to openly declare that for the purpose of victory and spoils they were willing to abandon the rights guaranteed to the people under the Constitution.

On yesterday the able and eloquent gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] appealed to the Republican members of the House to support this bill, not for constitutional reasons, not for a protective tariff, not for principle, but to save the Republican party. To save it from what? Not from the anger of an outraged constituency, for the masses of the people are against this bill. To save you from whom, then? I know of none others for you to fear unless it be the anger of the subsidized interests who furnish the money for Republican campaigns.

But I for one believe the cause of suffering, starving Puerto Rico is just and right. I believe that you are attempting to place upon these poor conquered people an unjust burden of taxation; and when the case goes to trial before the bar of the public opinion in the next election, they will repudiate your party and drive you from power. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Conferring Jurisdiction on the Court of Claims in Certain Cases.

HON. T. M. MAHON,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, March 30, 1900,

On the bill (H. R. 909) conferring on the Court of Claims jurisdiction with respect to certain claims.

Mr. MAHON said:

HISTORY OF THE CASE.

By this bill it is intended to provide for the payment of losses resulting mainly from three hostile expeditions that were made into Pennsylvania during the late civil war. The losses occurred in the counties of Adams, Bedford, Franklin, Fulton, Somerset, York, Cumberland, and Perry, all lying immediately along the southern border of Pennsylvania, excepting Cumberland and Perry, which adjoin Franklin and Adams to the north.

By the chance of their location these border counties were the territory in the North over which our State authorities believed contending armies would march and pillage. Thus realizing that the southern border of the State would be very much exposed during the war of secession, and that the Southern armies would invade the State if no troops were put upon the border to prevent invasion, early steps were taken by the governor and legislature to protect it.

I now invite your attention to the special sacrifices made by Pennsylvania, in view of her exposed condition and anticipated invasion of her territory, and the appropriation by the Federal Government of the means of defense she had collected.

Shortly after the war of secession broke out, Governor Curtin, under the authority of the State of Pennsylvania, organized this body, spoken of as the Pennsylvania Reserves. This was done under an act of assembly entitled "An act to create a loan to provide for arming the State," approved 1861, which provided for the loan of $3,000,000 "to defray the expenses of organizing, arming, equipping, transferring, and supporting the military forces of this State now or hereafter to be called into the service in aid of the government of this State or of the United States."

It was provided by this act that the commander in chief, who was the governor, in connection with the officers composing the grand staff of the militia, were authorized to organize a military corps, to be called the Reserve Volunteer Corps of the Commonwealth, to be composed of thirteen regiments of infantry, one regiment of cavalry, and one regiment of light artillery; these regiments to be organized, armed, equipped, clothed, disciplined, governed, and officered as similar troops in the service of the United States, and to be enlisted in the service of the State for a period not exceeding three years, or for the war, unless discharged, and were liable to be called into the service of the State at such times as the commander in chief might deem their services necessary for the purpose of suppressing insurrections or to repel invasions, with the further provisions that they were liable to be mustered into the service of the United States, as of course they were upon a requisition by the General Government, whether so expressed in the act or not.

Further provisions were contained in the said act for the establishment of camps of instruction, and for the pay and rations of the said corps under the State authority.

Under that act the Pennsylvania Reserves were organized; they were put into camps of instruction, and they constituted a standing army reasonably sufficient for the defense of the State against such raids and invasions of the enemy as then seemed likely to occur.

This corps, as provided in the act, was composed of 13 regiments of infantry, 1 regiment of cavalry, and 1 regiment of light artillery. They were fully armed, equipped, and organized, as provided by the act. They were among the best soldiers raised by the State, and at the time they were suddenly called into the service of the Government were in a high state of discipline and efficiency. Their splendid history justified the expectations had as to their ability to defend the State against anticipated invasion.

"While the State was congratulating itself upon the possession of this splendid corps as an adequate defense, they were suddenly called into the service of the United States Government, as they were liable to be from our constitutional relations to the United States Government, and the State was stripped of the special defense which she had as wisely provided and upon which she had so hopefully begun to rely. Disasters, however, had crowded thick upon the national arms and the necessities of the General Government were imperative."

Again, in 1862, when General Lee first invaded Pennsylvania, during what was known as the Antietam campaign, we organized twenty-seven or twenty-eight regiments of militia, with the express understanding that they were not to be marched beyond the State line, and that they were organized for the defense of the State. The National Government called upon us for these, and they were turned over and marched under the direction of United States officers. They were taken beyond the borders of the State.

At this time the southern counties were entirely at the mercy of General Stuart's troops. And when he found that the General Government had removed all the troops raised for the defense of the border counties out of the State to defend the capital of the nation, General Stuart, with about 2,000 cavalry and 500 wagons, crossed the Potomac, entered the counties of Adams and Franklin, which lie close to the southern border of the State of Pennsylvania, and took away from the people property amounting to $177,011.68.

The messages of Governor Curtin to the legislature of Pennsylvania during the war will give, more clearly than any recital of my own, the principal facts attending the several invasions of our State, and as they are in the shape of official communications at times when the occurrences were fresh and vivid in all minds, they may be relied on as historically accurate. Stuart's raid is thus mentioned and detailed in Governor Curtin's message of January 7, 1863 (Ex. Doc. of 1862, page 8):

In October last a body of rebel cavalry with a battery of artillery suddenly crossed the Potomac, and made their way as far as Chambersburg, plundering what they found of supplies useful to them and committing other depredations. They went out of the State by crossing the South Mountain, and thus reaching the Potomac below Harpers Ferry.

The troops in the field were not prepared at the moment to punish this attempt on her soil, and it is to be much regretted that efficient measures could not have been taken by the Army to capture the rebels on their return to the Potomac. Immediately after I received notice that this force had crossed the line of the State I called into service the Anderson Cavalry, then encamped at Carlisle, and two companies of regulars at the barracks at that place. These troops were pushed forward in the direction of Chambersburg and South Mountain.

The cavalry at Camp Curtin, consisting of one full and two imperfect regiments, were armed as infantry, and, together with two companies of infantry and a battery of volunteer light artillery, of Harrisburg, were held in readiness to go forward, when Major-General Wool arrived and assumed the command of all the forces. He had previously ordered part of his command from Baltimore and marched the troops to Gettysburg.

The rebels marched with so much celerity that they did not encounter any of the forces of General Wool and escaped from the State. I recommend that application be made to Congress for an appropriation to compensate our citizens for the damages which they suffered by the raid.

In May, 1863, the State authorities believed, from information received, that General Lee intended to invade the State. In June, 1863, General Lee and his army invaded the State. We had again organized 25 regiments, or about 31,000 men, for the defense of the border, and again they were, by direction of the War Department, turned over to the United States. General Jenkins's cavalry raided the border counties just before the battle of Gettysburg in July, 1863, and small bodies of troops, leaving the main army, took everything in the shape of property they could find and carried it away to the main army, causing a loss to my people of $1,648,118.22.

Again, in 1864, the State raised seven regiments for service in the State in defending the border. You will remember that about this time one of the divisions of General Early came within the suburbs of Washington and a skirmish took place within the limits of the national capital. The seven regiments were taken to Washington City to save it from the hands of the invaders. They were taken from the State in the latter part of July, 1864, the last regiment leaving on the 29th day of July. At this same time the border counties were threatened with another raid. On July 21, 1864, Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, and Governor Bradford, of Maryland, addressed this joint message to the President:

To His Excellency ABRAHAM LINCOLN,
President of the United States:

The repeated raids across the Potomac River made by portions of the rebel army, and the extent of the damage they have succeeded so frequently in inflicting, have most injuriously affected the people of Maryland and Pennsylvania in the neighborhood of that river, and many of them, it is believed, as the only security against such losses in the future are seriously considering the propriety of abandoning their present homes and seeking safety at the North.

It seems to us that not merely in this sectional aspect of the case, but in its national relations, the security of this border line between the loyal and rebellious States is an object justifying and requiring a disposition of a portion of the national force, with an especial view to it defense. The Potomac River can only be crossed, in its ordinary state of water, at some five or six fords, and we propose to enlist from our respective States a volunteer force that shall be sufficient, with the aid of the fortifications which the force itself can speedily construct, to effectually guard them all. We ask of the Government that the recruits so raised shall be credited to the quotas of our several States on the call last made, and be armed, equipped, and supplied as other volunteers in the service.

We are aware that, as a general rule, well-founded objections exist to the enlistment of a force to be exclusively used for home or local defense; but we regard such a service as we now suggest as an exceptional case, and the complete protection of this part of our frontier as of admitted national importance.

Soon after the outbreak of this rebellion the importance of a special defense of the region bordering on the upper Potomac was recognized by the Government, and the Hon. Francis Thomas, of Maryland, was authorized by it to raise three regiments, with a view to the protection of the counties on either side of that river. These regiments were raised, but the subsequent exigencies of the service required their employment elsewhere, and they therefore afford at present no particular security to that region beyond other troops in the service.

The necessity, as we think, of some peculiar provision has now become so obvious that we would with great respect, but most earnestly, urge upon your excellency the expediency of acceding to the suggestions we have made, and we will immediately set about raising the forces required, and we have no doubt they will be promptly procured.

A. W. BRADFORD.
A. G. CURTIN.

Mark you, this letter was sent on July 21, 1864. The last of the seven regiments were taken away on the 29th of July, 1864, eight days after the President had received the letter. On the 30th of July, 1864, no reply had been received. McCausland's raid was imminent; his troopers were swinging toward the Cumberland Valley; the President and the Secretary of War were appealed to to protect our people, who had already, from 1862 to 1864, been plundered of their property, their business destroyed and paralyzed.

What little they had left they hoped to retain by the strong arm of the Government protecting it. But the Secretary of War said no; that it was the policy of the Government to draw the enemy from the capital of the nation, as well as their base of supplies, into our region, and that our portion of the State was to be left unprotected for strategic reasons and in order to draw the enemy there.

The State of Pennsylvania responded to every call of the Government for the common defense. Her quota of troops was never unfilled.

Let me here say that the great State we represent, thus exposed to the repeated incursions of an active and adventurous enemy, through the valleys which open passageway into our borders, and thus stripped of her resources and her defense, contributed to the armies of the Union in 1861 130,994 men; in 1862, 71,100; in 1863, 43,040; in 1864, 91,704, and in 1865, 25,840, making a total, exclusive of militia and recruits for the Navy, of 362,284—more than a third of a million of men.

There was no duty she did not perform in common with her sister nonseceding States for the maintenance of the authority of the Federal Government. But she was situated on the border, and in addition to responding as above stated, and notwithstanding that she had the right to expect that the Government would prevent the enemy from entering upon her territory, she organized in addition militia of her own to repel any attempted invasion. She took every precaution against such a calamity. These forces were organized, drilled, armed, and equipped at the expense of the State, and stationed to protect against the very invasion and injuries for which she now presents this claim.

But there was imminent danger to the entire country of incalculably greater loss. The capital of the nation was threatened. Its vast property interests at the seat of Government, its Treasury, its archives, its very existence as a Government—all were in the greatest peril, and in this crisis, under the Constitution, the President called this force, organized to protect the State, to the higher duty of protecting the nation. The call was responded to by the withdrawal of said reserved militia raised by the State, and that withdrawal left the State defenseless and injury followed.

On July 30, 1864, the day after the last State troops were sent to Washington, the city of Chambersburg was invested about 6 o'clock in the morning by the whole command of McCausland and Johnson. I quote the following from Governor Curtin's message, August 9, 1864:

At 7 o'clock a. m., six companies of dismounted men, commanded by Sully, entered the town, followed by mounted men under Gilmore. The main force was in line of battle. A demand was made for $100,000 in gold or $500,000 in government funds, as a ransom, and a number of citizens were arrested and held as hostages for its payment.

At this point the loyalty of the people of my native city, the queen city of the beautiful Cumberland Valley, was put to a test. Would they pay a half million of dollars to aid the Confederacy; a half million dollars to be used against the boys in blue, the flag, the Government, or refuse to pay it and have their homes destroyed by fire? Their answer came prompt, "No; not one dollar." The rebels commenced immediately to burn and pillage the town, diregarding the appeals of women and children, the aged and infirm, and even the bodies of the dead were not protected from their brutality.

In a few hours the loyal but patriotic people of Chambersburg were gathered on the hills around the doomed city looking on the ashes that covered all they had in the world, the loss amounting to $1,625,435.55. And the entire loss of the people of the city of Chambersburg by raids and the burning of the town amounts to $2,471,468.85.

Two days after the city was destroyed a reply was received to letter of Governors Curtin and Bradford, of July 21, 1864, heretofore mentioned, refusing to grant the authority to keep troops on border.

Also, on August 1, 1864, the following letter was sent to Gen. D. N. Couch on same subject:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE.
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1864.

Maj. Gen. D. N. COUCH,
Commanding, etc., Harrisburg, Pa.

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d July relative to the United States providing uniforms for a special corps of militia from certain border counties of Pennsylvania.

In reply I am directed to inform you that the subject has been carefully considered by the Secretary of War, who can not sanction the issue of the clothing in question.

I am, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

THOMAS VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

These regiments would have been adequate to have met the emergency and to have protected Chambersburg had they been where they were accessible and easily handled and where they would naturally have been when this raid, which threatened the security of that place, occurred.

Let me here quote from a speech by Governor Curtin in the constitutional convention of Pennsylvania in 1874, who, as a prominent actor in the events just detailed, is best able to testify to the facts, and whose vivid language is better than any words of mine:

In the beginning of that terrible conflict we raised in Pennsylvania an army intended for the domestic protection, but the defeat of the armies of the Federal Government required their presence out of the State, and they were immediately surrendered. At various times during the war troops were raised in Pennsylvania to protect the border, but were demanded by the national necessity and went forward. In 1864, by an arrangement with the Federal authorities, seven regiments were raised in Pennsylvania for border protection.

Care was not taken as to the selection of the men; many were older than generally required for military service. Many were not in health; some had been in the service and had contracted the diseases which many of our gallant and true men suffered in the South, and not a few had been wounded and discharged as unfit for military service. These seven regiments were all that were necessary for the protection of the State. The rebel armies advanced north in the summer, as we well know, and the seven regiments were called for, for the protection of the Capitol at Washington.

At first it was declined. The battle of Monocacy resulted in a defeat of the army under General Wallace, and the armies of Breckenridge and Ewell approached the national capital, and then it was declared that the presence of these troops from Pennsylvania might be a positive necessity to the safety of the Federal capital, and the whole force was sent forward, and three days after they were sent from Pennsylvania many of them died in defense of Washington.

The rebel army burned Chambersburg; and will any American citizen tell me that it is not proper to relieve these people? Why, in the brilliant record made in that State during that terrible struggle, her fidelity was never more illustrious than in uncovering her own border in order to protect the capital of the nation. In doing that the beautiful town of Chambersburg was exposed and burned, and the country around it was ravaged by the enemy. (Deb. Const. Conv., volume 2, page 650.)

These are some of the facts connected with the case we now present. It is unnecessary to demonstrate to you that Pennsylvania responded to the utmost extent of all her resources in men and money, and came up to the full measure of her duty to the country. She maintained, in full and perfect accord, her relations to the General Government through the entire struggle, and answered every requisition made upon her. She stripped herself of her own disciplined forces which she had raised primarily for her own protection in view of her exposure to the swift and sudden raids of the enemy through her open and unguarded valleys.

The great Cumberland Valley, attractive, teeming with wealth and agricultural luxuriance, was an ever inviting avenue, through Virginia and Maryland, into Pennsylvania, for the Confederate armies, who had long exhausted the resources of the State where their operations were principally conducted. It was therefore natural and consistent with the obvious dangers of the situation for the governor of this State to be so anxious and concerned as he was, and to continually importune the general authorities at Washington for special protection for our border.

Our contiguity to the scene of active warlike operations and the peculiar temptation which our rich and fertile fields afforded to the enemy were conditions ever present to the mind and ever exciting anxiety and alarm. Finding that any force that Pennsylvania might organize for her own protection would be called upon by the Government, and recognizing that it was entirely legitimate that the Government should call upon us for this force, we turned our attention to reenforcing the Army of the United States and allowing the General Government to take care of our border.

There is a general principle, however, which underlies all government, which underlies our National Government, and which is clearly expressed in our Constitution, and which is just as clearly understood whether it was expressed or not, and that is, that the States of this Union surrendered certain rights to the General Government, in consideration of which they were to receive certain privileges. That, indeed, underlies all organized society and all human government.

Blackstone's definition of government and his essay upon the rise of government, in which the broad ground is taken that the very first principle which underlies government is that men must combine for protection, and in order to receive protection they must surrender certain personal rights, in consideration of which they were to receive the protection which they sought.

We surrendered all rights the Constitution required us to surrender. We now demand the consideration guaranteed to us by the Constitution. However, I will more fully discuss the legal questions hereafter.

HOW CLAIMS WERE ADJUDICATED.

The acts of assembly that were from time to time passed to investigate and perpetuate the evidence of these claims and providing against fraud or speculation therein are of a character that must commend themselves to the judgment of the members of this committee and the National Legislature.

The last act, and the one under which these claims were finally adjudicated and reduced to their present dimensions, was passed May 22, 1871. These claims have been adjusted and readjusted under conditions and methods of procedure which would seem to exclude all possibility of misrepresentation or imposition. They were, so far as the claims of the residents of Chambersburg and vicinity are concerned, also adjudicated under the acts to which I have referred.

They were adjudicated for all the counties in which losses were incurred by the operations of the war, under the act of April 9, 1868 (P. L. 74), entitled "An act for the relief of the citizens of the counties of Adams, Franklin, Fulton, Bedford, York, Perry, and Cumberland, whose property was destroyed, damaged, or appropriated for the public service and in the common defense in the war to suppress the rebellion," which act provided for the appointment of commissioners to investigate and adjudicate the claims of the citizens of the said counties, and upon their adjudication to report and file the same with the auditor-general, and imposing the duty upon the proper officers of the Commonwealth, to be designated by the governor, to proceed to recover compensation for said losses from the General Government, and when so collected the amount recovered to be paid pro rata to the sufferers, in accordance with the report of the commissioners thus appointed. Provision was therein made for the ascertainment and appraisement by the commissioners of the losses sustained, and an elaborate mode of procedure and method of verification and proof prescribed.

There was contained in the act the further reservation that the act should not be construed to make the Commonwealth in any way liable for the ultimate payment of damages ascertained and reported under the act, thus expressly excluding any concession of the liability of the State, or any change in the attitude of the State toward the General Government that might otherwise have been inferred from this and similar legislation.

The matter was again brought before the legislature, and the act of May 22, 1871 (P. L. 272), was passed. This was entitled

"An act to authorize a liquidation of damages sustained by citizens of Pennsylvania during the late rebellion," and provided that the claims of the citizens of the counties of York, Cumberland, Adams, Franklin, Bedford, and Perry, for extraordinary losses sustained during the rebellion, as adjudicated under the prior acts, naming them, be subjected to a careful revision by two commissioners in each of the counties named, to be appointed by the president judges of the courts of common pleas of said several counties. There was this further provision:

And the governor shall appoint competent counsel to represent the government in the revision of said claims before the several commissions; and said commissioners shall reexamine and readjudicate all of said claims, and may reject or diminish any now on file as equity may require, but not increase the amount of any, excepting the claim of the German Reformed Church (which was one claim which it was provided shall be equitably adjusted); and any claims which may have been assigned or transferred by the original claimant, the assignee or present owner of the same shall be required to make satisfactory proof of the amount actually paid for the claim, and the amount so paid shall be awarded and no more; and if any owner of an assigned claim shall fail to make such proof satisfactory, the claim shall be rejected, and as said commissioners readjudicate said claim, they shall indorse their approval thereon for the amount allowed and return the claims to the auditor-general.

This latter officer corresponds to the officer known as the comptroller or comptroller-general in some of the States.

These claims, as finally adjudicated under the last act, were filed in the auditor-general's office—afterwards filed in Quartermaster-General's Office at Washington—in order that they might not lose any right to have them allowed under the act of July 4, 1864.

Section 2 of the act provides:

The State shall issue to each claimant, or to his, her, or their representative, a certificate or certificates to the amount allowed on each claim, in the following form.

These commissioners have reported and filed their reports and their findings, with proofs, in the auditor-general's office. The certificates have been nearly or quite all delivered to the holders.

This is the form of the certificate:

This is to certify that —— —— has on file in the office of the auditor-general a duly approved and registered claim for the sum of —— dollars, as adjudicated under the act entitled "An act to authorize the liquidation of damages sustained by citizens of Pennsylvania during the late rebellion," and payable only when said claims shall be paid by the United States Government.

I would call your attention to the reservation contained in this certificate. These certificates, signed by the governor and State treasurer and countersigned by the auditor-general, are the evidence in the hands of the holders, and contain the implied pledge of the State to secure the payment from the General Government of the claims so ascertained, whereby they may and do invoke the agency of the State to secure the final payment of the claims so ascertained and evidenced, and by way of redemption of this engagement on the part of our Commonwealth, it now appears, at the behest of its legislature, in the resolution passed at its last session, to redeem its undertaking. This last adjudication includes the losses that were sustained by reason of the burning of Chambersburg.

The following section of the act of 1871 sets forth the undertaking of the Commonwealth to secure, so far as it may, the enforcement of what has always been believed to be the obligation of the Federal Government:

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the governor of the State to demand the payment of said claims by the General Government, and also the payment of the amount heretofore paid by the State on said claims, and to appoint such agents for the purpose as may be deemed necessary, and any appropriation made by Congress to said claims shall be wholly applied to the certificates authorized by the second section of this act, as Congress may direct, until the same shall be paid in full: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to make the State in any wise responsible for or on account of said certificates.

Thus you will see these claims have been solemnly adjudicated, and there has been excluded any possible mistake, imposition, or fraud that might otherwise have been practiced upon either the State or the National Government. They were passed upon in a sedate and deliberate manner and in an orderly proceeding, in which the adverse interest was represented, there being no desire to secure anything against the General Government except what was justly due.

In a great majority of cases these claims were presented by the claimants themselves without the intervention of counsel. The commissions were composed of men of high character in each of the counties named in the act, and, as already stated, the public interests were represented in a way that was in all respects analogous to that in which the General Government appears before the Court of Claims. The claims were thoroughly examined, the proofs and findings filed, and the whole is a matter of record in the auditor-general's office.

Pennsylvania has always insisted that the General Government should pay these claims.

The legislation of Pennsylvania upon this subject, from war times to the present, has always contemplated the liability of the General Government. Such was the tenor of the language of its chief executive in 1864, in his message to the legislature, assembled under a special call immediately after the burning of Chambersburg. The dominant, the constant idea in all the legislation upon this subject—and there has been a succession of enactments relating to these claims—has been the assertion of a claim upon the General Government, through the State and by the State, for the payment of these losses.

There has been no laches on the part of the State we represent. There has been no abandonment of any right she may have. The claim of the State for reimbursement to its citizens for these extraordinary losses was promptly put forward almost in the very week, within ten days, you may say, of the destruction of Chambersburg, and has been maintained and insisted upon in all her public official acts and deliverances upon this subject from that time until the present. As proof of it, the legislation of Pennsylvania upon our statute books need only be referred to.

This claim is now presented by the State of Pennsylvania in her corporate and political capacity, and as a party to the Federal compact. As a party to a convention which, in express terms, gives her a right to protection and impliedly to indemnity upon failure to afford such protection she now asks to be made whole.

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution there existed thirteen independent sovereign States, of which Pennsylvania was one.

The Articles of Confederation were found to be defective and inadequate. In many ways it had all the qualities of a treaty of alliance and for mutual defense between independent States, and although a central power was erected, all requisitions for supplies and support were made upon the States as States, and the response thereto depended upon their will.

It was evident that the political relation resting so lightly upon the parties was unsatisfactory and unsafe. A more perfect union was desired, to provide for the common defense, and by reason and argument for the giving up by the States of their control over their militia, over their armies, over their fleets, their rights to deal with each other or with foreign states by conventions and treaties, to lay and collect customs duties, to keep under their control their men and ships of war for their own defense, will be found in that wonderful preamble to the Constitution of the United States. Its brief but pregnant phrases are an epitome of the whole argument for the more perfect union sought to be secured under the Constitution, and the leading thought was to provide for the common defense.

Let me read it:

We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

A Federal Government was created, dealing directly with the people, and which enforces its authority and the provisions of the Constitution by acting upon individuals and the citizens instead of upon the States. We had taken on all the conditions of a powerful empire. We took our place among the nations of the world, armed with national power, and having control of the purse and sword of the people living under the folds of the flag—the emblem of our nationality—as I before stated, before the Constitution was adopted.

Each State before the Constitution had the power to create and control its own army for the defense of its territory, its property, its citizens, and their property; but this military power was surrendered to the Federal Government upon the guaranty of the latter that it would do what might have been done by the State but for the entering into this new relation; and it would, therefore, seem to conclusively follow that if there was loss of property by reason of failure to keep this guaranty compensation should be made for that loss.

Such is the relation the States bear to the General Government. The right to repeal the contract, the right to recede from the relations created by the Federal Constitution can not exist, and therefore it contains the essential element of a contract, continuing obligation. Our citizens are bound by it, and the Government is also bound by the contract.

Whether a State or its people could escape the obligation thus made was eloquently and ably debated for many years. The war of the rebellion settled the question that a State could not break away from the compact, and all agree that on this question the debate is closed forever.

Under the Articles of Confederation "there was a combination of power and resources and a distribution of responsibility for the protection of all. The obligation before had rather the qualities of an obligation imposed by treaty or convention between independent sovereignties. Under the present Constitution the obligation is cast upon the Government formed by the people of all the States and constituted the consideration for the surrender by the States of their independent character and their entry into the indissoluble bond."

What was the consideration given by the Government to the States in return for the surrender of the right or power they had to control their military forces and resources?

"One of the obligations of the contract thus formed—indeed, I may say the principal, the most important of all—was the duty expressly laid upon the political corporation, which then first took origin, to employ the resources and power of all for the defense of each against invasion, domestic sedition, and the preservation of their republican institutions."

Section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution contains this express convenant:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature, or of the executive when the legislature can not be convened, against domestic violence.

The guaranty to protect each State against invasion was one of supreme importance to the States, and especially in view of the fact that the State had conceded to this new nation into which it entered the power to control its militia in all respects except the officering and training. And when the Federal Government fails to protect a State against invasion, and by reason thereof injuries have been sustained, a very different question is presented in claims made by private citizens for injuries by the Federal forces in actual conflict or injuries inflicted by the enemy on such individual citizens.

The present claim now under consideration is presented by the State of Pennsylvania, one of the States that entered into and became a part of this new nation, and party to this covenant for protection against invasion upon the terms already mentioned. It is, therefore, a claim that does not, as we submit, fall within the rule so often quoted.

Paschall, in his Annotated Constitution, in commenting upon the phrase "the United States," in section 4, Article IV, of the Constitution, already quoted, says:

This is the only instance in the Constitution where the Government, by its corporate name, has covenanted for any duty. The "powers" of the Government are vested in the respective departments thereof; and as to the "necessary and proper" legislation, that is specially conferred upon Congress. Here the obligation is from the "United States" to the "States," but whether to be exercised by Congress or the President is one of the questions which have grown out of the reconstruction measures.—Paschall's Annotated Constitution, second edition, section 233, page 242.

Referring to the use of the word "invasions" in this clause of the Constitution just referred to, Paschall says:

"Invasions" is here doubtless coupled with the guaranty of the United States to protect every State against invasion (Article IV, section 4); but the invasion would be none the less so if invited by State authorities, or if no call should be made by the legislature or governor of the invaded State.—Paschall's Annotated Constitution, page 135, section 133.

In dealing with invasion by a foreign foe, or from another State, the primary duty is upon the General Government at all times to protect against such invasion. The same facility of action on the part of the State does not exist. The National Government has the duty resting upon it at all times to guard against such incursions and to be ready for such emergencies. The State is purposely shorn of all powers and conditions which would otherwise put it efficiently in its power to provide for and defend against foreign or extra-State aggression. It will be noticed that the constitutional language is, "that the United States shall protect each of them (States) against invasion."

Recurring to the constitutional language, it can not be regarded as anything less than an express covenant made to the States. The States are the parties capable of enforcing the obligation or demanding such equivalent in the way of reimbursement or indemnity as amounts to such enforcement.

Everything in the present case has been done by the State of Pennsylvania to put itself in proper relations to the General Government for making its claim and for calling for an enforcement of the constitutional guaranty, or, more properly in this case, the repayment of such indemnity for losses resulting to the State from failure to perform such guaranty, in the sense of the definition of that term as used and understood in the language of the section upon which we rely.

The great purpose of the Constitution then was to secure the general welfare and protection of all the members of the Federal Union. In consideration of the sacrifice of their autonomy, as it might otherwise have existed, they agreed that the resources of all should be combined to this end. Each was to share in the benefits to be derived without a preponderance of advantage to one over another. All were to share proportionately in the burdens, and throughout the Federal charter every provision and all its language look to an equalization of burden and contribution, and such has been the uniform practice in calling upon the States for their quotas and in reimbursing them for any undue measure of contribution.

Such was the express letter of the Articles of Confederation, and it can not be supposed that in "the more perfect union," designed for the common benefit and welfare of all, burdens should be made to press unduly upon any locality or section or community.

Where a State contributes money and troops beyond her just and fair proportion she has always received back from the General Government that extra cost and expense. The claim in such cases has always been presented by the State, and her rights to an equalization of her burden with the rest have been asserted and maintained by the State as such.

Whether there has been an overcontribution and devotion of property and resources to the common cause, or such property has been sacrificed in order to subserve and advance the general interests of all, makes no real difference. The principle is substantially the same, and both cases come within the analogies of the doctrine of compensation for property appropriated for the public advantage.

Where property has been destroyed or loss incurred for the benefit of the nation and the protection of the whole, it is practically a taking of such property for such purposes. Where loss and destruction of property has been permitted through the voluntary action or default of the Government in order to subserve a general purpose, to advance the common good, to save the whole, substantially the same conditions present themselves as if such property had been taken and such loss incurred directly for the general interest and welfare.

Where the Government has relieved itself of a direct duty, such as the obligation to anticipate and defend against an invasion of a State, whether the invader be from another State or from beyond our national boundaries, in order to carry out a plan of campaign, to keep its armies massed in the field, to protect the national capital, or to overpower and destroy organized military movements in some other field of operations, and thereby abandons the immediate and perhaps lesser matter of defending a particular locality from incursion and devastation, such loss and destruction of property which follows is a sacrifice resulting from the necessity of the performance of the greater duty or the development of the more important plan.

The loss thus contributed or incurred is no less a devotion of the thing sacrificed to the public interests. It is no less a taking, because thus indirectly suffered to subserve the general good, than if such property were directly taken or destroyed to secure an immediate public advantage.

Mr. Whiting, in his essay on "War claims," annexed to his work on The War Power under the Constitution, conservative as he seems to be, and inclined by his official attitude as Solicitor of the War Department to a strict and cautious view of the liability of the General Government, says:

When individuals are called upon to give up what is their own for the advantage of the community, justice requires that they should be fairly compensated for it; otherwise the public burdens would be shared unequally. * * * In guarding against the abuse of the right to take private property for public use it is provided that the owner shall be entitled to be fairly paid for it, and thus he is not to be taxed more than his due share for public purposes.

In Grant vs. United States (1 N. and H. Reports), the court says:

It may safely be assumed, as the settled and fundamental law of Christian and civilized states, that governments are bound to make just indemnity to a citizen or subject whenever private property is taken for the public good, convenience, or safety. In the case just cited the Government was held to pay for the property destroyed in Arizona merely to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy.

Immediately after the war of the Revolution, which was prosecuted prior to the adoption of any constitutional prohibition against taking private property for public use without compensation, and for which war the troops were furnished by the several States, Congress impliedly recognized the principle of compensation for undue burdens incurred by any particular State. A resolution with reference to compensation for injuries done by the military authorities was adopted in 1784, containing the following passage:

That it be referred to the several States, at their own expense, to grant such relief to their citizens who may have been injured as aforesaid as they may think requisite, and if it shall hereafter appear reasonable that the United States should make any allowance to any particular State which may be burdened much beyond others, that the allowance ought to be determined by Congress.

In this connection I quote from Vattel:

But it is perfectly consonant to the duties of the state and the sovereign, and of course perfectly equitable, and even strictly just, to relieve as far as possible those unhappy sufferers who have been ruined by the ravages of war, as likewise to take care of the family whose head and support has lost his life in the service of the State. There are many debts which are considered sacred by the man who knows his duty, although they do not afford any ground of action against him.—Vattel's Law of Nations, page 403.

Applying to the present case the principles thus cautiously conceded in the foregoing citations, it will be seen that our State and they whose claims for indemnity she now presents have incurred losses and made sacrifices largely in excess of that proper measure of contribution and liability which she filled in obedience to all the requisitions made upon her through that eventful season of trial and national danger.

What Pennsylvania suffered in these repeated invasions, the history of which I have already given you, was a sacrifice incurred directly for the benefit of all. The property of the people of the border counties was exposed to destruction through deliberate action to subserve the common interest of all, to defend the national capital, to preserve the strength and integrity of our armies in the field for greater and more decisive operations elsewhere.

Our troops, raised for State defense, and which the facts show would have been sufficient for that purpose, were taken into the national service and removed beyond the boundaries of the State. Our militia were officered by national commanders and marched over the State line to contribute to other purposes and plans in the military operations of the Government.

Particularly was our militia in 1864, in which the great bulk of the damages now presented was inflicted, as already mentioned, hurried away to the National Capital and from the front of the raiding force, whose inroad might thus have been prevented. Although entitled to the presence of an adequate force to protect her valleys and her towns from these invasions, and although she repeatedly called upon the General Government for such interposition and defense, she was obliged to surrender her claim for protection, submit herself a sacrifice for the public benefit and safety.

The case comes within the principle, more or less, clearly expressed in the quotations I have already given you. In the language of the authorities, it presents a case of property destroyed, "not only in extreme necessity but for the public benefit;" a "positive evil suffered by individuals for the supposed gain of the whole community at the will of that community."

Clearly, then, we have the right to compensation for loss incurred for the general good at the instance of the whole community, and our case is not covered or affected by that narrower doctrine of public law, which, after all, is but a prudential one, justified rather by the harsh plea of necessity than by any considerations of justice or merit that there is no compensation for casualties of war or losses inflicted by an enemy in the course of ordinary military operations.

There is annexed to the conditions of our case the well-authenticated fact that the losses were incurred through the direct interposition of the Government, by its deliberate action in appropriating our resources and means of defense, in relieving itself from its express obligation to perform the duty of interposing for our defense, and in purposely subjecting our property to destruction and loss for what was conceived to be a higher and more important purpose of advancing the general welfare and safety.

The fact that the National Government had expressly bound itself to protect each State from invasion, in consideration of the surrender of control over its own means and the military power of its people, and that this obligation was voluntarily abandoned in order that the Government might not be embarrassed or its armies disintegrated, or its capital destroyed, or the more rapid suppression of the war against its existence might not be interfered with, may well be regarded as a sufficient consideration upon which the obligation of the Government to indemnify is founded.

The States may be considered as having said at the time that the Union was formed, "We will surrender all that which will otherwise enable us to sufficiently protect ourselves; we will disarm ourselves; we will put our forces and our means at the disposal of the General Government, because in exchange therefor we can call upon the common treasure and manhood of the whole, and in the obligation to so respond lies the equivalent for that which we give up." I hold that this takes our case out of the operation of the ordinary rule laid down by the writers on public law, and puts us within the range of the principle of compensation and contract obligation.

When it is true, as in this case, the losses have been incurred through the deliberate action of the Government for the public benefit, and in disregard of express covenanted duty, the only excuse for which was the higher claims for the time being of national safety and the security of all.

To pay these claims, and all others like them, would be an act of justice, and, with the ready command of means at our hands, would after all be only measurably to reinstate those who have lost their all, who have been beggared to secure the safety, the prosperity, and the happiness of us all.

I am only asking that the purposes of the founders of the Government shall be carried out; that all the States having entered into this Union, and having tied their own hands, shall have the strong right arm of the Government itself to interpose for their protection and safety. If, from inexorable conditions, if from commanding necessity, it becomes impossible to anticipate and defend against threatened incursions into the territory of a State, or by reason of some military policy or political or national emergency it becomes necessary, as it was in the case of the State of Pennsylvania, for such a State to submit her bosom bared to the sword of the enemy, then I say that that which is recognized as hardly more than an approximate measure of restoration or reimbursement should be conceded; that that inequality of burden thus still unlifted be no longer allowed to remain; that Pennsylvania be compelled no longer to do or suffer more than any other State of the Union, according to its just share and proportion; that our fair State should not have one of her most beautiful towns laid in ashes beyond the hope of indemnity, as an inexorable fatality, an exceptional, an irremediable, sacrifice laid upon the altar of the great civil strife out of which we have so gloriously and successfully come.

This is our whole case, and it is for the National Legislature to say, on the demand of the State, the party to the contract, that we shall be put on an equality with the rest of the States, so that the cost of that war shall have been no more to us than to the rest. It is simply asking that which the framers of the Constitution intended and what all the parties to that contract must be supposed to have understood that contract to mean.

It can mean nothing else. The language of the constitutional guaranty we invoke would otherwise be but an empty rhetorical flourish; and we can not believe that men, dealing with the great and momentous questions which then pressed upon all minds, and just as they were entering upon the untried experiment of a new political existence, would not have weighed well every word employed in the great instrument.

It is impossible to make a stronger case than this for asking compensation under this guaranteed protection.

If this does not make a case, then this guaranty might better have never been written. It is only a delusion, and it was a snare if no obligation follows a failure, because no one can read the Articles of Confederation and the history of the times without being impressed that this Constitution never would have been agreed to, whereby the control of the militia was surrendered and the power to protect against invasion yielded to the Federal Government, if it had been supposed that the guaranty to protect imposed no obligation.

It is inconceivable that so important an element of sovereignty would be yielded up for a meaningless promise.

If such a guaranty were found in a treaty between two nations it would not be doubted that a failure to keep it by the guarantor would call for pecuniary compensation. No argument is needed to support that proposition.

While the Constitution is not a treaty, its acceptance by the States under the circumstances makes the obligation in principle the same.

If, therefore, there is the obligation we are contending for, if the facts connected with this case entitle our Commonwealth to claim indemnity for its people at the hands of the Government, under the guaranty of the Constitution, the duty to compensate for the losses suffered, to reimburse our State and her people, is just as obligatory as if it were enacted in the form of an act of Congress and were found upon our statute books. Indeed, it has a higher character. It is a more solemn and impressive obligation, because it is found in express terms in a higher and more commanding place—the fundamental law of the land, which confines, limits, and dominates the Government itself and all its coordinate agencies.

The only question to be answered is whether there exists the guaranty, the promise, the understanding, the contract obligation, the mandate of the Constitution. Has the guaranty been properly invoked? Have the conditions contemplated in the fundamental law occurred? Was our State threatened with these invasions? Was the Government called upon to interpose its power and guard our gateways? Were we disarmed, and were our people exposed to plunder and devastation? Did they suffer their losses for the common good and at the instance and in deference to the requirements of the national authority? As we answer these questions we determine the duty of the United States and its Legislature in the present case.

The next question is, Was there an "invasion" in the sense of the Constitution?

This is answered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Pacific Railroad vs. The United States (120 U. S. R., 227) in these words:

> It has been held by this court in repeated instances that, though the late war was not between independent nations, yet, as it was between the people of different sections of the country, and the insurgents were so thoroughly organized and formidable as to necessitate their recognition as belligerents, the usual incidents of a war between independent nations ensued.
> The rules of war as recognized by the public law of civilized nations became applicable to the contending forces. Their adoption was seen in the exchange of prisoners, the release of officers on parole, the recognition of flags of truce, and other arrangements designed to mitigate the rigors of warfare. The inhabitants of the Confederate States on the one hand, and of the States which adhered to the Union on the other, became enemies and subject to be treated as such, without regard to their individual opinions or dispositions, while during its continuance commercial intercourse between them was forbidden, contracts between them were suspended, and the courts of each were closed to the citizens of the other. (Brown vs. Hiatts, 15 Wall., 177, 184.)

In the Prize Cases (2 Black, 636) the court held that war commenced with the President's proclamation of blockade, April 27, 1861. The dissenting judges held that it commenced with the act of Congress of July 13, 1861, and by the authority of this act the proclamation of the insurrection was extended so as to declare eleven States in rebellion. War continued in the States then named until August 20, 1866, when the proclamation of the President proclaimed the insurrection at an end.

During certain periods of the rebellion flagrant war existed in addition to the States proclaimed as in rebellion, in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, West Virginia, and for brief times in parts of Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. The war in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and West Virginia partook of the character of civil war, as well as of an invasion through the States in organized rebellion, while in the States of Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania it was entirely of the character of an invasion.

The war in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and West Virginia was none the less a civil war because those States were not proclaimed as in rebellion. There was more or less organized insurrection within their limits, although the lawful State governments were not subverted in those States as they were in the 11 States proclaimed in rebellion. But the existence of flagrant war without any proclamation or declaration by Congress is a matter of well-remembered history and has been judicially recognized.

In the Prize Cases the court says:

> Insurrection against a government may or may not culminate in an organized rebellion, but a civil war always begins by insurrection against the lawful authority of the government. A civil war is never solemnly declared; it becomes such by its accidents—the number, power, and organization of the persons who originate and carry it on.
> When the party in rebellion occupy and hold, in a hostile manner, a certain portion of territory, have declared their independence, have cast off their allegiance, have organized armies, have commenced hostilities against their former sovereign, the world acknowledges them as belligerents and the contest a war. They claim to be in arms to establish their liberty and independence, in order to become a sovereign state, while the sovereign party treats them as insurgents and rebels, who owe allegiance and who should be punished with death for their treason.

In the prize cases, from which I have just quoted, the court further says, referring to the attitude of the States proclaimed in rebellion:

> Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy, claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign state.
> Their right to do so is now being decided by wager of battle. The ports and territory of each of these States are held in hostility to the General Government. It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force—south of this line is enemy's territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized hostile and belligerent power.

Therefore, under the law of the land, as declared by the highest judicial authority, and under the principles of international law, which so far are incorporated with and recognized as part of our system of jurisprudence, the States in rebellion were at war with the United States, and as States recognized as belligerents.

In the light of this it can not be doubted that the entering upon the soil of the State of Pennsylvania by the Confederate forces for hostile purposes was an "invasion" against which the United States had guaranteed that State protection.

I have stated the controlling facts which decide the merits of the present claim, and I ask you to attach high importance to the consideration that these facts are, in their entire body and substance, facts incapable of bona fide dispute, because they are facts established by the public records of the State and of the Union, and are facts which have entered into, and make a part of, the accepted history of the country.

The writings of Grotius, Vattel, and others are continually cited as authority for the doctrine that nations are not liable to pay citizens for losses of property incident to the ravages of war; but the rule laid down by them, as will presently appear, has the important qualification that it rests not upon any principle which forbids but only upon an inability to pay.

We have already shown that this case does not fall within the rule.

The rule referred to was stated by Grotius three hundred years ago, and was repeated by Puffendorf and Vattel two hundred years ago.

Centuries before our own Constitution was adopted, and in said Constitution, a guaranty was given to do that which alone writers declared that the nations and governments in their day were not bound to do. But conceding the rule, nobody has ever questioned that it is a harsh rule, and no writer has ever attempted to justify it except upon the ground of necessity. Inability of nations to pay is the chief reason given for it, as will presently appear. It is not and can not be defended because it is a just rule.

It is only said that it is the misfortune of the citizen to have property where the shock of battle came, or in the path of an invading enemy, and that his Government has not money enough to compensate him. He does his full duty in common with all other citizens, and added to this is the loss of his property, a loss they do not suffer. It is a loss incurred in a conflict involving interests common to all, and justice would demand that the loss should be the loss of all. There is no logic that can reach any other conclusion.

Courts still adhere to it, but no nation in its sovereign capacity is controlled by it or can be justified in resorting to it to escape its moral obligations to its citizens, because it can not be defended upon any principle of justice.

Let me contrast for a moment the methods and the results of war as waged in the seventeenth century, when Grotius compiled his treatise, with the more enlightened and humane principles upon which war has been conducted in the nineteenth century.

These were some of the results of the Thirty Years' War:

> In the single Duchy of Wurttemberg history asserts that 8 towns, 45 villages, and 36,000 houses had been laid in ashes, and 70,000 hearth fires completely extinguished; 7 churches and 444 houses had been burned at Eichsted. Many towns that had escaped destruction were almost depopulated; 300 houses stood empty at Nordheim. More than 200 had been pulled down at Gottingen merely to serve as fuel. The wealthy city of Augsburg, which contained 80,000 inhabitants before the war, had only 18,000 left when it closed. In 1635 there were not hands enough left at Schweidnitz to bury the dead, and the town of Ohlau had lost its last citizen. Forests sprang up during the contest and covered entire districts which had been in full cultivation before the war, and wolves and other beasts of prey took possession of the deserted haunts of men.

Let us turn to a page of modern history. According to Allison's history of Europe, when the Duke of Wellington entered France with his victorious troops after conquering the French on the fields of Spain, he gave peremptory orders that nothing should be taken without compensation. This will be verified by reference to his order contained in his collection of dispatches, edited by Colonel Gerwood. He gave receipts for supplies and money was paid in the camp. The British historian exultantly comments on the conduct of the great soldier, and records the astonishment with which his conduct was regarded by the people both of Spain and of France. In one of his dispatches Wellington says:

> If we were five times stronger than we are, we could not venture to enter France if we can not prevent our soldiers from plundering.

Whether this was upon grounds of policy or in obedience to a milder spirit which gradually then came in vogue in regulating the conduct of war by civilized nations is a matter of little consequence.

Again, I might mention the conduct of our own General Scott, in his invasion of Mexico, in which private property was respected, forced contributions very sparingly resorted to, and payment generally made for supplies drawn from the country of the enemy. Yet even in the midst of the savage methods and reckless devastation of the wars of the seventeenth century, Grotius used the language I have already quoted with regard to the obligation of the State to repair damages suffered by its subjects through the destruction of property for its use, and he emphasizes this principle of justice in these terms:

> Neither can the state be absolved from this obligation, though at present not able to satisfy it; but when the state is in a capacity the suspended obligation shall resume its force.

The argument of necessity and impracticability, so strongly enforced by the writers of those times, would seem no longer to have the same force or application. Surely the aggregate of damages resulting from the incursions into the States of Pennsylvania and Maryland and Ohio and Indiana would be but as a drop in the ocean compared with the aggregate wealth and power of the nation to whom the appeal is made for their payment, and even that body of claims which may be supposed to exist in States of whichK entucky and Missouri are examples, so far as the evidence upon which they are based, may have survived the lapse of twenty-five years, would fall far below our ability to pay the same.

But this claim stands on a higher plane and on a firmer foundation than any of these. Its payment requires no departure from any rule, wise or unwise, just or unjust; it rests not only upon a principle inherently just, but also upon a solemn guaranty in the Constitution of the United States. To that the State of Pennsylvania appeals.

Looking at the claims of the people of our border counties, without reference to their presentation by the State, and regarding them merely as direct claims of individual citizens against the Government, they may be regarded as fortified by numerous precedents. I am inclined to think that the harsher and stricter doctrines of the writers who formulated the principles of public law in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries have been more or less modified by the more enlightened and liberal notions of more recent times, and by the milder methods of carrying on wars between nations.

The dreadful barbarities and reckless waste of life and property which characterized wars in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries have given place to a more humane view of the duties and obligations of nations to each other in a state of hostility. The burning of a town, the wanton destruction of private property, the plunder of noncombatants are rare exceptions in the conduct of modern wars, and whenever they occur they meet the unsparing condemnation of the public opinion of the civilized world.

Therefore, inasmuch as they more rarely occur, the damages are within smaller and more manageable proportions, and the feeling of sympathy for the exceptional misfortunes of those who suffer are strong arguments which move nations to compensate for the undue proportion of suffering and loss that thus happen to be entailed.

Moreover, the disproportion between the damages in such cases and the resources to meet them is by no means so great, and certainly the general aggregate wealth of the nations is vastly greater than in the ruder and the poorer centuries which have preceded ours.

As an example of the more liberal tendency of later times in dealing with exceptional calamities of war, I would refer you to the action of the British Government in its treatment of the Loyalists in their revolted colonies after the close of the Revolution. In the treaty of peace negotiated between the representatives of the New Republic of America and Great Britain, the Federal Government refusing to enter into any stipulation on behalf of the Loyalists who had been stripped of their estates by the colonial authorities further than that they would recommend to the States some sort of consideration for them, it was finally settled upon that basis. This decision of the case of the Loyalists was bitterly attacked in the House of Commons as an abandonment of a national duty.

Lord North said, in commenting upon the provisions of this treaty, that—

> Never were the honor, the principles, the policy of a nation so grossly abused as in the desertion of those men who are now exposed to every punishment that desertion and poverty can inflict because they were not rebels.—Sabine's American Loyalists, volume 1, page 99.

Lord Mulgrave declared that the article respecting the Loyalists he could never regard but as a lasting monument of national disgrace. Mr. Burke said that a vast number of the Loyalists had been deluded by England and had risked everything, and that to such men the nation owed protection, and its honor was pledged to their security at all hazards. The lord chancellor declared that the stipulations of the treaty are specific, and, said he:

> My own conscious honor will not allow me to doubt the good faith of others, and my good wishes to the Loyalists will not let me indiscreetly doubt the dispositions of Congress, since the understanding is that all these unhappy men shall be provided for. Yet if it were not so Parliament could take cognizance of their case and impart to each suffering individual that relief which reason, perhaps policy, certainly virtue and religion, required. (Ibid., page —.)

The debate on the proposed compensation of the American Loyalists in Parliament in 1778 was participated in by Mr. Pitt, Mr. Burke, and Mr. Fox, among others. It is true that Mr. Pitt, in presenting the plan which was adopted, denied their right on the ground of strict justice, but he went so far as to say:

> The American Loyalists could not call upon the House to make compensation for their loss as a matter of strict justice, but they most undoubtedly have strong claims on their generosity and compassion.

But Mr. Fox, perhaps the most liberal of the public men of that day, said that in his opinion the giving the Loyalists relief—

> Is not a matter of liberty, nor a matter of compassion, but what they had a strict right to; not a right to full payment of their unqualified claims, but a strict right to compensation for what they had suffered.

The debate was upon the bill for appointing commissioners further to inquire into the losses and services of all such persons who have suffered in their rights, properties, and professions during the late unhappy dissensions in America in consequence of their loyalty to His Majesty and attachment to the British Government.

Edmund Burke said, among other things:

> The loyalists had certainly been assured from the first authority in the State that if they left their property and joined the King's army, or came to America, they should receive protection and support. That pledge was sacred, and ought to be faithfully fulfilled.

The substance of this discussion will be found in Cobbett's Parliamentary History, published by Hansard, volume 27, pages 610 to 619, inclusive.

The claims were allowed and paid to the extent of more than $16,000,000, an amount then of much greater consequence than a similar amount would be now. These claims were substantially the same as the claims of our own people would be for damages suffered through the action of the late enemies of the Government.

In 1871, September 6, a law was passed authorizing the distribution of a sum of a hundred millions, and on April 7, 1873, authorized payment of one hundred and twenty millions, although in her constitution France had given no such guaranty as is given by section 4 of Article IV of our Constitution.

See letter of James G. Blaine to Hon. Ormsby B. Thomas, chairman War Claims Committee.

See letter of Henry Vigund, secretary legation of the United States, Paris, March 28, 1890, to Hon. James G. Blaine, Secretary of State.

See letter of Mr. Rilet, dated Paris, March 24, 1890.

The acts of our own Government all through its legislative history is full of repeated instances of the exercise of this more liberal spirit. There is a long catalogue of special appropriations that were made for the burning and destruction of property along the Chesapeake by the British in their invasion of 1814. These were not cases of property used for military purposes and destroyed for that reason by the enemy, but property that was destroyed directly by the incursions of the enemy.

There are many cases also of compensation for the destruction of property in the incursions upon our Niagara frontier during the late war with Great Britain.

I might refer to the act of Congress of 1816 providing for the payment of claims for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States during the war of 1812 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 3, page 263), and the liberal spirit in which it was interpreted was an advance somewhat upon the ancient doctrines; the act of July 4, 1864, relative to the payment for quartermaster stores, subsistence, and supplies furnished to the Army (United States Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 331), and subsequent legislation on the same subject; the captured and abandoned property act of March 12, 1863 (United States Statutes at Large, volume 12, page 820), and legislation supplementary thereto.

These are instances of a certain degree of modification in the ancient principles supposed to regulate the liability of the sovereign to make appropriation for losses of property in the course of military operations.

The following are some of the cases of payment made to compensate for property destroyed by the incursions of the enemy during war, to wit:

Act April 24, 1816, to pay William Flood for property destroyed by the British at New Orleans in 1815 (volume 6, Statutes at Large, page 163).

Act of April 27, 1816, to pay Samuel Manac for his property destroyed by hostile Creeks in late war (page 171).

See cases in Report No. 332 on H. R. 4241, Fifty-second Congress, first session. All these cases were for property destroyed, not in occupancy of United States military authorities.

The main reason or argument now assigned for not paying our citizens for such losses sustained by invasions is the mistaken impression that they will be so great it would bankrupt our Government. This is a mere declaration not sustained by any facts. The wildest estimate made to pay the losses by invasion in the border States does not exceed $20,000,000. The income the Government receives in twenty days will pay the whole bill. The aggregate would be small comparatively with the aggregate of those paid under the act of April 9, 1816, and subsequent acts for losses during the war of 1812.

We then had a population of about 8,000,000, and most of our people were poor; we now have 65,000,000 and are the richest nation on the globe; we are far more able to pay now than we were in 1816, or France was in 1872, or Great Britain after the war with the colonies, when she paid £20,000,000 to her people who remained loyal; we are more than able to be just, so let us be just.

In the Franco-Prussian war Germany made France pay her an indemnity of three thousand million francs. Out of this enormous sum Germany paid all her subjects who suffered by reason of the war. The United States asked no indemnity from the Southern people she conquered out of which to indemnify and pay the loyal people of the North who had been invaded, its people harried, their fields laid waste, their goods of all kinds confiscated, homes burned by the Confederate troopers and armies. Instead, the United States has been paying the people in the disloyal States, not under a guaranty in the Constitution, but by acts of Congress, millions of dollars, Tennessee alone up to March, 1884, having received $2,150,791.80. (See Report No. 720, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, H. R. 5377.)

These examples might be multiplied, but need not be. The manifest and conclusive teaching of them all is to admonish legislatures and governments that the spirit of the age and the morality of the public law unite in demanding that where war has brought upon individuals peculiar and special losses which have been incurred for and resulted in the general good of the entire people, there the Treasury of the entire people ought to make compensation therefor.

I do not base our claims upon any appeal that I might make to your generosity and liberality. I do not stand before you asking charity or a gift. I am willing, for the purposes of the argument, to concede the authority of the principles laid down by writers on public law upon the subject of the liability of States for the unavoidable misfortunes of their subjects. I place our case upon the higher and firmer ground that the claim is now made by the State under the express letter and the undoubted spirit of the contract to which she is a party, and by which the General Government has obligated itself to execute certain duties toward our State as to all the others.

Having failed to expend its treasure and its resources for our special protection, whether the justification therefor be sufficient or not, we are entitled to be relieved, as far as possible, from the consequences of that failure, by an appropriation of a much less amount than would have been regarded as properly expended if it had been directly appropriated in the first instance to guard against the misfortunes that have followed from the failure to act. Let the loss thus incurred be distributed among all. Upon that principle will our Government best be administered, the principal end of its existence secured.

Pennsylvania now comes under the guaranty of the Constitution and presents her claim for her people. Say to her, "You are under no more obligation to continue to bear the losses resulting from the nation's default than you were liable to have contributed directly more than your quota of men or share of stores and money for the common defense. So, having been involved in loss and expenditure of property, in order to secure that common good let that expenditure be borne by all proportionately and justly, and no longer be left to remain a burden upon one alone."

Fair valleys devastated, a beautiful and prosperous town wantonly destroyed by fire, hundreds of families reduced to hopeless poverty, are the sacrifice made by our State to the common cause. She had a right to have her borders guarded, her people defended; but her territory was left open to the advance of the enemy; her soldiery, who had assembled for her defense, were hurried away to other points at the almost frantic command of the national authorities. The sacrifice was willingly made at the mandate of national necessity.

Let the contribution so made be reimbursed, so that our State, which had no weightier interests at stake in the great struggle than New York, or Connecticut, or Maine, or the remoter States of the Northwest, whose waving fields never felt the fierce breath of war and whose peaceful homes were never disturbed by the rude intrusion of the hostile trooper, shall no longer be compelled to bear the sad consequences of her devotion and sacrifice to the cause of the common country.

I have now presented the case of my people. I can do no more. We stand here with clean hands. A case fully made out under the facts and law. You must as the final arbitors render the verdict.

Empire or Republic—Retention of the Philippines.

SPEECH

OF

HON. JOHN S. WILLIAMS,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, April 3, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii—

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I believe that very nearly all of the arguments which have been made by the imperialists of this country in favor of the retention of remote islands populated by alien and inferior races have been disposed of except, perhaps, two. One is the "mission" plea, and the other is the "manifest-destiny" plea. People tell us, Mr. Chairman, that we have a "mission" to perform in the Philippine Islands. As for myself, I am somewhat distrustful of men with "missions."

In my limited experience I have found that the man who has a "mission," or who pretends to have a "mission," has some greed, some avarice, some selfish purpose, or else some fanatical notion in his head, and in order to recommend it to other people strives to get the idea into their minds that he is in partnership with the Lord God Almighty. [Applause.] Now, my friends, although this is in general a description of the class of persons claiming to have a "mission," yet it is also true that every man, every woman, and, more than that, every nation has a mission in this world, for the most part unrealized in any definite way by themselves; and when you inquire seriously what that mission is, or must be, your answer will always be that it is for the particular entity to live its life in character with its nature.

You must know, therefore, what a thing is before you can say what its mission is. You must know what sort of a ship you are on, what direction you are taking, and how fast you are going before you can know where you are going to land or where you ought to be expected to land. Therefore it becomes important to inquire what we are among the nations of the world. Then we may determine possibly—approximately, at any rate—what our mission is.

Then what are we? What sort of a ship of state?

We are, Mr. Chairman, a Constitutional Democratic Republic. We are "constitutional," as contradistinguished from those nations of the world who are governed by the discretion either of a king, a czar, an emperor, an aristocracy, or even a parliament. We are "democratic" as contradistinguished from those republics which are aristocratic or plutocratic. The chief corner stone of the faith of a democratic republic consists in the fact that its end and aim and object is the liberty and the happiness of the individual citizen, as contradistinguished from the happiness, the welfare, or the supremacy of a class, or the splendor of a state.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we are a "Republic" as contradistinguished from all monarchical power—from a mo-narch, to go back to the etymological pronunciation—a one-man power.

Now, having gotten along that far, can it be the mission of a constitutional government to carry the flag and government where the Constitution can not follow—to establish government where the government locally must be, if it preserves civilization at all, a government in contradiction of its own Constitution? Can it be the mission of a democratic republic to carry the flag and domination where democratic institutions and democratic relations and conditions among the citizens can not follow?

And what are democratic institutions? Upon what basis does the democratic temple rest? Why, sir, it rests upon three pillars—fraternity, equality, and liberty; these three support it. Is there anybody here that can contend for a moment that we can carry with safety to ourselves, our institutions, and our civilization, to the Filipinos the creed of their equality with ourselves and our children throughout the ages in molding the destiny of this Republic?

Is there anybody not a hypocrite who pretends for one moment that we can carry a genuine spirit of "fraternity" to a different race from ourselves, in our opinion inferior to ourselves? The whole history of the world shows it impossible. Do you contend that you will carry to them even the mere muniments of inherited English liberty? If so, your conduct toward Porto Rico proves your contention false, and Porto Ricans, Mr. Chairman, are two-thirds Caucasian.

Then can it be the mission of a democratic republic to carry the rule of the republic where democratic institutions can not rest upon democratic pillars? But last of all, can it be the mission of a "republic"—of any sort of republic—to carry the flag and domination where the character of the government, which must be inaugurated and which must continue to exist, shall be essentially and in all main things a monarchical government—a government by a monarch, whether that monarch be under the name of a monarch, a president, a military satrap, or a proconsular governor.

So much for that, Mr. Chairman. Then let us see about our "manifest destiny." I know what destiny is, and I know that every man has a destiny and that every nation has one. I know that there is a God in history who works upon us and by means of us to accomplish His own purposes, and that those purposes, so far as this world is concerned, are for the upraising of humanity and the amelioration of the conditions of the great masses of mankind, but I do not know what "manifest" destiny is.

We all have a destiny, but it has not been manifested to many of us. But if there be any manifest destiny at all for any man or for any nation, that manifest destiny lies in this, that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he surely reap." If he sows chains abroad, he will reap slavery at home. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If he sows contempt of constitutional limitations and guaranties abroad, he will some day find the very men whom he has taught to laugh at them as "cradle fixings" and "swaddling clothes that we have outgrown" laughing at them again at his very door when he appeals to them for protection. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

An imperial army has a "destiny," too, Mr. Chairman. Its destiny is to destroy free institutions.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard the "mission" argument carried still further. I have heard ministers of the gospel pretendedly preaching, not the gospel of Mohammed, who carried faith to the unfaithful by fire and the sword, but the doctrine of Jesus Christ, say that we had "a mission to civilize and Christianize the people in the far Orient." How? By means of Krag-Jörgensen rifles and the sword of the cavalry? It is not the mission of Christianity to make wounds, but to bind them up. It is its mission not to start the tears of women and children, but to assuage them—not to destroy home and home life, but to teach people to make and beautify homes.

It would surprise nobody who ever lived more than it would astound the Fisherman of Galilee Himself and His disciples to hear that the doctrine of peace, the doctrine of freedom—and of democratic freedom at that, for it is the democracy of the teachings of Jesus Christ that prove His divinity—were "destined" or had a "mission" to be carried to the peoples of the world by Krag-Jörgensen rifles, men-of-war, and proconsular viceroys. Why, the cardinal doctrine of His teaching was that you became whatever you were by what was nurtured in you and came out of you as an emanating influence to the world, and not by something superimposed upon you by an authority higher than yourself.

However, Mr. Chairman, I did not rise this evening so much for the purpose of speaking myself as for the purpose of obtaining the permission of the House to insert in the RECORD in this connection parts of two speeches made by the Hon. Carl Schurz at the city of Chicago. Mr. Chairman, if I have not that permission already, I want permission to insert in the RECORD, in extension of my remarks, the speeches I have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent of the committee to extend his remarks by the insertion of the article referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[The speeches of Mr. Schurz referred to will appear at the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to ask, furthermore, Mr. Chairman, permission to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a letter written by the Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, to the editors of the Journal, Advertiser, Herald, and Globe at Boston, Mass., in connection with some criticisms made upon him because of the position which he had taken upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by adding to them a letter written by the Hon. GEORGE F. HOAR. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[The letter of Senator HOAR referred to will be found in the RECORD at the conclusion of the two speeches of Mr. Schurz.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire furthermore to ask permission to insert in the RECORD a part—a good part of it I have stricken out—of a little pamphlet which I hold in my hand called The Liberty Catechism, and written by Frederick W. Gookin.

Mr. KNOX. I do not know anything about the author of the pamphlet. Who is the author of the pamphlet?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Frederick W. Gookin.

Mr. KNOX. Who may he be, please?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I really do not know; and, Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those men who care much about "who a man may be" if what he says is sound and reasonable, and in my opinion appeals to the heart and head from the right standpoint.

Mr. HILL. I will ask the gentleman if he has read the pamphlet?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, indeed, I have, and very carefully edited it, too, and stricken out a good deal that I did not agree with; but there is a good deal that I do agree with, and that I wish to adopt as my own.

Mr. KNOX. I am not sufficiently informed about Mr. Gookin——

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this is the first time that I have heard of this pamphlet, but that Frederick W. Gookin is one of my distinguished constituents.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now I know he is all right. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. He is the cashier of the Commercial National Bank of Chicago, a very able man, and a very thoughtful man, and a man very much interested in all public questions.

Mr. KNOX. Ought not the whole of this pamphlet to be inserted?

Mr. BOUTELL of Illinois. I should think anything that Mr. Gookin would write would be worthy of insertion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Some of it is a little bit too Republican for me, and I shall leave that out. [Laughter.] The balance of it I shall insert and adopt as my own.

Mr. KNOX. Would not the gentleman be willing to insert the whole pamphlet?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, sir. What I insert I make my own and I must agree with it or else I could not adopt it. There are some things in almost everybody's utterances that I do not agree with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by adding to them such parts of the Catechism of Liberty as he agrees to, and has indicated.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman means fragmentary liberty, not the full catechism.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I will head it to suit myself; but I will say that there will be no liberty taken with the manuscript that would hurt a Democratic heart in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

[Mr. Gookin's Catechism of Liberty will be found in the RECORD, at the conclusion of Senator HOAR'S letter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to insert as a part of my remarks a part of a speech made by the Hon. George S. Boutwell, a gentleman who, by the way, I suppose, is known to the gentleman from Massachusetts and to other gentlemen in the House—a distinguished Republican, a distinguished statesman, an ex-Senator and ex-Cabinet officer, and, I believe, one of the fathers of the Republican party.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he extend his remarks by the addition of a portion of the speech of the Hon. George S. Boutwell. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Hon. George S. Boutwell's speech will be found in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. Gookin's pamphlet.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I shall devote that time to reading some things to this House that I think will be very pleasant reading "to men of good will." This is quoted from The Public of December 23:

In his message President McKinley said he had "every reason to believe" that the cession of the Philippines to the United States was in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino people. But what reasons had Mr. McKinley for believing this? He specifies none. And certainly the burden of proof is upon him, for the only expression of the Filipino people so far made came through the envoys of the Filipino republic, and those expressions were hostile to the cession. The envoys did all in their power to bring them to Mr. McKinley's attention, but without success. How can he say that he had "every" reason to believe that the Filipino people approved the cession when he refused to listen to the only expression of sentiment that any of the Filipino people in an organized capacity ever attempted to make?

Here is another one. I leave out part of it because it is personally denunciatory of the President. I am not going to be bound by that sort of thing. I am never in the habit of personally denouncing my political opponents, believing that such a habit is not good in reason nor sound in policy. This part of it is sound:

Mr. McKinley attempted in his vote-hunting speech at Fargo to scandalize Aguinaldo by insinuating that this young Filipino leader had been bribed by the Spanish. That libel has been utterly discredited, as Mr. McKinley must know; so completely discredited that it has no standing any more outside of yellow journals and willful libelers. But note Mr. McKinley's comment upon the slander. Said he, referring to Aguinaldo and his demand for independence as the condition of peace: "He had another price than that once, but the United States pays no gold for peace."

Does not that sound, Mr. Chairman, like the fathers of the old Republic when they said, "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute?" Yet, what a plain tale shall put its pretensions down, and a tale of the President's own making at that? Listen:

Evidently Mr. McKinley had forgotten that the only excuse yet offered for his paying gold to the Sultan of Sulu to continue a polygamous, pro-slavery, and Mohammedan government there was to secure peace. It would seem that the United States does pay gold for peace. But no. Mr. McKinley is right, as usual. It was not gold with which peace was bought of the Sultan. It was silver.

We can at last thank the President a little on this side of the Chamber, it seems, for "finding a use" for silver.

Then, Mr. Chairman, here is something that I recommend to the House. It is good reading:

Self-government rather than good government! That was the keynote of the anti-imperial conference. The sentiment is profoundly true. It touches the depths of political morality. Not that good government is to be despised or regarded with indifference or even with secondary concern. Good government is among the highest of human aspirations. Politically speaking, it is the very highest. But no government other than self-government can by any possibility be or ever become good.

It may be stable—as stable as the government of the Czar. It may be peaceful—as peaceful as the government of a prison. It may be good government in the estimation of the privileged classes. But it can not be good in the only sense in which unselfish and truly religious and patriotic men have a right to call government good. New York in the worst days of Tweed was better governed than Warsaw in the best days of the order that reigned there. By its keynote sentiment the anti-imperial conference justified itself.

We have frequently shown from the acts of the Administration that its purpose is to establish crown colonies after the English model. Senator LODGE only says so in terms. Thus the United States, a Federation of democratic Commonwealths, is to become, as to its "new possessions," a monarchy with their inhabitants as subjects. How long after we get crown colonies will it be before we have a crowned head?—From the Public, December 30, 1899.

"American crown colonies." How does the phrase strike you? Please hear the following elucidation of the interpretation of the Secretary of War of the power of the Federal Government:

Should Secretary Root's interpretation of the power of the Federal Government be adopted, the Federation of American States will soon be superseded by a veritable empire, with the States as subordinate departments, and crown colonies scattered over the earth. In order to bolster up the colonial system which the Administration evidently desires to establish, if possible, Mr. Root exactly reverses the constitutional principle that has heretofore controlled.

It has always been held that the United States have no powers except such as the Constitution confers, all other powers having been reserved to the States; but Mr. Root argues that the United States acquire undelegated powers simply because they constitute a nation. His object in this is to establish the constitutional right of the United States to hold the Philippines and Puerto Rico as crown colonies, after the British method, giving to the inhabitants no constitutional rights of American citizenship nor any of the constitutional securities as to trade.—From The Public of December 8, 1899.

But there are those who say that we have already expanded. I myself care but little about words. Certain, however, it is that there is no expansion, whether done or yet to be done, involved in the retention of the Philippine Islands. The phrase would have been more accurate had it been "we have already imperialized." Whether this be true or not—and that it is not true I have the word of the President himself, who has upon many occassions said that "the question is one for Congress to determine," and whose followers on the floor are now contending that our occupation of the Philippines is merely provisional and military, and that therefore the islands can not be considered at this stage of our history as "parts of the United States"—I have only to say that if we have already imperialized, let us then disimperialize, and go swiftly about the work.

Republicans tell us upon this floor that Congress has under the Constitution the power "to dispose of the Territories." If so, and if the Philippine Islands have become a territory or territories of the United States, let us, in Heaven's name, "dispose of" them in some way, either by granting them autonomy and independence, which is the remedy suggested by us, or by dividing them up and selling to those nations of the world who are said to be so anxious to possess them. If we had a right to buy them, then we have the right to sell them. Upon this question I insert an extract from an editorial in the Land of Sunshine, edited by Charles F. Lummis, headed—

WHILE THERE IS YET TIME.

President McKinley tells us that "we have expanded," and that it is no longer a question. * * * But probably it is not yet too late in this country for a plain American to rise and ask, "How? When? Who's 'we?' What was the date and what were the ceremonials?" Certainly to annul the Constitution of the United States must have taken a specific act by specific persons at a specific point of time. These things do not come by evaporation nor as a dream in the night, without agent or chronology or responsibility. If there are no Americans left who might be curious, the historian at least will wish to know. * * * If for more than a century we have been wasting our own time and that of Congress, and the thing can be so easily done without any help from us, let us know how, that we may save trouble next time.

I can not sit down without recurring to the flag argument, and the idea that it is the patriotic duty of every citizen to support the Administration of his country, if, perchance, only that Administration be involved in war, regardless of the character of the war or the causes of its inauguration, or the intent of the Administration in carrying it on. Edmund Burke long ago exposed, in words familiar to every American schoolboy, the falsity, even the ludicrousness, of this contention. Mr. Charles F. Lummis adds something worth thinking about upon that question:

NOT YET TREASON TO THINK.

They are either not very thoughtful or not very honest who are crying, "Sh! you mustn't think in time of war!"

Every sober man knows that in the intended sense this is no "time of war." The argument rests on such war as menaces the country, and then, indeed, a patriot may have to fight first and think afterwards. But to pretend that this nation is in such danger from the Filipinos that we must put our reason under martial law is a little too absurd. * * * The only danger this country is in, or ever will be in, is from the citizens who think self-government is a sort of blind man's buff, and that all they have to do is to shut their eyes and minds and grope in the wake of the gentleman who is "it."—Charles F. Lummis, editorial in the Land of Sunshine.

To that I add the following:

TO BE KEPT RIGHT.

We must combat the notion that our country can do no wrong. She can, and she will if we let her. Human nature would always be doing wrong if we did not try not to. Precisely because we are in a war, it is the time when every American needs most to remember his obligation and to watch that the honor of his country be not left to a venal few or an intoxicated many.

And this:

WHAT IT STANDS FOR.

The American flag is what it stands for. There is no sovereign virtue in the bunting itself nor in the stitches that confirm it. There should even be Americans of moral courage enough to lower that flag when it is where it does not belong. It once floated in Mexico. Were they not patriots who hauled it down?

But there are too many Americans now who dare to haul down the spirit of our flag at home. For more than a century the Stars and Stripes have stood for human rights and the consent of the governed. They do not stand for that in the Philippines to-day. They will not always stand for that in the United States if we misuse them elsewhere.

The men who corrupt our politics; the men who surrender conscience; the men who do not care—these are the ones who are really hauling down our flag. It is time for us to stop chatter about six yards of cloth and concern ourselves with the soul of which that cloth is only a token. And to begin with, we had better lay quiet, firm hands upon the only dangerous enemies this nation has in the whole world. We shall need no cruisers to get them, nor weapons to lay them by the heels, more than "That weapon which comes down as still

As snowflakes fall upon the sod,
But executes a freeman's will
As lightning does the will of God."

Here is another from The Public regarding the real purpose of the Administration concerning the Philippine question:

Regarding the Philippine question, the Presidential mouthpiece for that purpose in the Senate has indicated the Presidential policy with unmistakable distinctness. We allude to Senator BEVERIDGE, of Indiana. It is not a policy of expansion Mr. BEVERIDGE advocates. It is a policy of undisguised imperialism, and the chief motive is commercial exploitation. "The times call for candor," he says, and candid he unquestionably is. Looking without a blush upon his countrymen as belonging to a race of remorseless brigands, he admonishes the Senate that "that man little knows the common people of the Republic, little understands the instincts of our race who thinks we will not hold" our conquest "fast, and hold it forever."

And the race thus characterized by himself as a race guided by instincts of insatiable greed he has the impious effrontery to entitle "trustee, under God, of the civilization of the world." It is well to know the depths to which this Administration has sunk in its mad departure from the eminently American precept that "forcible annexation" is "criminal aggression;" and Senator BEVERIDGE in his Philippine speech renders us that service. The day has now gone by when Administration organs can fool dull devotees of party by pretending that no variation from American traditions is contemplated. They must either repudiate the Administration or accept imperialism in all its nakedness.

The purpose of the Administration is proclaimed by this Administration Senator as authoritatively as possible outside of a Presidential message. And it proves to be what critics of the Administration have predicted in the face of ridicule that it would be—a policy of world-wide empire, maintained by overwhelming military force in ceaseless action against all resistance. Without concealment we are now invited upon an imperial and military career like that wherein Rome—the old "trustee, under God, of the civilization of the world"—lost her own liberties in struggling to destroy the liberties of other peoples, and finally disappeared in the gloom of the dark ages in which her own betrayal of her ideals of liberty had enshrouded the world.—From The Public of January 13, 1900.

And right there, Mr. Chairman, I am moved to call the attention of the House to the difference between "expansion" and "imperialism." I am in favor of institutional and constitutional expansion, and the Democratic party has been the great party of expansion, and will be in the future as it has been in the past, whenever and wherever there is a field for "expansion" and not for "imperialism." What is expansion? It is stretching yourself out, carrying yourself as a nation, with all that clothes you and makes you, your Constitution and free institutions, to people somewhere else; not superimposing yourself upon somebody, but carrying your Government, its spirit, its Constitution, its laws, its aspirations, its traditions—in short, its soul as well as its body—to new parts of the world.

To expand in the historical American and Democratic sense is to incorporate in the body politic as a part of an equal population other peoples who can cooperate with us in carrying the Republic on to its destiny as a constitutional democratic republic, whose essential aim is home happiness, and liberty—"the greatest good for the greatest number." But what is imperialism? It is merely stretching your sway, your power, your dominion, superimposing yourself bodily only upon somebody somewhere as a paramount power, superimposing yourself as a nation upon another people or other peoples held by military or political power as your inferiors or your subjects.

That is the difference between "expansion" and "imperialism." Every good Democrat is an expansionist; every good Democrat believes that we can go into unfilled areas fit for homes for the sons and daughters of the American people, fit for free men to live and labor and grow and increase in, fit for development by men who love liberty, and by women who are pure, and make pure and healthy homes for themselves and their children. There is a field for "expansion" for the American people. Wherever, moreover, you can find a kindred population capable of assimilation with ours, capable of understanding, appreciating, and loving our institutions, there is also a field for the Republic's expansion.

But wherever you can find only alien and inferior races that do not intend to welcome and can not understand your institutions, wherever you may not extend your constitutional guaranties, wherever you must live either as arbitrary master or not live at all, wherever you must have either the military to rise supreme and be a military power or else anarchy to prevail, that is not a place for the Republic to go. In such places there can not be "expansion"—institutional, constitutional, democratic, republican expansion. Only one thing can grow in such places—the noxious weed imperialism.

Truly, alas! as the author of the article just read, says: "It is the policy of undisguised imperialism," which the Administration would recommend as a "poisoned chalice" to our lips.

Why, even the leader of the Republican party, in his lucid intervals, is an American citizen and remembers that he is the chief of a democratic republic. He had one lucid interval when he said, "Forcible annexation is criminal aggression."

Surely that phrase is, as the writer of the article just read says it is, "an eminently American precept." "Ah!" as Rip Van Winkle says, "how soon it vas forgot."

Mr. HILL. What is the article you just read an extract from?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. From The Public of January 13, 1900.

Mr. Chairman, I was astonished the other day to read in the RECORD that a Senator from a great State had drawn a roseate picture for the fond and aspiring eyes of the American people, exhibiting to them in that guise a career of imperialism and world dominion. I was still more astonished when he cited as illustrations of the grandeur and glory and greatness of such a career the instances of the Grecian empire in Asia and the Roman empire of the world.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, reading the History of the Nineteenth Century, by Gervinus, the great German historian, who, when he came to tell the cause of the fall of the empire of Napoleon the Great, expressed it in one German word, "Ueberspannung"—overspanning, overstretching, overextension, going too far. Had the great Corsican been satisfied with the natural boundaries of France—the Alps, the Pyrenees, and the Rhine—his stupendous work would exist to-day true to itself and beneficent to mankind.

The Roman Empire might be existing in all essentials, Christianized and purified, but Roman still, but for the insane and self-destructive greed and love of blood implanted in the hearts of the senators and the populace of Rome by a career of world dominion. Rome could "expand" in Europe, it could only "imperialize" in Asia. Its natural boundaries, geographically, politically, and institutionally were essentially European.

The glory, greatness, the power and taste and art, the "ineffable grace" of Greece might be existing to-day in somewhat different and Christianized form but for following the Macedonian madman with her best blood to the plains of Asia, imperializing, not expanding—putting all her energies and the lives of her best and bravest and highest at the behest of "empire"—making vast, and in the end exhausting, sacrifices in an effort in which Alexander and his successors, and Greece with them, failed. Failed how? By losing all that was essentially Greek and becoming all that was essentially Asiatic.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I for one feel that when the Senator called upon us in eloquent, though somewhat sophomoric, phrases to look back upon the failures of history which he would have us consider worthy of our imitation, drawing pictures of them in bright but false colors to lure me and you into running the race which they had run, he underestimated the intelligence, as well as the historic knowledge, of the American people. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

ANTI-IMPERIALIST MEETING—CARL SCHURZ'S ADDRESS AT THE CONFERENCE IN PHILADELPHIA—WASHINGTON'S IDEAL—OUR TREATMENT OF THE FILIPINOS—PROMISES MADE—THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE SITUATION.

MR. SCHURZ'S ADDRESS.

The address of Mr. Schurz—"For the Republic of Washington and Lincoln"—which was the principal feature of the conference, follows in full:

THREE PROVIDENTIAL FAVORS.

Look back upon the time when our country first rose into view. Europe was in the throes of the bloody and destructive struggles following the Reformation. The efforts for religious freedom seemed rather to hamper than to promote the efforts for the political enfranchisement of peoples. On the European Continent modern absolutism issued from the confusion.

Even in England, where a certain measure of political freedom had been won by long contests, and where at last the Crown was overthrown by the great rebellion, the Commonwealth quickly degenerated into a military absolutism, which in its turn had to yield to the restoration of the royal power. And when a new revolution resulted in firmly establishing constitutional government, still that Government remained preponderantly aristocratic, and the church continued to be united with the state.

While these troubles were afflicting the peoples of Europe, who were painfully staggering under the inherited burdens and shackles of feudal institutions and privileges and customs and traditions heaped upon them by past centuries, the soil now occupied by this great Republic was opened to the best aspirations of a new era.

The Englishmen, Germans, Dutch, Frenchmen, Swedes, Celts, who sought their fortunes here found a free field for their activities. No matter whether they came in search of an asylum for their religious beliefs or in quest of wealth or adventure; no matter whether kings still claimed this New World as theirs, and whether aristocrats or great proprietaries tried to preserve something like feudal authority, all pretensions adverse to political freedom speedily vanished in this atmosphere. Here that freedom had not to struggle through any established institutions or customs inherited from the past. Here the seed of democracy planted itself in virgin soil, to grow and bear fruit without hindrance. Here was, therefore, the natural birthplace of that great charter of human rights and human liberty, the Declaration of Independence, pointing out the goal to be reached and destined to serve as a guiding star to all mankind. If here the momentous problem of government of, for, and by the people is not to be solved, where in the world can it be?

This greatest of all opportunities was the providential favor Washington recognized; and he did not fail to point out the awful responsibility arising from it when he said: "The preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally staked on the experiment intrusted to the hands of the American people." And the manner in which he thought that this our great opportunity should be turned to the benefit of mankind, he forcibly indicated by expressing in his Farewell Address his ardent wish "that the happiness of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made so complete, by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and the adoption of every nation which is as yet a stranger to it." And further: "Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all; religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant day, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence."

Thus did Washington view the first providential favor bestowed upon this people, and also our duty to spread this blessing among the nations, not by the force of arms, but by the moral power of example.

The second was no less extraordinary, although Washington himself would have been too modest to avow it. It consisted in the fact that the first President of this Republic furnished in himself, by his character, the principles he followed, the motives that inspired him, and the wisdom of his policies, the most perfect model of a republican chief magistrate in the history of the world—a President to whose teachings and example all his successors—indeed, all those wielding public power in this Republic—could with the utmost confidence look for safest guidance. Surely no other nation has ever been so signally blessed.

The third unique providential favor enjoyed by the American people consists, owing to their geographical situation, in their happy exemption from those embarrassments and dangers by which other nations, being in constant touch with powerful, jealous, and possibly hostile neighbors, feel themselves obliged to keep up vast, burdensome, and constantly increasing armaments on land and sea. For more than three-quarters of a century—a war of our own making and the period of our civil conflict excepted—the American people have enjoyed the inestimable boon of a substantially unarmed peace in perfect security. Until recently we valued this priceless privilege so heartily and proudly that we looked down with pitying superiority upon the nations of the Old World, seeing them grievously burdened with their monstrous military and naval establishments; and we watched with an almost disdainful smile their incessant efforts to increase those burdens in their nervous anxiety lest some rival might get an advantage; until at last one of their mightiest rulers truthfully confessed that the ruinous competition could not much longer go on without fatal consequences. And we were the only great nation on earth securely free from these drag weights and worries.

This is no mere fancy picture. The history of a century bears it out. Excepting the period of our civil war, we had, compared with other great powers, neither army nor navy, and yet our rights and our honor were safe all over the globe. The greatest sea power on earth yielded to us far more deference than to any other nation. Why all this? While a hostile power wishing to attack us would have had the advantage of greater readiness, it could not strike at a vital point in our continental stronghold. It would have had to count upon a discouragingly long struggle against immense resources and an incalculable staying power on our side, and during that struggle it would have offered dangerous opportunities to its jealous rivals in the Old World. Moreover, it was thought that our Monroe doctrine, looking to the primacy of this Republic in this hemisphere, would keep us from unnecessary meddling with Old World affairs.

Therefore we could not have a war unless we kicked some foreign nation into it. Even all our wishes concerning Cuba would probably have been conceded by Spain without firing a gun if we had only waited. In one word, it was the first precept of European statesmanship to remain on good terms with this Republic at almost any cost. And therefore it was that we were secure in the enjoyment of the inestimable blessing of unarmed peace, with the fullest liberty to devote all our social energies to the development of our immense material resources and of our mental and moral capabilities; to the solution of the great problem of popular government given in our charge, and to our glorious mission to promote the cause of liberty and civilization among mankind by the peaceable moral force of our example.

These were the extraordinary providential favors bestowed upon the American people, part of which Washington witnessed, part of which he foresaw, and the duties and responsibilities flowing from which he felt so deeply.

THE NEW COURSE.

What have we done with these blessings? While the conduct of the American democracy has indeed not reached the ideal which was in Washington's mind, and while for this reason it has had its failures, and those failures have had to be dearly paid for, yet remaining until recently substantially true to the most essential principles upon which it was founded, and especially to Washington's precepts concerning its intercourse with the outside world, the Republic has achieved a measure of development in wealth, greatness, and power that has in a like space of time never been equaled by any nation in history.

But now we are told that we have come to a turning point; that the very power we have won in walking that providential path obliges us to strike out in a different direction; that we must no longer content ourselves with making this vast continent the home of a free, peaceable, and happy people, with an honest endeavor to solve on this virgin soil the momentous problem of popular self-government, and with advancing the cause of liberty and civilization among mankind by the moral force of our example, but that we must give up the priceless privilege of unarmed peace; that we must have big fleets and armies in order to play a new part in the affairs of the world; that we must become conquerors to spread our commerce and have far-away possessions and rule foreign peoples as our subjects—no matter what the original design of our Republic and the fundamental principles of our democracy may have been. And when the advocates of this new course are hard pressed in argument they always resort as their last refuge to the plea that Providence has precipitated us into this new course and that it is vain to resist.

WHAT IS PROVIDENTIAL?

Nobody can be less disposed than I am to pose as a mouthpiece of Providence. But I do maintain that when we speak of something having been so ordained by Providence, that no human being could be held responsible for it, we can only mean that the will of man one way or the other could not play a determining part in it. In this sense it may be said that geographic, climatic, and other such conditions, which made the building up of a great democracy on this American soil so natural, were providential; that the rising up of an ideal leader at the beginning of our Government was providential; that the peculiar situation of this Republic among the powers of the earth, enabling it to build up that great democracy in the New World untroubled by the jealousies and quarrels of other nations, was providential. But can it be maintained that in the same sense the conquest of the Philippines was providential, and that President McKinley was right when he said in Boston, February 16, 1899, "The Philippines were intrusted to our hands by the providence of God; it is a trust we have not sought?" Look at the facts.

Some time before our war with Spain broke out its possible contingencies were attentively considered by the Administration. Commodore Dewey, commanding our Asiatic Squadron, informed himself about the state of the Spanish power in those regions, and weeks before the declaration of war, on March 31, 1898, he reported to our Government that he could destroy the Spanish fleet and reduce the defenses of Manila in a single day, and added: "There is every reason to believe that with Manila taken or even blockaded the rest of the islands would fall either to the insurgents or ourselves."

Dewey was instructed to make his squadron ready for battle, and then, when war was declared, to seek the Spanish fleet and destroy it. All this was done, not by any mysterious dispensation, but by order of the Navy Department. When Spain, after a series of defeats, got ready for peace, the Secretary of the Navy telegraphed to Dewey as follows:

"WASHINGTON, August 13, 1898.

"The President desires to receive from you any important information you may have of the Philippines; the desirability of the several islands; the character of their population; coal and other mineral deposits; their harbor and commercial advantages, and, in a naval and commercial sense, which would be the most advantageous," etc.

Thus it appears that the President was then not yet quite certain how far it would be profitable to us that Providence should impose that "unsought" trust upon us. When he had received information which made him think it would be profitable to have the whole archipelago intrusted to us, he instructed our peace commissioners at Paris to insist that Spain should cede us the whole. And after a long and arduous wrestle with the representatives of Spain, as described in Senate Document No. 62, our commissioners at last succeeded in extorting from them the cession of what sovereignty Spain had over all those islands, and they agreed that the United States should pay $20,000,000 therefor.

PROVIDENCE AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Thus the record shows most conclusively that the conquest of the Philippines was not thrust upon the Administration by a mysterious and overruling power, but that it was deliberately planned with a cool calculation of profit, and that if the business so far has not been as successful as expected, it proves only that the calculation was not quite correct. And when now President McKinley tries to make the American people accept his interpretation that the Philippines were simply "intrusted to our hands by the providence of God" and that "it is a trust we have not sought," he has, to say the least, taken liberties with Providence which he may answer for. With the same right Napoleon invading Spain and making one of his brothers King of that country, and Maximilian, made Emperor of Mexico by the bayonets of French invaders, might have piously turned up their eyes, saying that the providence of God had intrusted those countries to their hands and that it was a trust they had not sought. Coming from their mouths, Mr. McKinley himself would have called such words hypocritical cant, if not blasphemy.

Let us now see in what manner the policy for which the President makes divine Providence responsible was carried out. We made war upon Spain, as our Congress solemnly declared to the American people and to all mankind, for the purpose of liberating the Cuban people from Spanish oppression, declaring that they were, and of right ought to be, free and independent. It was a grand spectacle—a great nation voluntarily undergoing the burdens and horrors of war merely to secure to a foreign population that freedom and independence they were painfully struggling for. It was a purpose so noble in its unselfishness that many persons abroad would not believe in its sincerity, but charged us with some secret selfish design of conquest. At this we were extremely angry.

Then came Dewey's victory in Manila Bay, and with it the temptation testing our sincerity. Dewey invited the chief of the Filipino insurgents, Aguinaldo, to join him and encouraged and aided him with arms and ammunition to organize the revolutionary movement against Spain on a great scale. Aguinaldo did so; he formed an army of about 30,000 men, set up a civil government which, according to the testimony of the imperialist agitator Barrett, who had seen it, compared in its Congress favorably with the Parliament of Japan, and had well-constructed and active executive departments and an internal administration working admirably, as described by gentlemen belonging to the Navy and vouched for by Admiral Dewey; an army, a civil government, and an internal administration infinitely superior to anything of the kind the insurgent Cubans ever had.

The Filipino army went to work fighting the Spaniards most successfully, taking many thousands of them prisoners. In fact, it virtually did the only fighting against the Spaniards on the Philippine Islands between the time of Dewey's victory, on May 1, 1898, and the time of the surrender of Manila, on August 12, and that fighting redounded to the benefit of our forces; for the Filipino army cleared the interior of the country of Spanish troops and cooped up the Spanish garrison of Manila, effectually blockading that city on the land side, while our ships and the American troops that had meanwhile assembled blockaded it on the sea side, so that the Spaniards in Manila could neither get reinforcements nor withdraw into the interior.

OUR FILIPINO ALLIES.

While these services were being rendered by the Filipinos, and their effective cooperation sought and accepted by us, the Filipinos acted as our allies against a common foe. And then when we had taken Manila and assembled a large land force there, did we remember that we had gone to war against Spain with the solemn proclamation that this should be a war of liberation, and not of conquest, and that our Filipino allies were fairly entitled to the full benefit of that pledge? No; not that. President McKinley entered into peace negotiations with the common enemy, Spain; negotiations from which our allies, the Filipinos, who urgently asked to be heard, were carefully shut out, and through his peace commissioners President McKinley concluded, behind the backs of our allies, a treaty with Spain, the common enemy, by which he recognized, not that the Philippine Islanders were, and of right ought to be, free and independent, like the Cubans, but that Spain, even after having been actually ousted from that country, was still the rightful sovereign of the Philippine Islanders, so that she could sell them; and he bought them and their country for the sum of $20,000,000. It was in this singular way that, as President McKinley wishes to have us believe, "the providence of God intrusted to our hands the Philippines—a trust we have not sought."

Thus, in the first place, he contrived to turn the much-vaunted unselfish war of liberation into a vulgar land-grabbing game, and to strip the American people of the unique glory of a most generous act, grand in its unselfishness. Does he think such a breach of faith can be pleasing to the sight of an all-righteous Providence? Or does he imagine he can deceive an omniscient God by the wily plea that the pledge of an unselfish generosity applied only to the Western Hemisphere, and that the liberating of one people gave us a right to subjugate another?

AN ACT OF PERFIDY.

But more than this. Recognizing the fact that Dewey invited Aguinaldo to the Philippines to help him in his operations by organizing the insurrection against the Spaniards; that the Filipinos did do effectual service as our allies, being permitted to believe that they were fighting for their own independence; that we left them undisturbed in that belief until we had sufficient troops on the spot to need their aid no longer, and until Manila was taken, and that then, behind their backs, we bought them from defeated Spain to subjugate them as our own subjects, every fair-minded man will agree that this was an act of downright perfidy. Does President McKinley think that so treacherous a use of power by the strong to despoil the feeble of their rights can be looked upon with favor by an all-just God?

The excuses given by the President and by his spokesmen for this faithless deed are worthy of the deed itself. They show how far the moral sense of men may be debased by the defense of a bad cause. I have read with care the famous "preliminary report" made by the Philippine Commission "at the request of the President" just before the last November elections, and I must confess that some passages of it have filled me with painful astonishment. That report, for instance, in order to justify what has been done, asserts "that no alliance of any kind was entered into with Aguinaldo, nor was any promise of independence made to him then or at any other time." I was sorry to see such a statement signed by gentlemen of high standing. Was it worthy of such men to forget that while there was no alliance in form, signed, sealed, and delivered, there was cooperation amounting to an alliance in fact, and that this carried with it moral obligations of a class which no man of honor will disregard.

Let us hear the "preliminary report" itself. After having recited how Aguinaldo was brought to the scene of operations on a United States ship at the desire of Dewey, "for the purpose of strengthening the United States forces and weakening those of the enemy," the report goes on: "Shortly afterwards the Filipinos began to attack the Spanish. Their numbers were rapidly augmented by the militia who had been given arms by Spain, all of whom revolted and joined the insurgents. Great Filipino successes followed, many Spaniards were taken prisoners, and while the Spanish troops now quietly remained at Manila, the Filipino forces made themselves masters of the entire island, except that city." Well, according to this very statement of the commission, did not the Filipinos do for us the business of allies, and very effectively, too? I venture to say that at the time they were regarded as our allies by everybody except those who had already then in their minds the scheme of turning the war of liberation into a land-grabbing game.

But they were also virtually recognized as our allies by our very commanders in a manner which the commissioners in their preliminary report did not see fit to mention. I do not refer here merely to the often-quoted correspondence between General Anderson and Aguinaldo, in which our general greeted the Filipinos with assurances of friendship and requests for cooperation and assistance in terms usually addressed by one ally to another. Nor do I refer only to the fact that armed vessels of the Filipinos, flying the flag of the Filipino republic, were plying to and fro and going out on expeditions against various Spanish posts, under the very eyes of our Admiral.

But here is still something more. On July 13, 1898, Admiral Dewey sent the following dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy: "Aguinaldo informed me his troops had taken all of Subig Bay except Isla Grande, which they were prevented from taking by the German man-of-war Irene. On July 7 sent the Raleigh and the Concord there; they took the island and about 1,300 men with arms and ammunition; no resistance." Now, what became of those 1,300 Spanish prisoners? They were turned over to the Filipinos. Only recently those prisoners taken in Subig Bay have been liberated from their captivity in Filipino hands, and it was reported that some of them intended to make a claim against the United States for damages on the plea that before capitulating they had been promised by our Navy officers that they would be permitted to surrender to the American and not to the Filipino forces, and that they had been turned over to the Filipinos in violation of that promise. No denial has been made of this story except as to the giving of that pledge.

Now, what did it mean, this turning over by American forces to the Filipinos of Spanish prisoners of war captured in a joint enterprise? What else could it mean than that, whether there was any formal compact of alliance duly signed or not, Aguinaldo with his army was practically recognized as a belligerent ally of good standing? But for this would not the prisoners taken from the common enemy have necessarily been kept under the control of the American forces? Had the Filipinos been considered a mere half-barbarian band accidentally helping us and of no substantial right in the premises, how could such a turning over of prisoners to them have been justified?

But let us hear Admiral Dewey himself. In a recent letter answering an inquiry from Senator LODGE as to what pledges were given to Aguinaldo, the Admiral says: "I never treated him as an ally, except to make use of him and the natives to assist me in my operations against the Spaniards." Precisely so. We "used" them practically as allies against the common enemy, profiting from their cooperation as allies. And then, having so used them, we refused them the recognition morally due to an ally. Does not the Admiral "give away" the whole case?

Again, when our peace commissioners sat at Paris the testimony of Rear-Admiral Bradford was taken, and Senator FRYE asked him: "Suppose the United States, in the progress of that war, found the leader of the present Philippine rebellion an exile from his country in Hongkong, and sent for him and brought him to the islands in an American ship, and then furnished him 4,000 or 5,000 stands of arms and allowed him to purchase as many more stands of arms in Hongkong, and accepted his aid in conquering Luzon, what kind of a nation in the eyes of the world would we appear to be to surrender Aguinaldo and his insurgents to Spain, to be dealt with as they please?" To which Admiral Bradford answered: "We become responsible for all he has done; he is our ally, and we are bound to protect him." Senator FRYE forgot to ask the further question, what kind of a nation we would be in the eyes of the world if we bought our allies like a drove of sheep from Spain, the defeated common enemy, to treat them not as they, but as we, please.

After all this, what fair-minded man will deny to all intents and purposes the Filipinos were our allies; that they were fairly entitled at our hands to every consideration due from one ally to another, and that when our Administration refused them audience at the peace negotiations which were to decide their fate, and then behind their backs bought them like a herd of cattle from the defeated common enemy, it did a thing so mean in its disloyalty that it is no wonder its sponsors shrink from looking it in the face, but nervously strive to hide its hideousness from their own eyes by covering it up with all sorts of pretexts and sophistries?

But, truly, what a pitiable sight is that presented by the respectable signers of the "preliminary report," who argue that because no formal compact of alliance was made—that is, because the Filipinos with their generous confidence in our good faith trusted American honor so imprudently that they neglected to put every stipulation in black and white before going with us into a common fight against the common enemy—they have lost all moral right to be respected and treated by us as allies! Shame, where is thy blush?

PROMISE OF INDEPENDENCE.

The contention of the commissioners that "no promise of independence was ever made" to the Filipinos is of the same moral grade. Again, there is, I admit, no instrument in writing signed by an American in authority. Neither do I care whether our consuls or Admiral Dewey made a formal promise of independence to the Filipinos. That is not the question. The question is whether we gave the Filipinos any reason for believing that after defeating the common enemy this Republic would recognize their independence, and whether they were permitted so to believe while they were fighting against the common enemy.

On July 22, 1898, General Anderson reported to the Secretary of War: "Aguinaldo declares dictatorship and martial law all over the islands. The people expect independence." What reason had they to expect that this Republic would recognize their independence? The best in the world—a reason, too, most honorable to them as well as to the American people. They knew that, when beginning the war against Spain, we had loudly disclaimed all idea of conquest and had declared the Cubans of right entitled to their independence. They knew that in all things which in our eyes gave the Cubans their right and title to independence, the people of the Philippines held the same if not a superior title. They would have considered it an insult to the great and magnanimous American Republic to entertain on their part even the slightest suspicion that our professions of unselfish purpose were a mere humbug, and that while liberating one people we were capable of scheming the subjugation of another because we coveted their land. In one word, as over so many of their proclamations showed, they expected their independence because they believed the American people to be an honest people and the American Government to be an honest government. And in this belief they acted as our allies against the common enemy.

We permitted them to entertain that belief while so acting. It is true, in Washington the scheme was meanwhile hatched to rob them of their fairly-earned independence. Was the Administration at least honest enough then to inform them that their expectation of independence might be disappointed? It was not. Indeed, the Administration did secretly instruct our consuls and commanders not to make any promises to the Filipinos that might embarrass the execution of the treacherous scheme. But the Filipinos themselves were left in their happy confidence so long as their service as our allies was of any value to us. I say, therefore, although there was no written engagement promising them their independence, our solemn proclamation at the beginning of the war that this would be a war of liberation and not of conquest, and our permitting them to expect their independence accordingly, while we accepted their aid as our allies, constituted a promise so complete and morally so binding that it is difficult to understand how any honest man can so forget himself as to question it.

THE SHAM SOVEREIGNTY.

And thus when the Spaniards were thoroughly defeated everywhere, and Manila was taken, and our Filipino allies were of no further practical use to us, the Administration instructed our peace commissioners in Paris to obtain from Spain the cession of her sovereignty over the Philippines, not to the people of those islands, but to the United States. Now I shall show, I trust, to the satisfaction of every candid mind, that this proceeding involved on our part the grossest betrayal of our own professed principles, and one of the most glaring self-stultifications ever committed by any government. When we made war upon Spain for the liberation of Cuba, we could not, and did not, deny that Spain, historically, possessed the sovereignty of Cuba.

But we maintained that Spain by her tyrannical and oppressive misgovernment had morally forfeited that sovereignty; that she had ceased to possess it as a matter of right; and that, although the Spanish forces were still in actual occupation of the principal cities and harbors, and of a very large portion of the interior of the island, the people of Cuba, having risen up against Spanish misrule, had won the right of sovereignty for themselves. We therefore solemnly declared in that famous resolution of Congress not merely that Spain must be driven out of Cuba but that the people of Cuba "of right ought to be and are free and independent;" that is, that the sovereignty of Spain over Cuba was no longer valid, but of right ought to be possessed, and actually was possessed, by the Cuban people themselves.

How does this bear upon the case of the Philippines? It is a fact, not questioned by anybody, that Spanish sovereignty was historically no better founded in the Philippines than in Cuba; that Spanish misrule was fully as grievous in the Philippines as in Cuba; that the people of the Philippines had risen against the misrule as the Cubans had; that the case of the Philippines was therefore identical with that of Cuba, with this difference, that the Filipinos had achieved much greater military successes and organized a far better and stronger native government than the Cubans ever had; so that in the Philippines the Spaniards had not only, as they had in Cuba, forfeited the moral title to sovereignty, but had actually lost also the exercise and possession of it. The right of the Filipinos to sovereignty over their country was therefore, according to our professed principles, even stronger than that of the Cubans.

The Spanish title to sovereignty over the Philippines was thus utterly discredited by ourselves. By word and act we had, in the parallel case of Cuba, maintained that the Spanish title had rightfully passed to the people of the country. And yet that Spanish title so utterly discredited by ourselves we then recognized again as valid in order to enable Spain to sell our Filipino allies to us. And we bought that title, although we knew full well that Spain had actually lost it all, and could not deliver anything of it, but we bought the sham, in order to steal the substance from the Philippine islanders, to whom, by our own doctrine, it rightfully belonged. This is the farcical and contemptible predicament in which the action of the Administration has placed the great American Republic.

JUGGLING SUBTERFUGES.

I am well aware that astute lawyers may find some quirk or quibble to persuade people who wish to be so persuaded that under the law of nations Spain had still a technical title to a sovereignty which she had morally forfeited and practically lost and could not deliver, and that this she could sell and we could buy. But will such a technicality satisfy our consciences and protect our honor? Most of us have learned by experience to distinguish between the class of men who, in their dealings with their neighbors, are governed by an innate moral sense of right and who will never condescend to take an unfair advantage even when the law permits them to do so with impunity, and another class consisting of persons claiming to be respectable, but to whom the question of moral right is of no concern, and who do not scruple at any moral wrong for their own benefit, taking care only not to run foul of the penal code.

The first class we call "gentlemen," and we respect and trust them. The second class we do not, at least we ought not to, call gentlemen, for we feel like carefully guarding our pockets when we meet them. Let there be no illusion about this. He who uses the technicalities of the law to take a wrongful advantage of his neighbor may keep clear of the penitentiary, but he is not an honest man.

And now I soberly ask you, Does not the purchase of that Spanish sovereignty put the American people plainly into that category? How pitiably the Administration itself has been at sea as to the origin of our title to sovereignty! On December 21, 1898, in his famous "benevolent assimilation" order, which in fact was his declaration of war against the Filipinos, President McKinley said: "The destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila by the United States naval squadron, followed by the reduction of the city and the surrender of the Spanish forces, practically effected the conquest of the Philippine Islands and the suspension of Spanish sovereignty therein. With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain on the 10th instant, and as the result of the victories of American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States. In fulfillment of the right of sovereignty thus acquired," he ordered immediate military occupation.

That this was not a truthful statement of the case—that is, that we had then acquired no rights by the treaty, which at that time, not yet having been ratified, was of no force, and that we had not acquired the Philippines by conquest, for which we are still fighting—everybody will admit. Why, even the President himself admitted it, for several months later he said in a speech at Pittsburg: "Until the treaty of peace was ratified (which it was only seven weeks after the issue of the order before quoted), we had no authority beyond Manila city, bay, and harbor. Spain was in full possession of the remainder of the archipelago." This was correct as to the extent of our authority, but it was again strikingly erroneous as to the status of Spain; for, as everybody knows, Spain was not only not "in full possession of the remainder of the archipelago," but she was not in possession of any part of it. The so-called remainder of the archipelago was possessed, if by anybody, by the people thereof—a notorious fact of which the President of this Republic was strangely unmindful.

At last Mr. Day, late Secretary of State, and chairman of the commission that made the peace treaty, comes to the rescue, and declares in a public letter that we have acquired the Philippines not by conquest—for, says he, "the United States has never undertaken, so far as I know, to wrest from a foreign country lands or possessions simply by right of conquest"—but by purchase, paying $20,000,000 for them. But he does not say in his letter what everybody knows, that we bought something from Spain which Spain no longer owned and did not and could not deliver, as we are painfully aware, inasmuch as we have ever since been engaged in killing our late Filipino allies, who defend the rightful title belonging to the people. And finally comes the President, who coolly observes in his message that the Philippine Islands "belong to us by every title of law and equity."

"Law and equity," forsooth! Consider it from the ethical standpoint, which to honest men is the only true one. What is our position in truth? That of a powerful and rich man who, artfully abusing the confidence of poor and feeble people, robs them of their dues by legal jugglery and force, and then blandly tells his victims that Providence has so ordered it for their good, putting upon him a trust which he has not sought.

THE SLAUGHTER AND DEVASTATION.

And to enforce such a title of sovereignty resting not upon anything akin to moral right, but at best upon a shrewd legal technicality which in private life every gentleman would despise, we have proceeded to kill thousands upon thousands of men and devastated the homes of thousands upon thousands of innocent people who had never done us any harm and whose only offense consisted in having confidently expected that the generous and liberty-loving Americans would be true to their professed principles, and who, being grievously disappointed in this, still wished to be free and independent. What defense in the world can there be of such an outrage? Aside from shifting the responsibility on Providence, the excuse is brought forth that our soldiers were attacked and had to "defend" the American flag.

Defend the American flag? Let us see. There are certain facts admitted by all. The first shot was not fired by a Filipino, but by an American soldier, killing a Filipino who had not attacked him, but had simply crossed the American line. Some shots were fired in return, and then the firing spread and developed into an extended engagement which evidently was not planned by the Filipinos. Aguinaldo promptly disavowed the collision, and made a fair proposition to stop it. It would thus have been stopped had our commander agreed; but he insisted upon continuing the fight. General Otis says in his report:

"The engagement was one strictly defensive on the part of the insurgents and of vigorous attack by our forces." The only excuse given for his action is that the Filipinos would have wanted to fight if they had been ready, and that they had become "abusive," and "insulting," and "defiant"—terms often freely applied by some Anglo-Saxons to people of other, especially darker, races who presume to think that they have some rights. Thus the plain fact is that our men actually began the slaughter and that our commander refused to stop it when he might have done so with honor.

But more important is the other fact, also set forth in General Otis's report, that the President had directly provoked a collision with the Filipinos by his notorious order of December 21, 1898—a document so inflammatory in its character that General Otis found it necessary to suppress it and to substitute a proclamation of his own—a scheme which failed, as the President's order became public through a subordinate commander. General Otis knew that the President's order would be taken by the Filipinos as a declaration of war, which in fact it was. No criticism of the President's action can place the responsibility for the Filipino war more conclusively upon the President than this part of General Otis's report. And when, after all this, we hear the President say, as last summer he did say in his speech at Pittsburg, "The first blow was struck by the insurgents;" and at Fargo, "Then it was that the insurgent leader made an attack upon our men, and then our boys let loose;" and in his message, "An attack, evidently prepared in advance, was made all along the American lines"—when we hear him say to the people such things, in the face of such facts, we fairly hold our breath and bow our heads.

FALSE EXCUSES.

After all this we must not be surprised that the imperialists are so anxious to make the American people believe that there would have been no fight in the Philippines had there been no speeches made in the United States against the policy of conquest and subjugation, and that the authors of such speeches are therefore traitors giving aid and comfort to the enemy. Has it been forgotten that the Filipinos have more than once risen against Spanish tyranny long before we took any interest in those islands and their people? Does not this show them capable of rising without any such outside encouragement?

But we are told that to rise against the Americans is quite a different thing; that a majority of the Filipinos really are fond of us and hail American sovereignty as the satisfaction of a long-felt want; and that there are only a few mischievous leaders whose "sinister ambition," as the President calls their desire for freedom and independence, has stirred up disorder, and who would soon have desisted had not the speeches of American anti-imperialists encouraged them.

I hardly could trust my eyes when I read in the President's annual message this amazing statement: "I had every reason to believe, and I still believe, that this transfer of sovereignty was in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino people." And this in the face of the fact that we need there for the enforcement of that sovereignty the largest army this Republic has ever had in active field service except during our civil war—an army twice or three times as large as any we had in the Revolutionary war, or in the war of 1812, or in the Mexican war, or in Cuba in the late war—an army ten times as large as that which is thought necessary to keep order in Cuba now.

Why do we need so tremendous a force? To beat the Filipino army, which, as our Secretary of War told us in a speech at Chicago, represented almost too infinitesimally small a portion of the Filipino people to be mathematically expressed by way of percentage? Or did we need it, as others tell us, to protect the "good Americans" among the Filipino people against the so-called "rebels?" But if, as the President says, "this transfer of sovereignty was in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino people," why do we not put arms into the hands of the great mass to enable it to tackle that small rebellious minority and hand it over to the police? Why not? The reason is simple: Because, as everybody knows, there is too much reason to fear that this great mass of "good Americans" would, upon occasion, turn out to be good Filipinos and eventually use those arms against us.

A few months ago I said in a public address: "We have not a true friend left among the islanders, unless it be some speculators and the Sultan of Sulu; we have managed to turn virtually the whole population into deadly enemies." This statement was hotly impugned by Professor Worcester in a published paper in which he actually named three prominent Filipinos who, he says, are not speculators, but our fast friends, and he adds that "we have many another honest and able American friend among the leading men of the archipelago." With the same assurance, the same Professor Worcester had told us of the splendid success of the local government established under American auspices on the island of Negros, and about the enthusiasm with which the native people had received it. But shortly afterwards came the news of the "treason" of some of the principal native officers, whose "benevolent assimilation" and devotion to the American liberators have been praised so highly. And we have had similar experiences in other places. I doubt whether even Professor Worcester's three elect are quite safe.

Certainly we may here and there find a Filipino who for some reason attaches his fortune to ours. Napoleon found some such men in Spain in 1809. The Emperor Maximilian found even a larger number in Mexico. But did that make the great mass of the Spanish people Napoleon's friends or the Mexican people the friends of the French and the Austrian invaders? By the steady pressure of force we can compel obedience, but not friendship and fidelity. Nor will mere "good government" prove a remedy, for the best government will always be unpopular if it is foreign government, especially when the imposition of foreign sovereignty has been accomplished by treacherous breaches of faith and bloody terrorism. Sincere acceptance of rule by a foreign race—a race so utterly foreign as ours is to theirs, so foreign in origin, customs, habits, traditions, ways of thinking, and a race withal so imperious, so grasping, and so disdainful of all other races it considers inferior—sincere acceptance of such a rule by the great mass of a people is impossible. It is against human nature.

British rule in India has in part been recognized as beneficial. But in spite of some theatrical demonstrations of loyalty we hear of, Great Britain would not to-day with any confidence leave the maintenance of the Indian Empire to the fidelity of the native population. The British heart secretly trembles at the thought of what would come if a torch were thrown into that mass of Indian combustibles. As to the Philippine Islands, our Government, whatever otherwise its quality, will always be essentially government by garrison. Those who carried on their struggle for freedom will always remain the heroes of the people; and whatever banquet we as foreign rulers may spread to them, the shade of their betrayed and murdered independence will, like Banquo's ghost, always claim the first seat at the board. If President McKinley really believes that "the transfer of sovereignty was in accordance with the wishes and aspirations of the great mass of the Filipino people," it shows only how hopelessly blind he is to the true nature of the problem.

WHERE THE RESPONSIBILITY RESTS.

No, the Filipino people needed no impulse from the outside to encourage their resistance to subjugation by foreign arms. If they had needed such encouragement, they would have first had it from President McKinley himself when he told the world—it was before the snake of imperialistic ambition had bitten his heart—that "annexation by force could not be thought of, because, according to the American code of morals, it would be criminal aggression." Nothing truer and nothing severer has been said by anybody in condemnation of his present policy. That while the fight was going on the Filipinos were pleased to hear of men in this country opposing their subjugation was natural enough—just as natural as was the comfort the revolutionary American colonists took in the utterances of Chatham and Burke. But would the American colonists have ceased to struggle if Burke and Chatham had been silent?

And besides, what does it mean that no American citizen should permit himself to denounce a public wrong or to advocate the principles upon which this Republic is founded, lest people who feel themselves betrayed and oppressed find comfort in his words? If the Administration has led us into policies which can not bear discussion in the light of the Declaration of Independence, of the Constitution of the United States, and of the teachings of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, must we bury the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution and Washington's and Lincoln's teachings out of sight, so that they may not interfere with the ambitions and schemes of our rulers? Is it not, rather, high time to bury such policies, so that the great American Republic may dare to be itself again?

No; the shrewd trick of representing those who labored to prevent and to stop the Filipino war as responsible for that war will not succeed with an intelligent people. Is there a sane man in the world who believes that there would have been any Filipino war had the President remained true to the solemn pledge that the war against Spain would be a war of liberation and not of conquest and mindful of his own affirmation that annexation by force could not be thought of because it would be criminal aggression? Would there have been a Filipino war if the President had inspired the Filipino people with the hope that their rights would be respected as we had promised to respect those of the Cubans instead of treating our allies as if they were mere interlopers in their own country, who could be bought and sold like dumb animals, and then flinging in their faces that outrageous "benevolent assimilation" order, so insulting and inflammatory a provocation that General Otis, foreseeing with alarm the certain consequences of its issue, anxiously but ineffectually sought to conceal it?

No, there can be no question as to the responsibility for this disgraceful conflict and all the blood spilled in it. Those who had the power to prevent or stop it by being simply faithful to the principles the American people have hitherto so proudly professed—they will be held forever answerable for this wanton and wicked war by impartial history, and no sanctimonious cant, no cunning sophistry, can disguise their guilt or save them from that awful judgment.

THE CONFIDENCE GAME.

I am aware that an arraignment like this puts our imperialists very much out of temper, and they impatiently exclaim, "Why say such things while you know that the case is finally settled and your criminations serve only to smirch the good name of the country?" I have this to answer:

First. What I have spoken is the truth. I challenge any defender of the Administration policy to disprove the correctness of a single one of my statements of fact, or of the conclusions drawn.

Secondly. Those have smirched the good name of the country who have done and are doing these nefarious things, not those who denounce them. Nay, the repute of the country would be still more smirched if we permitted the world to believe that such things could be done in the Republic of Washington and Lincoln with the general approval of the people, even without calling forth a voice of protest.

Thirdly. The case is not finally settled, and it will not be finally settled until it be settled aright. A most unscrupulous and crafty "confidence game" has been worked upon the American people. When after Dewey's victory more troops were sent to the Philippines than the war against the Spaniards seemed to require, we were told that criticism was unpatriotic, because the President was best informed and must be trusted.

When the peace negotiations came and it was rumored that the Administration would demand the cession of the Philippines to the United States, we were admonished to hush all unfavorable discussion because it would encourage the Spaniard to obstreperousness in the peace negotiations.

When the peace treaty with that cession in it was before the Senate, we were warned that no patriot would oppose the ratification of a treaty of peace, and as to the final disposition of the Philippines, that would rest with Congress. And all the while the President repeated over and over that Congress would have to speak the decisive word. But now, when Congress is to take up the great question, we are told that the whole case is settled and that any attempt to shake or even to criticise that settlement will be useless and unpatriotic.

Oh, no, gentlemen; this will not do. This artful dodge has been played long enough, and too long. The President's attempt, while constantly speaking of Congress as the ultimate arbiter, to anticipate the action of Congress, and thus to force its hand by accomplished facts, has advanced to a dangerous stage, but it has, after all, not quite succeeded; and if that spirit of liberty which gave birth to this Republic still lives, it will never succeed. Unless I am much mistaken, the people are still sovereign in this country, and they will not permit any President to purloin that sovereignty from them by a sleight of hand.

The people will still have to pronounce the final verdict, and I trust they will do so after a conscientious consideration, not of the mere question of profit, but, what is infinitely more important, of the moral merits of the case. It is, therefore, not only the right but the duty of every good citizen to form an honest opinion on this momentous subject and to speak out without fear or favor.

THE GREAT WRONG.

The people will find, if they have not found it already, that a great wrong has been done in their name, which, unless it be undone, so far as it can be, will cover them with eternal disgrace.

I challenge any one of the President's defenders to point out in the whole history of the world a single act of perfidy committed by a republican government more infamous than that which has been committed by this Administration against our confiding Filipino allies. Show me a single one! You will search for it in vain in all the annals of mankind.

This is strong language, you may say. So it seems. But it is time to call things by their right names, and I am weighing my words. Have the courage to look the facts once more in the face.

We invite the cooperation of the insurgent Filipinos against the common enemy, the Spaniards. As our allies the Filipinos do valiant and effective service. While we accept and profit from their aid as our allies, we knowingly permit them to believe that they are fighting for their own independence and that we are fighting for their independence, too, having solemnly proclaimed to the world that our war against Spain, the common enemy, was to be a war of liberation and not of conquest.

When we have no further use for our Filipino allies we begin peace negotiations with the common enemy from which our Filipino allies are sternly excluded, and behind their backs we purchase from the common enemy his title of sovereignty over them—a title utterly discredited by ourselves—so that from subjects of Spanish foreign rule they may become subjects of American foreign rule. And when then our late allies insist upon being free and refuse to be bought from the defeated enemy like a herd of cattle we slaughter them by thousands.

Look at this and consider it soberly. What have you to say? Is "infamy" too strong a word for it? I wish I could find a more scorching one to brand it as it deserves. Why, if anybody did anything like this in private life, it would be a queer kind of gentlemen that would admit him to their company. And this is what has been done in the name of the great American Republic—the Republic born of the Declaration of Independence, the Republic of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. Again, I say, shame, where is thy blush?

And what do we hear in justification of this? Some clergymen tell us that this is one of the ways of spreading abroad Christianity, and virtue, and superior civilization. Would not these holy men do well to consider what effect the teachings involved in the justification of so criminal an outrage may have upon the Christianity, virtue, and superior civilization of their flocks at home?

GREED AND DESPOTISM.

Then we are told that those islands are rich and will be a foothold for our Chinese trade, and that therefore we must have them. Indeed, in the soundful sophomoration of the young Senator from Indiana recently delivered in the Senate a picture of the wealth of the Philippine Islands was enrolled gorgeous enough to make the mouth of the most virtuous pirate water.

He looked down with the loftiest pity upon everyone who would be so blind as not to lay hold of that wealth if he had a chance; and to make sure that our chance should be fully used, he proposed a system of government for the Philippines so absolutely despotic—a despotism so entirely undiluted with any American idea of human rights—that it would more than satisfy the sternest Russian autocrat.

No more brutal appeal to sordid greed, no appeal so utterly hostile to the vital principles of our free institutions, expressed in the most high-sounding verbiage of American patriotism, has ever been addressed to our people. If this be the spirit animating the youth of America, then the great American Republic will soon cease to be an encouragement to the progress of political liberty and become a warning example to all the world.

And this is the spirit of imperialism. I am well aware that some imperialists have protested against the cynicism with which others have appealed to sordid motives, and that the commission has framed a plan to give the Philippine Islanders a share in their government under American sovereignty. But who will deny that if the motive of pecuniary profit were taken out of the imperialist movement that movement would lose its vital impulse and speedily collapse?

When Colonel Denby, the most influential of the Philippine commissioners, some time ago publicly declared that we wanted the Philippines for our own profit, and not for their good, and that if we found their possession unprofitable we would drop them and let the Filipinos cut each other's throats if they liked—when he said that, was he not only a little more brutally candid than most of his friends? And can any sane man doubt that whatever plans of imperial government may be devised, the rule of our race over another which we consider inferior will always be essentially arbitrary and consistently beneficent only when selfish interest permits it?

Listen to the wail of misery and despair coming from the Puerto Ricans who were promised liberty and happiness under the American flag! Do not now powerful interests demand a policy which means to them poverty and oppression?

THE DEMORALIZATION OF OUR REPUBLIC.

And can you be blind to the effects which the tendencies of imperialism are already exercising among ourselves upon the popular mind? Do you not hear the scoffing levity with which the Declaration of Independence and the high ideals of liberty and human rights which so long have been sacred to our people are made sport of; how the teachings of Washington and Lincoln are derided as antiquated nursery rhymes, and how the Constitution, when it stands in the way of grasping schemes, is lightly brushed aside with the flippant word that constitutions are made for men and not men for constitutions?

It can not be repeated too often that there are things which may be done by monarchical or aristocratic governments without making them less strong as monarchies or aristocracies, but which can not be done by a democracy based upon universal suffrage without fatally demoralizing it as a democracy, and that one of those things is the arbitrary ruling of foreign populations as subjects. By the way, England is sometimes quoted as an example and called a democracy. This is a mistake. England is not a democracy, but a monarchy with democratic tendencies but very powerful and tenacious aristocratic traditions.

What a democracy, based upon universal suffrage, like ours needs most to insure its stability is an element of conservative poise in itself. This can be furnished only by popular faith in the principles underlying the democratic institutions, by popular reverence for high ideals and traditions, by popular respect for constitutional forms and restraints. Take away these conservative and ennobling influences, and the only motive forces left in such a democracy will be greed and passion. I can hardly imagine any kind of a government more repellent than a democracy that has ceased to believe in anything and in which all ambitions are directed toward a selfish use of power.

And in this direction the policy of imperialism is evidently driving us. Have you considered what this means? What will it lead to if our people accept the teaching that all our traditional creeds about liberty and the rights of men are mere sentimental rubbish; that the most solemn professions and pledges may be repudiated if they stand in the way of our ambition; that even such base treachery as has been committed against our late Filipino allies will be justifiable if it profits us; that only old fogies in their dotage talk about legal principles and constitutional restrictions when they obstruct the gratification of our desires, and that might need not be too scrupulous about right?

Many of our rich men have become imperialists, believing that the possession of the Philippines, in whatever way acquired, will offer favorable chances of gain to speculative capitalists. Have they thought of it that the doctrine of might not needing to be scrupulous about right may be applied not only to the unscrupulous might of arms, and not only to the unscrupulous might of wealth, but also, in a democracy, to the might of numbers becoming unscrupulous? And this is the tendency of imperialism in this democratic Republic.

I am by no means blind to the commercial side of the question. I desire the greatest possible commercial expansion, honorably accomplished. And more than once have I argued that all the commercial advantages and naval facilities we can reasonably desire in the Philippines we might easily have had from the Philippine Islanders if we had faithfully respected their title to independence, and that those advantages would be much more secure with the Filipinos free and friendly than with the Filipinos subjugated and hostile. This argument has never been answered. It never will be. How criminally wanton is it to seek those commercial advantages needlessly at the price of crying injustice to others and fatal demoralization among ourselves—a price we should never pay for anything!

But now I am asked, admitting all this to be true: What can we do after having gone so far? The case is simple. Indeed, we can not wake up the dead whose innocent blood has been spilled. We can not altogether expunge the disgraceful page of history that has been written.

But the American people can rise up and declare that the great wrong attempted by misguided men in power in the name of the Republic shall not be consummated; that as we solemnly promised at the beginning of our Spanish war, that war shall stand in history as a war of liberation, and not of conquest; that our Government shall recognize the Philippine Islands as free and independent, and that if the present Congress and Executive will not do so, the people will elect a Congress and an Executive who will.

But what will become of the Philippine Islanders if unfit for independent government? Of course every man who either himself wishes to keep the Philippines or who serves the Administration strenuously insists that the Islanders are utterly unable to govern themselves. It is always so. He who seeks to make another man his subject always maintains that the other is incapable of being a freeman.

Thus, as a last resort, the agitators for imperialism are now all busily engaged in abusing the Filipinos and their leader. But here we have Admiral Dewey's emphatic and repeated official statement: "In my opinion, these people are far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba, and I am familiar with both races."

Has this weighty declaration been invalidated by the subservient talk of others who thought likewise until the desire of the Administration that the Philippine people should not be held capable of independent government became public? Let our Government take the position that the Philippines are to be independent, and Admiral Dewey's original opinion will be promptly and generally accepted as the correct one.

And what of the danger that if we recognize the independence of the Philippines some other power will at once rush in to clutch them? Does any sane man believe that there will be such a danger if this great Republic forbids it? And why should not American diplomacy succeed in bringing the powers most nearly concerned to an agreement to declare the Philippines neutral territory, as Belgium and Switzerland are in Europe? I have often asked this question, and it has never been answered.

The President says in his message: "We fling them, a golden apple of discord, among the rival powers, no one of which could permit another to seize them unquestioned." Precisely. No one of them permitting another to seize them, it will be easily feasible to make them all agree to their neutrality, so that none of them shall have them.

These are phantom dangers. Neither have we a right to say that the Philippine people must be held to be incapable of independent government if they can not form an ideal republic, in which liberty and peace and order and honesty will reign in unclouded sunshine.

THE GREAT ALTERNATIVE.

I entreat you soberly to contemplate the alternative now before us. If we permit the great wrong attempted by the Administration to be consummated, our moral credit with the world will be gone forever. Having started in our Spanish war with the solemn proclamation that this would be a war of liberation and not of conquest, and then having turned that war into one of land grabbing and self-confessed "criminal aggression," nobody will ever again believe in any profession of virtue or generosity we may put forth.

It will be hooted down the world over as sheer hypocrisy disguising greedy schemes. We shall be guilty of the meanest as well as, in its consequences, the most dangerous iniquity a nation can commit—the betrayal of an ally. There is nothing so perfidious that thenceforth we shall not be thought capable of, and other nations will prudently take care not to make common cause with us for anything upon a mere assurance of good faith on our part. This is the "glory" we shall have won.

Our sister republics in this hemisphere have looked upon the United States as their natural protector, and they were our natural friends. Since we have dishonored our professions of disinterested motive, they will always suspect us of a design to stretch out our rapacious hands also against them. Already they speak of this Republic no longer as their strong and trusty friend, but as the "peligro del Norte," the "danger in the North." And they will do this so long as we hold any of our conquests.

In constant fear of our greed and perfidy they will, in case of critical complications, be inclined to coalesce even with Old-World powers against us, and we shall have secret or open enemies instead of trustful friends at our very doors. We shall have the Philippines, with a population bitterly hating us, and, in case of trouble with some foreign power, eager to kindle a fire in our rear.

We shall, instead of enjoying the inestimable blessing of exemption from the burdens of militarism, be obliged to keep up large and costly armaments to hold down our discontented subjects and to provide for our own security. And more. We shall have a bad conscience. We shall have betrayed the fundamental principles of our democracy, robbed the American people of their high ideals and beliefs, and thus destroyed the conservative element without which a democracy based on universal suffrage can not long endure.

And all this to gain some commercial advantage and naval facilities which we might have had just as fully, and much more securely, had we kept good faith with ourselves, with our allies, and with the world.

Now, contemplate the other side of the alternative. If the American people, even after the monstrous aberrations of their Government, repudiate the policy of criminal aggression and renounce their conquests; if they declare that their profession of unselfish motive and generous purpose in the Spanish war was sincere and must be maintained at any cost—what then?

They will forever put to shame the detractors of the American democracy. They will show that, although the powers of their Government may sometimes be put to base uses by men of misguided ambition, the American people are honest and can be counted upon to resist even the strongest of temptations—the intoxication of victory—and to submit even to the mortifying ordeal of a confession of wrong done in their name, in order that right, justice, and liberty may prevail.

Such an attitude will secure to the American people the confidence of mankind as it has never been enjoyed by any nation in the world's history, and with it the fruits of that confidence. Our democratic institutions will issue from the trial with a luster they never had before. By so splendid a proof of good faith this Republic will achieve a position of unexampled moral grandeur and influence. It will naturally become the trusted umpire between contending states—a peaceable arbiter of the world's quarrels. It will not only be a great world power by its strength, but the greatest of all existing world powers by its moral prestige.

It may be asked whether this is not an ideal picture. Well, this is the idealism cherished by George Washington, the soberest and most practical of men. This is what he wished and hoped the Republic of the United States, which he loved so much, to become.

But is there any chance of its accomplishment? Are not present circumstances rather discouraging? So they appear. But we old anti-slavery men have in our days seen darker situations than this. I remember the period after the compromise of 1850, which was accepted by both political parties as a finality never to be disturbed. The popular conscience concerning slavery seemed absolutely dead. Those who still spoke against slavery were on all sides, by commercialism and by the politician, denounced as bad citizens, incendiaries, traitors to their country.

A prediction of a speedy anti-slavery triumph would have sounded like the freak of a madman. But the conscience of the American people was not dead. A new condition soon illumined the question as with a flood of new light. The popular conscience suddenly rose up in its might and did not rest until slavery was wiped out.

Let the imperialists not delude themselves. If the present Congress fails to undo the great wrong that has been done, appeal will be taken to the people. And it will be kept there, and, if need be, renewed year in and year out. It will give you no rest, as the slavery question gave us no rest, until finally settled aright. And—take heed!—the longer the right settlement is delayed the greater will be its cost.

You may call the upholders of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution, the followers of Washington's and Lincoln's teachings, "traitors" or "bores"—no matter, they will not give up the belief that the American people are an honest people, and, like the anti-slavery men, they will not cease to appeal to the popular conscience, fully confident that the time will come when on Washington's Birthday we may feel that we are again worthy of him, and that his great monition has not been in vain.

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all; religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant day, a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence."

B.

THE POLICY OF IMPERIALISM.

[Address by Hon. Carl Schurz at the anti-imperialist conference in Chicago, October 17, 1899.]

More than eight months ago I had the honor of addressing the citizens of Chicago on the subject of American imperialism, meaning the policy of annexing to this Republic distant countries and alien populations that will not fit into our democratic system of government. I discussed at that time mainly the baneful effect the pursuit of an imperialistic policy would produce upon our political institutions.

After long silence, during which I have carefully reviewed my own opinions, as well as those of others in the light of the best information I could obtain, I shall now approach the same subject from another point of view.

We all know that the popular mind is much disturbed by the Philippine war, and that, however highly we admire the bravery of our soldiers, nobody professes to be proud of the war itself. There are few Americans who do not frankly admit their regret that this war should ever have happened.

In April, 1898, we went to war with Spain for the avowed purpose of liberating the people of Cuba, who had long been struggling for freedom and independence. Our object in that war was clearly and emphatically proclaimed by a solemn resolution of Congress repudiating all intention of annexation on our part and declaring that the Cuban people "are, and of right ought to be, free and independent." This solemn declaration was made to do justice to the spirit of the American people, who were indeed willing to wage a war of liberation, but would not have consented to a war of conquest. It was also to propitiate the opinion of mankind for our action. President McKinley also declared with equal solemnity that annexation by force could not be thought of, because, according to our code of morals, it would be "criminal aggression."

Can it justly be pretended that these declarations referred only to the island of Cuba? What would the American people, what would the world have said, if Congress had resolved that the Cuban people were indeed rightfully entitled to freedom and independence, but that as to the people of other Spanish colonies we recognized no such right; and if President McKinley had declared that the forcible annexation of Cuba would be criminal, but that the forcible annexation of other Spanish colonies would be a righteous act? A general outburst of protest from our own people, and of derision and contempt from the whole world, would have been the answer. No; there can be no cavil. That war was proclaimed to all mankind to be a war of liberation, and not of conquest, and even now our very imperialists are still boasting that the war was prompted by the most unselfish and generous purposes, and that those insult us who do not believe it.

In the course of that war Commodore Dewey, by a brilliant feat of arms, destroyed the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila. This did not change the heralded character of the war—certainly not in Dewey's own opinion. The Filipinos, constituting the strongest and foremost tribe of the population of the archipelago, had long been fighting for freedom and independence, just as the Cubans had. The great mass of the other islanders sympathized with them. They fought for the same cause as the Cubans, and they fought against the same enemy—the same enemy against whom we were waging our war of humanity and liberation. They had the same title to freedom and independence which we recognized as "of right" in the Cubans—nay, more, for, as Admiral Dewey telegraphed to our Government, "They are far superior in their intelligence, and more capable of self-government than the natives of Cuba." The Admiral adds: "I am familiar with both races, and further intercourse with them has confirmed me in this opinion."

Indeed, the mendacious stories spread by our imperialists which represent those people as barbarians, their doings as mere "savagery," and their chiefs as no better than "cutthroats," have been refuted by such a mass of authoritative testimony, coming in part from men who are themselves imperialists, that their authors should hide their heads in shame; for surely it is not the part of really brave men to calumniate their victims before sacrificing them. We need not praise the Filipinos as in every way the equals of the "embattled farmers" of Lexington and Concord and Aguinaldo as the peer of Washington; but there is an overwhelming abundance of testimony, some of it unwilling, that the Filipinos are fully the equals, and even the superiors, of the Cubans and the Mexicans. As to Aguinaldo, Admiral Dewey is credited with saying that he is controlled by men abler than himself. The same could be said of more than one of our Presidents. Moreover, it would prove that those are greatly mistaken who predict that the Filipino uprising would collapse were Aguinaldo captured or killed. The old slander that Aguinaldo had sold out the revolutionary movement for a bribe of $400,000 has been so thoroughly exploded by the best authority that it requires uncommon audacity to repeat it. (See Senate Document 62, page 421.)

Now let us see what has happened. Two months before the beginning of our Spanish war our consul at Manila reported to the State Department: "Conditions here and in Cuba are practically alike. War exists, battles are almost of daily occurrence. The crown forces (Spanish) have not been able to dislodge a rebel army within 10 miles of Manila. A republic is organized here as in Cuba." When two months later our war of liberation and humanity began, Commodore Dewey was at Hongkong with his ships. He received orders to attack and destroy the Spanish fleet in those waters. It was then that our consul-general at Singapore informed our State Department that he had conferred with General Aguinaldo, then at Singapore, as to the cooperation of the Philippine insurgents, and that he had telegraphed to Commodore Dewey that Aguinaldo was willing to come to Hongkong to arrange with Dewey for "general cooperation, if desired;" whereupon Dewey promptly answered:

"Tell Aguinaldo come soon as possible." The meeting was had. Dewey sailed to Manila to destroy the Spanish fleet, and Aguinaldo was taken to the seat of war on a vessel of the United States. His forces received a supply of arms through Commodore Dewey, and did faithfully and effectively cooperate with our forces against the Spaniards, so effectively, indeed, that soon afterwards by their efforts the Spaniards had lost the whole country, except a few garrisons in which they were practically blockaded.

Now, what were the relations between the Philippine insurgents and this Republic? There is some dispute as to certain agreements, including a promise of Philippine independence, said to have been made between Aguinaldo and our consul-general at Singapore, before Aguinaldo proceeded to cooperate with Dewey. But I lay no stress upon this point. I will let only the record of facts speak. Of these facts the first, of highest importance, is that Aguinaldo was "desired"—that is, invited—by officers of the United States to cooperate with our forces. The second is that the Filipino junta in Hongkong immediately after these conferences appealed to their countrymen to receive the American fleet about to sail for Manila as friends, by a proclamation which had these words:

"Compatriots, divine Providence is about to place independence within our reach. The Americans, not from any mercenary motives, but for the sake of humanity, have considered it opportune to extend their protecting mantle to our beloved country. Where you see the American flag flying assemble in mass. They are our redeemers."

With this faith his followers gave Aguinaldo a rapturous greeting upon his arrival at Cavite, where he proclaimed his government and organized his army under Dewey's eyes.

The arrival of our land forces did not at first change these relations. Brig. Gen. Thomas M. Anderson, commanding, wrote to Aguinaldo, July 4, as follows: "General, I have the honor to inform you that the United States of America, whose land forces I have the honor to command in this vicinity, being at war with the kingdom of Spain, has entire sympathy and most friendly sentiments for the native people of the Philippine Islands. For these reasons I desire to have the most amicable relations with you, and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces," etc. Aguinaldo responded cordially, and an extended correspondence followed, special services being asked for by the party of the first part, being rendered by the second, and duly acknowledged by the first. All this went on pleasantly until the capture of Manila, in which Aguinaldo effectively cooperated by fighting the Spaniards outside, taking many prisoners from them, and hemming them in. The services they rendered by taking thousands of Spanish prisoners, by harassing the Spaniards in the trenches, and by completely blockading Manila on the land side, were amply testified to by our own officers. Aguinaldo was also active on the sea. He had ships, which our commanders permitted to pass in and out of Manila Bay, under the flag of the Philippine republic, on their expeditions against other provinces.

Now, whether there was or not any formal compact of alliance signed and sealed, no candid man who has studied the official documents will deny that in point of fact the Filipinos, having been desired and invited to do so, were, before the capture of Manila, acting, and were practically recognized as our allies, and that as such they did effective service, which we accepted and profited by. This is an indisputable fact, proved by the record.

It is an equally indisputable fact that during that period the Filipino government constantly and publicly, so that nobody could plead ignorance of it or misunderstand it, informed the world that their object was the achievement of national independence, and that they believed the Americans had come in good faith to help them accomplish that end, as in the case of Cuba. It was weeks after various proclamations and other public utterances of Aguinaldo to that effect that the correspondence between him and General Anderson, which I have quoted, took place, and that the useful services of the Filipinos as our practical allies were accepted. It is, further, an indisputable fact that during this period our Government did not inform the Filipinos that their fond expectations as to our recognition of their independence were mistaken.

Our Secretary of State did, indeed, on June 16 write to Mr. Pratt, our consul-general at Singapore, that our Government knew the Philippine insurgents, not indeed as patriots struggling for liberty, and who, like the Cubans, "are and of right ought to be free and independent," but merely as "discontented and rebellious subjects of Spain," who, if we occupied their country in consequence of the war, would have to yield us due "obedience." And other officers of our Government were instructed not to make any promises to the Filipinos as to the future. But the Filipinos themselves were not so informed. They were left to believe that, while fighting in cooperation with the American forces, they were fighting for their own independence. They could not imagine that the Government of the great American Republic, while boasting of having gone to war with Spain under the banner of liberation and humanity in behalf of Cuba, was capable of secretly plotting to turn that war into one for the conquest and subjugation of the Philippines.

Thus the Filipinos went faithfully and bravely on doing for us the service of allies, of brothers in arms, far from dreaming that the same troops with whom they had been asked to cooperate would soon be employed by the great apostle of liberation and humanity to slaughter them for no other reason than that they, the Filipinos, continued to stand up for their own freedom and independence.

But just that was to happen. As soon as Manila was taken and we had no further use for our Filipino allies, they were ordered to fall back and back from the city and its suburbs. Our military commanders treated the Filipinos' country as if it were our own. When Aguinaldo sent one of his aids-de-camp to General Merritt with a request for an interview, General Merritt was "too busy." When our peace negotiations with Spain began, and representatives of the Filipinos asked for audience to solicit consideration of the rights and wishes of their people, the doors were slammed in their faces, in Washington as well as in Paris.

And behind those doors the scheme was hatched to deprive the Philippine Islanders of independence from foreign rule and to make them the subjects of another foreign ruler, and that foreign ruler their late ally, this great Republic which had grandly proclaimed to the world that its war against Spain was not a war of conquest, but a war of liberation and humanity.

Behind those doors which were tightly closed to the people of the Philippines a treaty was made with Spain, by the direction of President McKinley, which provided for the cession of the Philippine Islands by Spain to the United States for a consideration of $20,000,000. It has been said that this sum was not purchase money, but a compensation for improvements made by Spain, or a solatium to sweeten the pill of cession, or what not; but, stripped of all cloudy verbiage, it was really purchase money, the sale being made by Spain under duress. Thus Spain sold, and the United States bought, what was called the sovereignty of Spain over the Philippine Islands and their people.

Now look at the circumstances under which that "cession" was made. Spain had lost the possession of the country, except a few isolated and helpless little garrisons, most of which were effectively blockaded by the Filipinos. The American forces occupied Cavite and the harbor and city of Manila, and nothing more. The bulk of the country was occupied and possessed by the people thereof, over whom Spain had, in point of fact, ceased to exercise any sovereignty, the Spanish power having been driven out or destroyed by the Filipino insurrection, while the United States had not acquired, beyond Cavite and Manila, any authority of whatever name by military occupation, nor by recognition on the part of the people. Aguinaldo's army surrounded Manila on the land side, and his government claimed organized control over fifteen provinces. That government was established at Malolos, not far from Manila; and a very respectable government it was. According to Mr. Barrett, our late minister in Siam, himself an ardent imperialist, who had seen it, it had a well-organized executive, divided into several departments, ably conducted, and a popular assembly, a congress, which would favorably compare with the Parliament of Japan—an infinitely better government than the insurrectionary government of Cuba ever was.

It is said that Aguinaldo's government was in operation among only a part of the people of the islands. This is true. But it is also certain that it was recognized and supported by an immeasurably larger part of the people than Spanish sovereignty, which had practically ceased to exist, and than American rule, which was confined to a harbor and a city and which was carried on by the exercise of military force under what was substantially martial law over a people that constituted about one-twentieth of the whole population of the islands. Thus, having brought but a very small fraction of the country and its people under our military control, we bought by that treaty the sovereignty over the whole from a power which had practically lost that sovereignty and therefore did no longer possess it; and we contemptuously disdained to consult the existing native government, which actually did control a large part of the country and the people, and which had been our ally in the war with Spain. The sovereignty we thus acquired may well be defined as Abraham Lincoln once defined the "popular sovereignty" of Senator Douglas's doctrine—as being like a soup made by boiling the shadow of the breastbone of a pigeon that had been starved to death.

No wonder that treaty found opposition in the Senate. Virulent abuse was heaped upon the "statesman who would oppose the ratification of a peace treaty." A peace treaty? This was no peace treaty at all. It was a treaty with half a dozen bloody wars in its belly. It was, in the first place, an open and brutal declaration of war against our allies, the Filipinos, who struggled for freedom and independence from foreign rule. Every man not totally blind could see that. For such a treaty the true friends of peace could, of course, not vote.

But more. Even before that treaty had been assented to by the Senate—that is, even before that ghastly shadow of our Philippine sovereignty had obtained any legal sanction—President McKinley assumed of his own motion the sovereignty of the Philippine Islands by his famous "benevolent-assimilation" order of December 21, 1898, through which our military commander at Manila was directed forthwith to extend the military government of the United States over the whole archipelago, and by which the Filipinos were notified that if they refused to submit, they would be compelled by force of arms. Having bravely fought for their freedom and independence from one foreign rule, they did refuse to submit to another foreign rule, and then the slaughter of our late allies began—the slaughter by American arms of a once friendly and confiding people. And this slaughter has been going on ever since.

This is a grim story. Two years ago the prediction of such a possibility would have been regarded as a hideous nightmare, as the offspring of a diseased imagination. But to-day it is a true tale—a plain recital of facts taken from the official records. These things have actually been done in these last two years by and under the Administration of William McKinley. This is our Philippine war as it stands. Is it a wonder that the American people should be troubled in their consciences? But let us not be too swift in our judgment on the conduct of those in power over us. Let us hear what they have to say in defense of it.

It is pretended that we had a right to the possession of the Philippines, and that self-respect demanded us to enforce that right. What kind of right was it? The right of conquest? Had we really acquired that country by armed conquest, which, as President McKinley has told us, is, according to the American code of morals, "criminal aggression?" But if we had thrown aside our code of morals, we had then not conquered more than the bay and city of Manila. The rest of the country was controlled, if by anybody, by the Filipinos. Or was it the right of possession by treaty? I have already shown that the President ordered the enforcement of our sovereignty over the archipelago before the treaty had by ratification gained legal effect, and also that in making that treaty we had bought something called sovereignty which Spain had ceased to possess and could therefore not sell and deliver. But let me bring the matter home to you by a familiar example.

Imagine that in our Revolutionary times France, being at war with England, had brought to this country a fleet and an army, and had, without any definite compact to that effect, cooperated as an ally with our Revolutionary forces, permitting all the while the Americans to believe that she did this without any mercenary motive, and that in case of victory the American colonies would be free and independent. Imagine, then, that after the British surrendered at Yorktown the King of France had extorted from the British King a treaty ceding, for a consideration of $20,000,000, the sovereignty over the American colonies to France, and that thereupon the King of France had coolly notified the Continental Congress and General Washington that they had to give up their idea of national independence and to surrender unconditionally to the sovereignty of France, wherefor the French King promised them "benevolent assimilation." Imagine, further, that upon the protest of the Americans that Great Britain, having lost everything in the colonies except New York City and a few other little posts, had no sovereignty to cede, the French King answered that he had bought the Americans at $5 a head, and that if they refused to submit he would give them benevolent assimilation in the shape of bullets. Can there be any doubt that the Continental Congress and General Washington would have retorted that, no matter what the French King might have bought, Great Britain had no sovereignty left to sell; that least of all would the Americans permit themselves to be sold; that the French, in so treating their American allies after such high-sounding professions of friendship and generosity, were a lot of mean, treacherous, contemptible hypocrites, and that the Americans would rather die than submit to such wolves in sheep's clothing. And will any patriotic American now deny that, whatever quibbles of international law about possible cessions of a lost sovereignty might be invented, such conduct of the French would have been simply a shame and that the Americans of that time would have eternally disgraced themselves if they had failed to resist unto death? How, then, can the same patriotic American demand that the Filipinos should surrender and accept American sovereignty under circumstances exactly parallel? And that parallel will not be shaken by any learned international law technicalities, which do not touch the moral element of the subject.

It is also pretended that, whatever our rights, the Filipinos were the original aggressors in the pending fight, and that our troops found themselves compelled to defend their flag against assault. What are the facts?

One evening early in February last some Filipino soldiers entered the American lines without, however, attacking anybody. An American sentry fired, killing one of the Filipinos. Then a desultory firing began at the outposts. It spread until it assumed the proportions of an extensive engagement, in which a large number of Filipinos were killed. It is a well-established fact that this engagement could not have been a premeditated affair on the part of the Filipinos, as many of their officers, including Aguinaldo's private secretary, were at the time in the theaters and cafés of Manila. It is further well known that the next day Aguinaldo sent an officer, General Torres, under a flag of truce to General Otis to declare that the fighting had not been authorized by Aguinaldo, but had begun accidentally; that Aguinaldo wished to have it stopped, and proposed to that end the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies, such as might be agreeable to General Otis; whereupon General Otis curtly answered that the fighting, having once begun, must go on to the grim end. Who was it that really wanted the fight?

But far more important than all this is the fact that President McKinley's "benevolent assimilation" order, which even before the ratification of the treaty demanded that the Philippine Islanders should unconditionally surrender to American sovereignty, in default whereof our military forces would compel them, was really the President's declaration of war against the Filipinos insisting upon independence, however you may quibble about it. When an armed man enters my house under some questionable pretext and tells me that I must yield to him unconditional control of the premises or he will knock me down, who is the aggressor, no matter who strikes the first blow? No case of aggression can be clearer, shuffle and prevaricate as you will.

Let us recapitulate. We go to war with Spain in behalf of an oppressed colony of hers. We solemnly proclaim this to be a war not of conquest, God forbid, but of liberation and humanity. We invade the Spanish colony of the Philippines, destroy the Spanish fleet, and invite the cooperation of the Filipino insurgents against Spain. We accept their effective aid as allies, all the while permitting them to believe that in case of victory they will be free and independent.

By active fighting they get control of a large part of the interior country, from which Spain is virtually ousted. When we have captured Manila and have no further use for our Filipino allies, our President directs that, behind their backs, a treaty be made with Spain transferring their country to us; and even before that treaty is ratified he tells them that in place of the Spaniards they must accept us as their masters, and that if they do not they will be compelled by force of arms. They refuse, and we shoot them down; and, as President McKinley said at Pittsburg, we shall continue to shoot them down "without useless parley."

I have recited these things in studiously sober and dry, matter-of-fact language, without oratorical ornament or appeal. I ask you now what epithet can you find justly to characterize such a course? Happily you need not search for one, for President McKinley himself has furnished the best when in a virtuous moment he said that annexation by force should not be thought of, for according to the American code of morals it would be "criminal aggression." Yes; "criminal" is the word. Have you ever heard of any aggression more clearly criminal than this? And in this case there is an element of peculiarly repulsive meanness and treachery. I pity the American who can behold this spectacle without the profoundest shame, contrition, and resentment. Is it a wonder, I repeat, that the American people, in whose name this has been done, should be troubled in their consciences?

To justify, or, rather, to excuse such things, nothing but a plea of the extremest necessity will avail. Did such a necessity exist? In a sort of helpless way, the defenders of this policy ask, "What else could the President have done under the circumstances?" This question is simply childish. If he thought he could not order Commodore Dewey away from Manila after the execution of the order to destroy the Spanish fleet, he could have told the people of the Philippine Islands that this was, on our part, a war, not of conquest, but of liberation and humanity; that we sympathized with their desire for freedom and independence, and that we would treat them as we had specifically promised to treat the Cuban people in furthering the establishment of an independent government. And this task would have been much easier than in the case of Cuba, since, according to Admiral Dewey's repeatedly emphatic testimony, the Filipinos were much better fitted for such a government.

Our ingenious Postmaster-General has told us that the President could not have done that because he had no warrant for it, since he did not know whether the American people would wish to keep the Philippine Islands. But what warrant, then, had the President for putting before the Filipinos by his "benevolent-assimilation order" the alternative of submission to our sovereignty or war? Had he any assurance that the American people willed that? If such was his dream, there may be a rude awakening in store for him. But I say that for assenting to the aspiration of the Filipinos to freedom and independence he would have had the fullest possible warrant in the spirit of our institutions and in the resolution of Congress stamping our war against Spain as a war of liberation and humanity; and such a course would surely have been approved by the American people, except, perhaps, some jingoes bent upon wild adventure and some syndicates of speculators unscrupulous in their greed of gain.

There are also some who, with the mysterious mien of a superior sense of responsibility, tell us that the President could not have acted otherwise, because Dewey's victory devolved upon us some grave international or other obligations which would have been disregarded had the President failed to claim sovereignty over the Philippines.

What? Did not the destruction of Cervera's fleet and the taking of Santiago devolve the same obligations upon us with regard to Cuba? And who has ever asserted that therefore Cuba must be put under our sovereignty? And did ever anybody pretend that our victories in Mexico fifty years ago imposed upon us international or other obligations which compelled us to assume sovereignty over the Mexican Republic after we had conquered it much more than we have conquered the Philippines? Does not, in the light of history, this obligation dodge appear as a hollow mockery?

An equally helpless plea is it that the President could not treat with Aguinaldo and his followers because they did not represent the whole population of the islands. But having an established government and an army of some 25,000 or 30,000 men, and in that army men from various tribes, they represented at least something.

They represented at least a large part of the population and a strong nucleus of a national organization. And, as we have to confess that in the Philippines there is no active opposition to the Filipino government except that which we ourselves manage to excite, it may be assumed that they represent the sympathy of practically the whole people.

But, pray, what do we represent there? At first, while the islanders confided in us as their liberators, we represented their hope for freedom and independence. Since we have betrayed that hope, we represent, as a brute force bent upon subjugating them, only their bitter hatred and detestation. We have managed to turn virtually that whole people, who at first greeted us with childlike trust as their beloved deliverers, into deadly enemies, for it is a notorious fact that those we regard as "amigos" to-day will to-morrow stand in the ranks of our foes.

We have not a true friend left among the islanders, unless it be some speculators, and the Sultan of Sulu with his harem and his slaves, whose support we have bought with a stipend like that which the Republic in its feeble infancy paid to the pirates of the Barbary States. And even his friendship will hardly last long. Yes, it is a terrible fact that in one year we have made them hate us more, perhaps, than they hated even their Spanish oppressors who were at least less foreign to them, and that the manner in which we are treating them has caused many, if not most of the Filipinos, to wish that they had patiently suffered Spanish tyranny rather than be "liberated" by us.

But the ghastliest argument of all in defense of the President's course is that he had to extend American sovereignty over the whole archipelago, even before the ratification of the treaty, and that he was, and is now, obliged to shoot down the Filipinos, to the end of "restoring order" and "preventing anarchy" in the islands. We are to understand that if our strong armed hand did not restrain them from doing as they pleased—that is, if they were left free and independent—they would quickly begin to cut one another's or other people's throats and to ravish and destroy one another's or other people's property. We may reasonably assume that if this were sure to be the upshot of their being left free and independent they would have shown some such tendency where they have actually held sway under their own revolutionary government.

Now for the facts. We have the reports of two naval officers and of two members of the Signal Corps who traveled extensively behind Aguinaldo's lines through the country controlled by his government. And what did they find? Quiet and orderly rural or municipal communities, in all appearance well organized and governed, full of enthusiasm for their liberty and independence, which they thought secured by the expulsion of the Spaniards, and for their leader, Aguinaldo, and at the time—it was before President McKinley had ordered the subjugation of the islands—also for the Americans, whom, with childlike confidence, they still believed friendly to their freedom from all foreign rule.

We may be sure that if any anarchical disturbances had happened among them our imperialists would have eagerly made report. But there has been nothing at all equivalent to such things. The only rumors of so-called "anarchy" have come through a British consul on the island of Borneo, who writes that bloody broils are occurring in some of the southernmost regions of the Philippine archipelago, and that the Americans are wanted there. But the Americans are engaged in killing orderly Filipinos—Filipino soldiers of just that Filipino government which, on its part, would probably soon restore order in the troubled places if it had not to defend itself against the "criminal aggression" of the Americans.

The imperialists wish us to believe that in the Philippines there is bloody disorder wherever our troops are not. In fact, after the Filipinos had expelled the Spaniards from the interior of their country bloody disorders began there only when our troops appeared.

Here is an example: In December last the city of Iloilo, the second city in commercial importance in the Philippines, was evacuated by the Spaniards and occupied by the Filipinos. Gen. M. P. Miller, of our Army, was sent in command of an expedition to take possession of it. As he has publicly stated, when he appeared with his ships and soldiers before the city he "received a letter from the business people of Iloilo, principally foreigners, stating that good order was being maintained, life and property being protected, and requesting him not to attack at present." But soon afterwards he received peremptory orders to attack, and did so; and then the killing and the burning of houses and other work of devastation began. Can it be said that our troops had to go there to "restore order" and prevent bloodshed and devastation? No; order and safety existed there, and it was only with our troops that the bloodshed and devastation came, which otherwise might not have occurred.

I am far from meaning to picture the Philippine Islanders as paragons of virtue and gentle conduct. But I challenge the imperialists to show me any instances of bloody disturbance or other savagery among them sufficient to create any necessity for our armed interference to "restore order" or to "save them from anarchy." I ask and demand an answer: Is it not true that, even if there has been such a disorderly tendency, it would have required a long time for it to kill one-tenth as many human beings as we have killed and to cause one-tenth as much devastation as we have caused by our assaults upon them?

In the vocabulary of our imperialists "order" means, above all, submission to their will. Any other kind of order, be it ever so peaceful and safe, must be suppressed with a bloody hand. This "order" is the kind that has been demanded by the despot since the world had a history. Its language has already become dangerously familiar to us—a familiarity which can not cease too soon.

From all these points of view, therefore, the Philippine war was as unnecessary as it is unjust. And who will deny that this war would certainly have been avoided had the President remained true to the national pledge that the war against Spain should be a war of liberation and humanity and not of conquest? Can there be any doubt that, if the assurance had honestly been given and carried out, we might have had, for the mere asking, all the coaling stations, and facilities for commercial and industrial enterprise, and freedom for the establishment of schools and churches we might reasonably desire? And what have we now?

After eight months' slaughter and devastation, squandered treasure, and shame, an indefinite prospect of more and more slaughter, devastation, squandered treasure, and shame.

But, we are asked, since we have to deal with a situation not as it might have been, but as it is, what do we propose to do now? We may fairly turn about and say, since not we, but you, have got the country into this frightful mess, what have you to propose? Well, and what is the answer? "No useless parley! More soldiers! More guns! More blood! More devastation! Kill, kill, kill! And when we have killed enough, so that further resistance stops, then we shall see." Translated from smooth phrase into plain English, this is the programme. Let us examine it with candor and coolness.

What is the ultimate purpose of this policy? To be perfectly fair, I will assume that the true spirit of American imperialism is represented not by the extremists, who want to subjugate the Philippine Islanders at any cost and then exploit the islands to the best advantage of the conquerors, but by the more humane persons, who say that we must establish our sovereignty over them to make them happy, to prepare them for self-government, and even recognize their right to complete independence as soon as they show themselves fit for it.

Let me ask these well-meaning citizens a simple question. If you think that the American people may ultimately consent to the independence of those islanders as a matter of right and good policy, why do you insist upon killing them now? You answer: Because they refuse to recognize our sovereignty. Why do they so refuse? Because they think themselves entitled to independence and are willing to fight and die for it.

But if you insist upon continuing to shoot them down for this reason does not that mean that you want to kill them for demanding the identical thing which you yourself think that you may ultimately find it just and proper to grant them? Would not every drop of blood shed in such a guilty sport cry to heaven? For you must not forget that establishing our sovereignty in the Philippines means the going on with the work of slaughter and devastation to the grim end, and nobody can tell where that end will be. To kill men in a just war and in obedience to imperative necessity is one thing. To kill men for demanding what you yourself may ultimately have to approve is another. How can such killing adopted as a policy be countenanced by a man of conscience and humane feelings? And yet such killing "without useless parley" is the policy proposed to us.

We are told that we must trust President McKinley and his advisers to bring us out "all right." I should be glad to be able to do so; but I can not forget that they have got us in all wrong. And here we have to consider a point of immense importance, which I solemnly urge upon the attention of the American people.

It is one of the fundamental principles of our system of democratic government that only the Congress has the power to declare war. What does this signify? That a declaration of war, the initiation of an armed conflict between this nation and some other power—the most solemn and responsible act a nation can perform, involving, as it does, the lives and fortunes of an uncounted number of human beings—shall not be at the discretion of the executive branch of the Government, but shall depend upon the authority of the legislative representatives of the people. In other words, that, as much as the machinery of government may make such a thing possible, the deliberate will of the people constitutionally expressed shall determine the awful question of peace or war.

It is true there may be circumstances of foreign aggression or similar emergencies to precipitate an armed conflict without there being a possibility of consulting the popular will beforehand. But, such exceptional cases notwithstanding, the constitutional principle remains that the question of peace or war is essentially one which the popular will is to decide, and that no possibility should be lost to secure upon it the expression of the popular will through its legislative organs.

Whenever such a possibility is willfully withheld or neglected and a war has been brought upon the country without every available means being employed thus to consult the popular will upon that question, the spirit of the Constitution is flagrantly violated in one of its most essential principles.

We are now engaged in a war with the Filipinos. You may quibble about it as you will, call it by whatever name you will, it is a war, and a war of conquest on our part at that—a war of bare-faced, cynical conquest. Now, I ask any fair-minded man whether the President, before beginning that war or while carrying it on, has ever taken any proper steps to get from the Congress, the representatives of the people, any proper authority for making that war?

He issued his famous "benevolent assimilation" order, directing the Army to bring the whole Philippine archipelago as promptly as possible under the military government of the United States, on December 21, 1898, while Congress was in session, and before the treaty with Spain, transferring her shadowy sovereignty over the islands, had acquired any force of law by the assent of the Senate. That was substantially a declaration of war against the Filipinos asserting their independence. He took this step of his own motion. To be sure, he has constantly been telling us that "the whole subject is with Congress," and that "Congress shall direct." But when did he, while Congress was in session, lay a full statement before that body and ask its direction? Why did he not, before he proclaimed that the slaughter must go on "without useless parley," call Congress together to consult the popular will in constitutional form?

Why, even in these days, while "swinging around the circle," the President and his secretaries are speaking of the principal thing, the permanent annexation of the Philippines, not as a question still to be determined, but as a thing done—concluded by the Executive, implying that Congress will have simply to regulate the details.

Now, you may bring ever so many arguments to show that the President had technically a right to act as he did, and your reasoning may be ever so plausible, yet the great fact remains that the President did not seek and obtain authority from Congress as to the war to be made and the policy to be pursued, and that he acted upon his own motion.

And this autocratic conduct is vastly aggravated by the other fact that in this democratic Republic, the government of which should be that of an intelligent and well-informed public opinion, a censorship of news has been instituted, which is purposely and systematically seeking to keep the American people in ignorance of the true state of things at the seat of war, and by all sorts of deceitful tricks to deprive them of the knowledge required for the formation of a correct judgment. And this censorship was practiced not only in Manila, but directly by the Administration in Washington.

Here is a specimen performance revealed by a member of Congress in a public speech; the War Department gave out a dispatch from Manila, as follows: "Volunteers willing to remain." The Congressman went to the War Department and asked for the original, which read: "Volunteers unwilling to reenlist, but willing to remain until transports arrive." You will admit that such distortion of official news is a downright swindle upon the people. Does not this give strong color to the charge of the war correspondents that the news is systematically and confessedly so doctored by the officials that it may "help the Administration?"

Those are therefore by no means wrong who call this "the President's war." And a war so brought about and so conducted the American people are asked to approve and encourage, simply because "we are in it"—that is, because the President of his own motion has got us into it. Have you considered what this means?

Every man of public experience knows how powerful and seductive precedent is as an argument in the interpretation of laws and of constitutional provisions or in justification of governmental practices. When a thing, no matter how questionable, has once been done by the Government and approved or even acquiesced in by the people, that act will surely be used as a justification of its being done again. In nothing is the authority of precedent more dangerous than in defending usurpations of governmental power. And it is remarkable how prone the public mind is, especially under the influence of party spirit, to accept precedent as a warrant for such usurpations, which, judged upon their own merits, would be sternly condemned.

And every such precedent is apt to bring forth a worse one. It is in this way that the most indispensable bulwarks of free government and of public peace and security may be undermined. To meet such dangers the American people should, if ever, remember the old saying that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

I am not here as a partisan, but as an American citizen anxious for the future of the Republic. And I can not too earnestly admonish the American people, if they value the fundamental principles of their Government and their own security and that of their children, for a moment to throw aside all partisan bias and soberly to consider what kind of a precedent they would set if they consented to, and by consenting approved, the President's management of the Philippine business merely "because we are in it."

We can not expect all our future Presidents to be models of public virtue and wisdom, as George Washington was. Imagine now in the Presidential office a man well-meaning, but, it may be, short-sighted and pliable, and under the influence of so-called "friends" who are greedy and reckless speculators, and who would not scruple to push him into warlike complications in order to get great opportunities for profit; or a man of that inordinate ambition which intoxicates the mind and befogs the conscience; or a man of extreme partisan spirit, who honestly believes the victory of his party to be necessary for the salvation of the universe, and may think that a foreign broil would serve the chances of his party; or a man of an uncontrollable combativeness of temperament which might run away with his sense of responsibility—and that we shall have such men in the Presidential chair is by no means unlikely with our loose way of selecting candidates for the Presidency.

Imagine, then, a future President belonging to either of these classes to have before him the precedent of Mr. McKinley's management of the Philippine business, sanctioned by the approval or only the acquiescence of the people, and to feel himself permitted—nay, even encouraged—to say to himself that, as this precedent shows, he may plunge the country into warlike conflicts of his own motion, without asking leave of Congress, with only some legal technicalities to cover his usurpation, or even without such, and that he may, by a machinery of deception called a war censorship, keep the people in the dark about what is going on; and that, into however bad a mess he may have got the country, he may count upon the people, as soon as a drop of blood has been shed, to uphold the usurpation and to cry down everybody who opposes it as a "traitor," and all this because "we are in it!" Can you conceive a more baneful precedent, a more prolific source of danger to the peace and security of the country? Can any sane man deny that it will be all the more prolific of evil if in this way we drift into a foreign policy full of temptation for dangerous adventure?

I say, therefore, that if we have the future of the Republic at heart we must not only not uphold the Administration in its course because "we are in it," but just because we are in it, have been got into it in such a way, the American people should stamp the Administration's proceedings with a verdict of disapproval so clear and emphatic and "get out of it" in such a fashion that this will be a solemn warning to future Presidents instead of a seductive precedent.

What, then, to accomplish this end is to be done? Of course we, as we are here, can only advise. But by calling forth expressions of the popular will by various means of public demonstration and, if need be, at the polls, we can make that advice so strong that those in power will hardly disregard it. We have often been taunted with having no positive policy to propose. But such a policy has more than once been proposed and I can only repeat it.

In the first place, let it be well understood that those are egregiously mistaken who think that if by a strong military effort the Philippine war be stopped everything will be right and no more question about it. No; the American trouble of conscience will not be appeased, and the question will be as big and virulent as ever, unless the close of the war be promptly followed by an assurance to the islanders of their freedom and independence, which assurance, if given now, would surely end the war without more fighting.

We propose, therefore, that it be given now. Let the Philippine Islanders at the same time be told that the American people will be glad to see them establish an independent government, and to aid them in that task as far as may be necessary, and even, if required, lend our good offices to bring it about; and that meanwhile we shall deem it our duty to protect them against interference from other foreign powers—in other words, that with regard to them we mean honestly to live up to the righteous principles with the profession of which we commended to the world our Spanish war.

And then let us have in the Philippines, to carry out this programme, not a small politician, nor a meddlesome martinet, but a statesman of large mind and genuine sympathy, who will not merely deal in sanctimonious cant and oily promises with a string to them, but who will prove by his acts that he and we are honest; who will keep in mind that their government is not merely to suit us, but to suit them; that it should not be measured by standards which we ourselves have not been able to reach, but be a government of their own, adapted to their own conditions and notions—whether it be a true republic, like ours, or a dictatorship like that of Porfirio Diaz, in Mexico, or an oligarchy like the one maintained by us in Hawaii, or even something like the boss rule we are tolerating in New York and Pennsylvania.

Those who talk so much about "fitting a people for self-government" often forget that no people were ever made "fit" for self-government by being kept in the leading strings of a foreign power. You learn to walk by doing your own crawling and stumbling. Self-government is learned only by exercising it upon one's own responsibility. Of course there will be mistakes and troubles and disorders. We have had and now have these, too—at the beginning our persecution of the Tories, our flounderings before the Constitution was formed, our Shay's rebellion, our whisky war, and various failures and disturbances, among them a civil war that cost us a loss of life and treasure horrible to think of, and the murder of two Presidents. But who will say that on account of these things some foreign power should have kept the American people in leading strings to teach them to govern themselves? If the Philippine Islanders do as well as the Mexicans, who have worked their way, since we let them alone after our war of 1847, through many disorders, to an orderly government, who will have a right to find fault with the result? Those who seek to impose upon them an unreasonable standard of excellence in self-government do not seriously wish to let them govern themselves at all. You may take it as a general rule that he who wants to reign over others is solemnly convinced that they are quite unable to govern themselves.

Now, what objection is there to the policy dictated by our fundamental principles and our good faith? I hear the angry cry: "What? Surrender to Aguinaldo? Will not the world ridicule and despise us for such a confession of our incompetency to deal with so feeble a foe? What will become of our prestige?" No, we shall not surrender to Aguinaldo. In giving up a criminal aggression we shall surrender only to our own consciences, to our own sense of right and justice, to our own understanding of our own true interests, and to the vital principles of our own Republic. Nobody will laugh at us whose good opinion we have reason to cherish. There will, of course, be an outcry of disappointment in England. But from whom will it come? From such men as James Bryce or John Morley or any one of those true friends of this Republic who understand and admire and wish to perpetuate and spread the fundamental principles of its vitality? No, not from them.

But the outcry will come from those in England who long to see us entangled in complications apt to make this American Republic dependent upon British aid and thus subservient to British interests. They, indeed, will be quite angry. But the less we mind their displeasure as well as their flattery the better for the safety as well as the honor of our country.

The true friends of this Republic in England, and, indeed, all over the world, who are now grieving to see us go astray, will rejoice and their hearts will be uplifted with new confidence in our honesty, in our wisdom, and in the virtue of democratic institutions when they behold the American people throwing aside all the puerilities of false pride and returning to the path of their true duty.

The world knows how strong we are. It knows full well that if the American people chose to put forth their strength, they could quickly overcome a foe infinitely more powerful than the Filipinos, and that if we, possessing the strength of the giant, do not use the giant's strength against this feeble foe, it is from the noblest of motives—our love of liberty, our sense of justice, and our respect for the rights of others—the respect of the strong for the rights of the weak. The moral prestige which, in fact, we have lost will be restored, while our prestige of physical prowess and power will certainly not be lessened by showing that we have not only soldiers, guns, ships, and money, but also a conscience.

Therefore the cry is childish that unless we take and keep the Philippines, some other power will promptly grab them. Many a time this cry has been raised to stampede the American people into a policy of annexation—in the Santo Domingo case, twenty-eight years ago, and more recently in the case of Hawaii, and in neither case was there the slightest danger—not that there were no foreign powers that would have liked to have those islands, but because they could not have taken them without the risk of grave consequences. Now the old bugbear must do service again.

Why should not American diplomacy set about to secure the consent of the powers most nearly concerned to an agreement to make the Philippine Islands neutral territory, as Belgium and Switzerland are in Europe? Because some of those powers would like to have the Philippines themselves? Well, are there not among the European powers some that would like to have Belgium or Switzerland? Certainly; and just because there are several watching each other the neutrality of those two countries is guaranteed. But even if such an agreement could not be obtained, we may be sure that there is no foreign power that would likely risk a serious quarrel with the United States, if this Republic, for the protection of the Philippine Islanders in their effort to build up an independent government, said to the world, "Hands off!" So much for those who think that somebody else might be wicked enough to grab the Philippine Islands, and that, therefore, we must be wicked enough to do the grabbing ourselves.

There are some American citizens who take of this question a purely commercial view. I declare I am ardently in favor of the greatest possible expansion of our trade, and I am happy to say that, according to official statistics, our foreign commerce, in spite of all hindrances raised against it, is now expanding tremendously, owing to the simple rule that the nation offering the best goods at proportionately the lowest prices will have the markets. It will have them without armies, without war fleets, without bloody conquests, without colonies. I confess I am not in sympathy with those, if there be such men among us, who would sacrifice our national honor and the high ideals of the Republic, and who would inflict upon our people the burdens and the demoralizing influences of militarism for a mere matter of dollars and cents. They are among the most dangerous enemies of the public welfare. But as to the annexation of the Philippines, I will, for argument's sake, adopt even their point of view for a moment and ask: Will it pay?

Now, it may well be that the annexation of the Philippines would pay a speculative syndicate of wealthy capitalists, without at the same time paying the American people at large. As to people of our race, tropical countries like the Philippines may be fields of profit for rich men who can hire others to work for them, but not for those who have to work for themselves. Taking a general view of the Philippines as a commercial market for us, I need not again argue against the barbarous notion that in order to have a profitable trade with a country we must own it. If that were true we should never have had any foreign commerce at all. Neither need I prove that it is very bad policy when you wish to build up a profitable trade, to ruin your customer first, as you would ruin the Philippines by a protracted war. It is equally needless to show to any well-informed person that the profits of the trade with the islands themselves can never amount to the cost of making and maintaining the conquest of the Philippines.

But there is another point of real importance. Many imperialists admit that our trade with the Philippines themselves will not nearly be worth its cost; but they say that we must have the Philippines as a foothold, a sort of power station, for the expansion of our trade on the Asiatic continent, especially in China.

Admitting this, for argument's sake, I ask what kind of a foothold we should really need. Coaling stations and docks for our fleet, and facilities for the establishment of commercial houses and depots. That is all. And now I ask further, whether we could not easily have had these things if we had, instead of making war upon the Filipinos, favored the independence of the islands. Everybody knows that we could. We might have those things now for the mere asking, if we stopped the war and came to a friendly understanding with the Filipinos to-morrow.

But now suppose we fight on and subjugate the Filipinos and annex the islands—what then? We shall then have of coaling stations and commercial facilities no more than we would have had in the other case; but the islanders will hate us as their bloody oppressors, and be our bitter and revengeful enemies for generations to come. You may say that this will be of no commercial importance. Let us see. It is by no means impossible, nor even improbable, that, if we are once in the way of extending our commerce with guns behind it, we may get into hot trouble with one or more of our competitors for that Asiatic trade. What then? Then our enemies need only land some Filipino refugees whom we have driven out of their country, and some cargoes of guns and ammunition on the islands, and we shall soon—all the more if we depend on native troops—have a fire in our rear which will oblige us to fight the whole old fight over again.

The present subjugation of the Philippines will, therefore, not only not be a help to the expansion of our Asiatic trade, but rather a constant danger and a clog to our feet.

And here a word by the way. A year ago I predicted in an article published in the Century Magazine, that if we turned our war of liberation into a war of conquest, our American sister republics south of us would become distrustful of our intentions with regard to them, and soon begin to form combinations against us, eventually even with European powers. The newspapers have of late been alive with vague rumors of that sort, so much so that a prominent journal of imperialistic tendency has found it necessary most earnestly to admonish the President in his next message to give to the republics south of us the strongest possible assurances of our friendship and good faith.

Suppose he does. Who will believe him after we have turned our loudly heralded war of liberation into a land-grabbing game—a "criminal aggression?" Nobody will have the slightest trust in our words, be they ever so fair. Drop your conquests and no assurances of good faith will be required. Keep your conquests and no such assurances will avail. Our southern neighbors—no less than the Filipinos—will then inevitably distrust our professions, fear our greed, and become our secret or open enemies. And who can be foolish enough to believe that this will strengthen our power and help our commerce?

It is useless to say that the subjugated Philippine Islanders will become our friends if we give them good government. However good that government may be, it will to them be foreign rule, and foreign rule especially hateful when begun by broken faith, cemented by streams of innocent blood, and erected upon the ruins of devastated homes. The American will be and remain to them more a foreigner, an unsympathetic foreigner, than the Spaniard ever was. Let us indulge in no delusion about this. People of our race are but too much inclined to have little tenderness for the rights of what we regard as inferior races, especially those of darker skin.

And how much good government have we to give them?

Are you not aware that our first imperialistic Administration is also the first that, since the enactment of the civil-service law, has widened the gates again for a new foray of spoils politics in the public service? What assurance have we that the Philippines, far away from public observation, will not be simply a pasture for needy politicians and for speculating syndicates to grow fat on, without much scruple as to the rights of the despised "natives?" Has it not been so with the British in India, although the British monarchy is much better fitted for imperial rule than our democratic Republic can ever be?

True, in the course of time the government of India has been much improved; but it required more than a century of slaughter, robbery, devastation, disastrous blundering, insurrection, and renewed bloody subjugation to evolve what there is of good government in India now. And have the populations of India ever become the friends of England? Does not England at heart tremble to-day lest some hostile foreign power come close enough to throw a firebrand into that fearful mass of explosives?

I ask you, therefore, in all soberness, leaving all higher considerations of justice, morality, and principle aside, whether, from a mere business point of view, the policy of subjugation is not a colossal, stupid blunder, and whether it would not have been, and would not now be, infinitely more sensible to win the confidence and cultivate the friendship of the islanders by recognizing them as of right entitled to their freedom and independence, as we have recognized the Cubans, and thus to obtain from their friendship and gratitude, for the mere asking, all the coaling stations and commercial facilities we require, instead of getting those things by fighting at an immense cost of blood and treasure, with a probability of having to fight for them again? I put this question to every business man who is not a fool or a reckless speculator. Can there be any doubt of the answer?

A word now on a special point. There are some very estimable men among us who think that even if we concede to the islanders their independence we should at least keep the city of Manila. I think differently, not from a mere impulse of generosity, but from an entirely practical point of view. Manila is the traditional, if not the natural, capital of the archipelago.

To recognize the independence of the Philippine Islanders and at the same time to keep from them Manila would mean as much as to recognize the independence of Cuba and to keep Havana. It would mean to withhold from the islanders their metropolis, that in which they naturally take the greatest pride, that which they legitimately most desire to have, and which, if withheld from them, they would most ardently wish to get back. The withholding of Manila would inevitably leave a sting in their hearts which would never cease to rankle, and might, under critical circumstances, give us as much trouble as the withholding of independence itself. If we wish them to be our friends we should not do things by halves, but enable them to be our friends without reserve. And I maintain that, commercially as well as politically speaking, the true friendship of the Philippine Islanders will, as to our position in the East, be worth far more to us than the possession of Manila. We can certainly find other points which will give us similar commercial as well as naval advantages without exciting any hostile feeling.

Although I have by no means exhausted this vast subject, discussing only a few phases of it, I have said enough, I think, to show that this policy of conquest is, from the point of view of public morals, in truth "criminal aggression," made doubly criminal by the treacherous character of it; and that from the point of view of material interest it is a blunder, a criminal blunder, and a blundering crime.

I have addressed myself to your reason by sober argument, without any appeal to prejudice or passion. Might we not ask our opponents to answer these arguments, if they can, with equally sober reasoning, instead of merely assailing us with their wild cries of "treason" and "lack of patriotism," and what not? Or do they really feel their cause to be so weak that they depend for its support on their assortment of inarticulate shouts and nebulous phrases?

Here are our "manifest destiny" men who tell us that, whether it be right or not, we must take and keep the Philippines because "destiny" so wills it. We have heard this cry of manifest destiny before, especially when, a half century ago, the slave power demanded the annexation of Cuba and Central America to strengthen the slave power. The cry of destiny is most vociferously put forward by those who want to do a wicked thing and to shift the responsibility.

The destiny of a free people lies in its intelligent will and its moral strength. When it pleads destiny, it pleads the baby act. Nay, worse; the cry of destiny is apt to be the refuge of evil intent and of moral cowardice.

Here are our "burden" men, who piously turn up their eyes and tell us, with a melancholy sigh, that all this conquest business may be very irksome, but that a mysterious Providence has put it as a "burden" upon us, which, however sorrowfully, we must bear; that this burden consists in our duty to take care of the poor people of the Philippines; and that in order to take proper care of them we must exercise sovereignty over them: and that if they refuse to accept our sovereignty we must—alas! alas!—kill them, which makes the burden very solemn and sad.

But cheer up, brethren! We may avoid that mournful way of taking care of them by killing them, if we simply recognize their right to take care of themselves, and gently aid them in doing so.

Next there are our "flag" men, who insist that we must kill the Filipinos fighting for their independence to protect the honor of the Stars and Stripes. I agree that the honor of our flag sorely needs protection. We have to protect it against desecration by those who are making it an emblem of that hypocrisy which seeks to cover a war of conquest and subjugation with a cloak of humanity and religion; an emblem of that greed which would treat a matter involving our national honor, the integrity of our institutions, and the peace and character of the Republic as a mere question of dollars and cents; an emblem of that vulgar lust of war and conquest which recklessly tramples upon right and justice and all our higher ideals; an emblem of the imperialistic ambitions which mock the noblest part of our history and stamp the greatest national heroes of our past as hypocrites or fools. These are the dangers threatening the honor of our flag, against which it needs protection, and that protection we are striving to give it.

Now, a last word to those of our fellow-citizens who feel and recognize as we do that the Philippine war of subjugation is wrong and cruel, and that we ought to recognize the independence of those people, but who insist that, having begun that war, we must continue it until the submission of the Filipinos is complete.

I detest, but I can understand, the jingo whose moral sense is obscured by intoxicating dreams of wild adventure and conquest and to whom bloodshed and devastation have become a reckless sport. I detest even more, but still I can understand, the cruel logic of those to whom everything is a matter of dollars and cents and whose greed of gain will walk coolly over slaughtered populations.' But I must confess I can not understand the reasoning of those who have moral sense enough to recognize that this war is criminal aggression, who must say to themselves that every drop of blood shed in it by friend or foe is blood wantonly and wickedly shed, and that every act of devastation is barbarous cruelty inflicted upon an innocent people, but who still maintain that we must go on killing and devastating and driving our brave soldiers into a fight which they themselves are cursing, because we have once begun it. This I can not understand. Do they not consider that in such a war, which they themselves condemn as wanton and iniquitous, the more complete our success the greater will be our disgrace?

What do they fear for the Republic if, before having fully consummated this criminal aggression, we stop to give a people struggling for their freedom what is due them? Will this Republic be less powerful? It will be as strong as ever, nay, stronger, for it will have saved the resources of its power from useless squandering and transformed vindictive enemies into friends.

Will it be less respected? Nay, more, for it will have demonstrated its honesty at the sacrifice of false pride. Is this the first time that a powerful nation desisted from the subjugation of a weaker adversary? Have we not the example of England before us, who, after a seven years' war against the American colonists, recognized their independence? Indeed, the example of England teaches us a double lesson. England did not, by recognizing American independence, lose her position in the world and her chances of future greatness; on the contrary, she grew in strength. And secondly, England would have retained, or won anew, the friendship of the Americans, if she had recognized American independence more promptly, before appearing to have been forced to do so by humiliating defeats. Will our friends who are for Philippine independence, but also for continuing to kill those who fight it, take these two lessons to heart?

Some of them say that we have here to fulfill some of the disagreeable duties of patriotism. Patriotism! Who were the true patriots of England at the time of the American Revolution—King George and Lord North, who insisted upon subjugation; or Lord Chatham and Edwin Burke, who stood up for American rights and American liberty?

Who were the true patriots of France when, recently, that ghastly farce of a military trial was enacted to sacrifice an innocent man for the honor of the French army and the prestige of the French Republic—who were the true French patriots, those who insisted that the hideous crime of an unjust condemnation must be persisted in, or those who bravely defied the cry of "traitor!" and struggled to undo the wrong, and thus to restore the French Republic to the path of justice and to the esteem of the world?

Who are the true patriots in America to-day—those who drag our Republic once so proud of its high principles and ideals, through the mire of broken pledges, vulgar ambitions and vanities and criminal aggressions; those who do violence to their own moral sense by insisting that, like the Dreyfus iniquity, a criminal course once begun must be persisted in, or those who, fearless of the demagogue clamor, strive to make the flag of the Republic once more what it was once—the flag of justice, liberty, and true civilization—and to lift up the American people among the nations of the earth to the proud position of the people that have a conscience and obey it.

The country has these days highly and deservedly honored Admiral Dewey as a national hero. Who are his true friends—those who would desecrate Dewey's splendid achievement at Manila by making it the starting point of criminal aggression, and thus the opening of a most disgraceful and inevitably disastrous chapter of American history, to be remembered with sorrow, or those who strive so to shape the results of that brilliant feat of arms that it may stand in history not as a part of a treacherous conquest, but as a true victory of American good faith in an honest war of liberation and humanity—to be proud of for all time, as Dewey himself no doubt meant it to be.

I know the imperialists will say that I have been pleading here for Aguinaldo and his Filipinos against our Republic. No, not for the Filipinos merely, although, as one of those who have grown gray in the struggle for free and honest government, I would never be ashamed to plead for the cause of freedom and independence, even when its banner is carried by dusky and feeble hands. But I am pleading for more. I am pleading for the cause of American honor and self-respect, American interests, American democracy; aye, for the cause of the American people against an administration of our public affairs which has wantonly plunged this country into an iniquitous war; which has disgraced the Republic by a scandalous breach of faith to a people struggling for their freedom whom we had used as allies; which has been systematically seeking to deceive and mislead the public mind by the manufacture of false news; which has struck at the very foundation of our constitutional government by an Executive usurpation of the war power; which makes sport of the great principles and high ideals that have been and should ever remain the guiding star of our course, and which, unless stopped in time, will transform this Government of the people, for the people, and by the people into an imperial government cynically calling itself republican—a government in which the noisy worship of arrogant might will drown the voice of right; which will impose upon the people a burdensome and demoralizing militarism, and which will be driven into a policy of wild and rapacious adventure by the unscrupulous greed of the exploiter—a policy always fatal to democracy.

I plead the cause of the American people against all this, and I here declare my profound conviction that if this administration of our affairs were submitted for judgment to a popular vote on a clear issue it would be condemned by an overwhelming majority.

I confidently trust that the American people will prove themselves too clear-headed not to appreciate the vital difference between the expansion of the Republic and its free institutions over contiguous territory and kindred populations, which we all gladly welcome if accomplished peaceably or honorably, and imperialism which reaches out for distant lands to be ruled as subject provinces; too intelligent not to perceive that our very first step on the road of imperialism has been a betrayal of the fundamental principles of democracy, followed by disaster and disgrace; too enlightened not to understand that a monarchy may do such things and still remain a strong monarchy, while a democracy can not do them and still remain a democracy; too wise not to detect the false pride, or the dangerous ambitions, or the selfish schemes which so often hide themselves under that deceptive cry of mock patriotism: "Our country, right or wrong!" They will not fail to recognize that our dignity, our free institutions, and the peace and welfare of this and coming generations of Americans will be secure only as we cling to the watchword of true patriotism: "Our country—when right to be kept right; when wrong to be put right."

C.

CUBA AND THE PHILIPPINES—BOTH ENTITLED TO INDEPENDENCE.

To the editors of the Journal, Advertiser, Herald, and Globe, Boston, Mass.

GENTLEMEN: Will you give me space in your columns to answer a very serious attack which, I believe, all of you have published? At a meeting of the Essex Club last Saturday, Mr. Quigg, lately a Republican member of Congress from New York, after some undeserved compliment, made this statement, referring to me:

"What he wants us to do I can define in no other words than these: 'He wants us to skulk from our duty.'"

I wish to put against this statement my emphatic denial. What I wanted the American people to do in the beginning, what I have wanted them to do all along, what I want them to do now, is to do in the Philippines exactly what we have done, are doing, and expect to do in Cuba.

If we have skulked in Cuba, then Mr. Quigg may be justified in saying that I would skulk in the Philippines. We have liberated both from Spain, and we have had no thought—at least, I have had no thought—of giving either back to Spain. I should as soon give back a redeemed soul to Satan as give back the people of the Philippine Islands to the cruelty and tyranny of Spain.

Indeed, since they got arms, an army, and an organization, I do not believe it would have been in the power of Spain to subdue them again.

But the United States never, in my judgment, should have allowed her to make the attempt. Having delivered them from Spain, we were bound in all honor to protect their newly acquired liberty against the ambition or greed of any other nation on earth, and we were equally bound to protect them against our own. We were bound to stand by them, a defender and protector, until their new governments were established in freedom and in honor; until they had made treaties with the powers of the earth and were as secure in their national independence as Switzerland is secure, as Denmark is secure, as Belgium is secure, as Santo Domingo or Venezuela is secure.

Now, if this be a policy of skulking from duty, I fail to see it. Perhaps I am not so familiar with the history or the vocabulary of liberty as Mr. Quigg.

We based our policy in regard to Cuba (did we not?) on the ground that it was the policy of righteousness and liberty. We did not tempt the cupidity of any millionaire, or even the honest desire for employment of any workmen, by the argument that if we reduced the people of Cuba to our dominion we could make money out of her and she could not help herself.

In those days we were appealing to the great, noble heart of America and not to the breeches pocket.

If we were bound in honor and in righteousness, bound by the history of our own past, bound by the principles and pledges of our people, to abstain from depriving Cuba of the liberty we had given her because it was right, we are, in my judgment, all the more bound to abstain from depriving the people of the Philippine Islands of their liberties because it is right.

If I am right in affirming this as a matter of principle (and I am a little curious to see who will stand up and dispute it on Massachusetts soil, or who will speak any other doctrine to the sons of Essex), then the question becomes a question of fact.

Are the people of the Philippine Islands as well entitled to their freedom and independence as the people of Cuba?

Had they contributed as much to achieving their independence as had the people of Cuba?

Do they desire their independence as do the people of Cuba?

Are they fit to govern themselves as are the people of Cuba?

Have they forfeited their right to their independence by any misconduct, such as attacking the Army of the United States wantonly and without provocation?

Now, the facts which enable us to answer all these questions, about which the people have been so much misled during the last summer, come to us at length from the reports of the commanders of our army and navy in the Philippine Islands.

I have two witnesses to call—Otis and Dewey. While I may not adopt all their conclusions as to policy (and it is not the special business of soldiers and sailors to determine the policies of the country), I have no desire to go beyond them and the men for whom they vouch in the matter of fact.

But before citing the evidence, let me state what I would do to-day, as I have stated what I desired to do before the war broke out. The Philippine armies are scattered. General Lawton said they were the bravest men he had ever seen. But they have been beaten in every battle. Aguinaldo is a fugitive and in concealment. They are in the condition that Spain was in after Napoleon had overthrown her navies and driven out her King at the beginning of the Peninsular war, with a * * * host as huge and strong as e'er defied

Their God and placed their trust in human pride.

Whether they will repeat the history of Spain, dispersing like foam when they are attacked, coming together again like the thundercloud, and in the end wear out the patience of the conqueror, it is not worth while to speculate.

It is not from any fear of any foeman, powerful or insignificant, that the American people are to determine their duty.

If the thing be right, they mean to do it. If it be wrong, they will not do it. I would send General Wood or General Miles or Admiral Dewey to Luzon. I would have him gather about him a cabinet of the best men among the Filipinos who have the confidence of the people and desire nothing but their welfare. In all provinces and municipalities where civil government is now established possessing the confidence of the people, I would consult with their rulers and representatives.

I would lend the aid of the Army of the United States only to keep order. I would permit the people to make laws and to administer laws, subject to some supervision or inspection till the disturbed times are over and peace has settled down again upon that country, insuring the security of the people against avarice, ambition, or peculation. So soon as it seems that government can maintain itself peacefully and in order, I would by degrees withdraw the authority of the United States, making a treaty with them that we would protect them against the cupidity of any other nation and would lend our aid for a reasonable time to maintain order and law.

Now, if this be skulking, if this be ignoble, if this be unworthy of an American citizen or a Massachusetts Senator, then I must plead guilty to Mr. Quigg's charge. But these are the things I would have done, and this is the thing I would do now.

If this counsel had been followed, not a man would have died on either side; not a drop of blood would have been spilled: not a recruit would have been needed by Army or Navy since the day when Manila capitulated to Otis. Nearly all of the 36 war vessels, with their 5,000 or 6,000 men, could have been ordered home more than a year ago. Our army there—greater than that with which Lee defended his lines so long; greater than that which Sherman led to the sea; greater than our armies of the Revolution, or of the war of 1812—would all have come home, except a small garrison.

I have carefully read Dewey's dispatches, including the testimony of two naval officers, whom he sent on a two months' tour through Luzon, before the conflict between our troops and those of Aguinaldo, which, under his own signature, he declares to be the best statement of the condition of things there that has been made. I have read many of the dispatches of General Otis. A few of these have been published. Some of them have, so far, been withheld from public knowledge. They establish, beyond reasonable doubt, clearly:

One. That Aguinaldo is an honest, patriotic, and brave man. Indeed, that is the express testimony of Mr. Schurman, president of Cornell University, and president of the commission appointed by our Government to investigate matters there.

Two. That Aguinaldo was the chosen leader of the people of the Philippine Islands.

Three. That that people have from the beginning desired independence and desire it now.

Four. That this desire was communicated to our commanders when they gave them arms, accepted their aid, and brought Aguinaldo from his exile when he was put in command of 30,000 Filipino soldiers, who were already in arms and organized.

Five. That the people of the Philippine Islands, before we fired upon their troops, had delivered their own land from Spain, with the single exception of the town of Manila, and that they hemmed in the Spanish troops on land by a line extending from water to water.

Six. That we could not have captured the Spanish garrison, which was done by an arrangement beforehand, upon a mere show of resistance but for the fact that they were so hemmed in by Aguinaldo's forces and could not retreat beyond the range and fire of the guns of our fleet.

Seven. That during all this period from the beginning to the final conflict the Filipinos were repeatedly informing our Government, not only by communications addressed to the commanders on land and sea, but by those addressed to the President of the United States, that they desired their freedom, and that they were never informed of any purpose on our part to subdue them.

Eight. That they were fit for independence. They had churches, libraries, works of art, and education. They were better educated than many American communities within the memory of some of us. They were eager and ambitious to learn. They were governing their entire island, except Manila, in order and quiet, with municipal governments, courts of justice, schools, and a complete constitution resting upon the consent of the people. They were better fitted for self-government than any country on the American continent south of us, from the Rio Grande to Cape Horn; or than San Domingo or Haiti, when these countries, respectively, achieved their independence, and are fitter for self-government than some of them are now. They are now as fit for self-government as was Japan when she was welcomed into the family of nations.

Nine. That the outbreak of hostilities was not their fault, but ours. A patrol, not a hostile military force, approached a small village between the lines of the two armies, a village on the American side of the line of demarcation to which some of our soldiers had been moved in disregard of the rule applicable to all cases of truce. When this patrol approached this town it was challenged. How far the Filipinos understood our language or how far our pickets understood the reply that they made in their own language does not appear. But we fired upon them first. The fire was returned from their lines. Thereupon it was returned again from us, and several Filipinos were killed. As soon as Aguinaldo heard of it he sent a message to General Otis saying that the firing was without his knowledge and against his will; that he deplored it, and that he desired hostilities to cease, and would withdraw his troops to any distance General Otis should desire. To which the American general replied, that as the fighting had begun, it must go on.

Now, how absurd for the persons who could have stopped it at any time from the beginning with a single word of assurance that they meant to respect the liberties of the people of the Philippine Islands to charge the men who have been constantly begging them to say that word with being responsible for the continuance of the war!

Ten. That on December 28, 1898, the two sides being at peace, although great uneasiness and irritation had already manifested itself on the part of the Filipinos, who were afraid we meant to subjugate them, President McKinley sent to Otis a proclamation. Remember that a dozen times during the spring and summer and autumn Aguinaldo had proclaimed that his people were seeking their independence, and had implored the "great American people, by all their great history and traditions," with which he appears to have been quite familiar, not to interfere with it.

Now, on December 28, 1898, the President sent to Otis a proclamation, which he commanded him to issue. Otis, on reading it, to use the language of his report:

"After fully considering the President's proclamation and the temper of the Tagalos, with whom I was in daily discussion of political problems and the friendly intentions of the United States Government toward them, I concluded that there were certain words and expressions therein, such as 'sovereignty,' 'right of cession,' and those which directed immediate occupation, etc., though most admirably employed and tersely expressive of actual conditions, might be advantageously used by the Tagalo war party to incite widespread hostilities among the natives. The ignorant classes had been taught to believe that certain words, as 'sovereignty,' 'protection,' etc., had peculiar meaning disastrous to their welfare and significant of future political domination."

The ignorant people of America have been taught to believe just such things. I have seen such things in the writings of Washington and Adams and Jefferson, of Whittier and Garrison and Nathan Dane and Rantoul, and others of the men of Essex. Now Otis goes on to say:

"It was my opinion, therefore, that I would be justified in so amending the paper that the beneficent object of the United States Government would be brought clearly within the comprehension of the people."

Whereupon Otis proceeds to amend the President's proclamation by striking out everything in it which contains a purpose to assume sovereignty or protection, and which was significant of future political domination, and instead thereof he issued, on January 4, 1899, less than eight weeks before the outbreak of hostilities, a proclamation which he gives in a report, in which he suppressed all these utterances, and assures them that it is the purpose of the people of the United States to give them, "in every possible way, the full measure of individual rights and liberty which is the heritage of a free people." And he adds:

"I am convinced that it is the intention of the United States Government to seek the establishment of a most liberal government for the islands, in which the people themselves shall have as full representation as the maintenance of law and order will permit, and which shall be susceptible of development, on the lines of increased representation and the bestowal of increased powers, into a government as free and independent as is enjoyed by the most favored provinces of the world."

That assurance which Otis gave to the people of Manila is just what I have always wanted, and all I have always wanted, to give them. But, unhappily, Otis's proclamation was frustrated In the meantime he had sent a copy of the President's proclamation to Miller, who was lying opposite Iloilo, burning for a fight, and who, much to Otis's distress, as his dispatches show, published it. So you had the commanding general denying all purpose of domination or of interfering with their independence, on the one hand, and the President of the United States, on the other, asserting that purpose; and the Filipinos were naturally alarmed and shocked.

Otis goes on to tell how Aguinaldo appealed to his people to stand by their independence; how the Filipino newspapers took it up in angry articles, and how the people, who were beginning to be pacified and hopeful, were excited again, and justly.

Now, put yourselves in the places of these people. What would your fathers have done if Gage and Lord North had been the actors? What would any people on the face of the earth, whose bosoms are capable of holding the sentiment of liberty, have done?

Is it not infamous for anybody to turn around and tell you that the men who believe that the Filipinos should have been assured just what Otis tried to assure them of are responsible for the outbreak of the war? Otis says that the proclamation which actually came out, through Miller's departure from his intentions, was calculated to cause, and did cause, the hostilities and excite alarm and indignation in the bosoms of that freedom-seeking people.

I do not know what other men may think or what other men may say, but there is not a drop of blood in my veins, there is not a feeling in my heart that does not respect a weak people struggling with a strong one.

Some of our friends tell us that that the Filipinos are not "a people." President McKinley says they are, and that he desires "in every possible way to insure them the full measure of their individual rights and liberty which is the heritage of a free people." Otis says they are and that it is the intention of the United States Government to appoint the representative men of the Philippine islands to civil positions of trust in a government as "free and independent as is enjoyed by the most favored provinces of the earth."

When Patrick Henry was making his great speech in the old court-house in Virginia, ending with the words, "Give me liberty or give me death," he was interrupted by somebody with a shout of "treason." He finished his sentence, and replied, as every Essex schoolboy knows, "If this be treason, make the most of it."

I am unworthy to loose the latchet of the shoes of Patrick Henry; but I claim to love human liberty as well as he did, and I believe the love of human liberty will never be held to be treason by Massachusetts.

There were five of my name and blood who stood in arms at Concord bridge in the morning of the Revolution, April 19, 1775. My grandfather stood with John Adams and Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin when they presented to the Continental Congress that great paper, the bringing in of which was the foremost action of human history, which declares that the just powers of government rest upon the consent of the people, and that when a people desire it the laws of nature and the laws of God entitle them to take a separate and equal station among the nations of the earth.

And these Filipinos, as President McKinley says, and as Otis says, "are a people," and so entitled to be independent.

I have no right to feel any peculiar pride in the action of any ancestor of my own in those great days which tried men's souls, and when all true Americans thought in that way, although I should be disgraced and ought to hide my head from the gaze of men if I were to depart from those principles. But I have a right to feel a just pride in and to boast of something much higher than any personal kindred. I am a son of Massachusetts. For more than three score years and ten I have sat at her dear feet. I have seen the light of her beautiful eyes. I have heard high counsel from her lips. She has taught me to love liberty; to stand by the weak against the strong when the rights of the weak are in peril; she has led me to believe that if I do this, however humbly, however imperfectly, and whatever other men may say, I shall have her approbation and shall be deemed not unworthy of her love. Other men will do as they please. But as for me, God helping me, I can do no otherwise.

I am, faithfully yours,

GEO. F. HOAR.

D.

PLATFORM OF THE AMERICAN ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE.

We hold that the policy known as imperialism is hostile to liberty and tends toward militarism, an evil from which it has been our glory to be free. We regret that it has become necessary in the land of Washington and Lincoln to reaffirm that all men, of whatever race or color, are entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. We maintain that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. We insist that the subjugation of any people is "criminal aggression" and open disloyalty to the distinctive principles of our Government.

We earnestly condemn the policy of the present National Administration in the Philippines. We deplore the sacrifice of our soldiers and sailors, whose bravery deserves admiration even in an unjust war. We protest against the extension of American sovereignty by Spanish methods.

We urge that Congress announce to the Filipinos our purpose to concede to them the independence for which they have so long fought and which of right is theirs.

The United States have always protested against the doctrine of international law which permits the subjugation of the weak by the strong. A self-governing state can not accept sovereignty over an unwilling people. The United States can not act upon the ancient heresy that might makes right.

Imperialists assume that with the destruction of self-government in the Philippines by American hands all opposition here will cease. This is a grievous error. Much as we regret the war of "criminal aggression" in the Philippines, greatly as we regret that the blood of the Filipinos is on American hands, we more deeply resent the betrayal of American institutions at home. The real firing line is not in the suburbs of Manila. The foe is of our own household.

Whether the ruthless slaughter of the Filipinos shall end next month or next year is but an incident in a contest that must go on until the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States are rescued from the hands of their betrayers. Those who dispute about standards of value while the foundation of the Republic is undermined will be listened to as little as those who would wrangle about the small economies of the household while the house is on fire. The training of a great people for a century, the aspiration for liberty of a vast immigration, are forces that will hurl aside those who in the delirium of conquest seek to destroy the character of our institutions.

We deny that the obligation of all citizens to support their government in times of grave national peril applies to the present situation. If an Administration may with impunity ignore the issues upon which it was chosen, deliberately create a condition of war anywhere on the face of the globe, debauch the civil service for spoils to promote the adventure, organize a truth-suppressing censorship, and demand of all citizens a suspension of judgment and their unanimous support while it chooses to continue the fighting, representative government itself is imperiled.

We hold with Abraham Lincoln, that "no man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. When the white man governs himself, that is self-government, but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism." "Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men in all lands. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God can not long retain it."

We cordially invite the cooperation of all men and women who remain loyal to the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT'S POLICY—WAR AND CONQUEST ABROAD—DEGRADATION OF LABOR AT HOME.

[Address by Hon. George S. Boutwell, president American Anti-Imperialist League, at Masonic Hall, Washington, D. C., January 11, 1900, slightly revised by Hon. JOHN S. WILLIAMS.]

In the discussion on which I now enter I pass by the moral considerations which are incident to any comprehensive treatment of the Philippine war, and I address myself to the questions of business and labor in which the country is much concerned.

In some of the aspects of life ethical and moral questions occupy the highest place, but the public mind can not be directed to ethical and moral questions when the masses are not in the enjoyment of a satisfactory degree of domestic comfort. That degree of comfort can be found only where there is also a good degree of public prosperity, which itself must rest upon a public policy that secures constant employment and reasonable wages for the laboring population.

My inquiry for the moment is this: Will the subjugation of the Philippine Islands and their incorporation into the Union as equal States, or their attachment to the Government as colonial dependencies, elevate or depress the laboring population of the United States?

I omit the consideration of other interests. They are all subordinate. A public policy which secures to the laborers of the United States constant employment with remunerative wages is the best security, not perfect security—that can not be had—but the best security attainable for the prosperity of all classes.

We have undertaken, in the Chinese exclusion bill, to protect the American laborer against the actual presence of the unpaid laborers of other countries. Shall that policy be reversed?

The inhabitants of Luzon, as an example, must be treated by us, when we are called to decide upon our policy in that island, either as capable of self-government or as incapable. The population of the island is not less than 4,000,000, or 95 persons to the square mile, not excluding the portion that is covered by water. If these people are an uncivilized people, as it is alleged, and a warlike people, as warlike as they are, how many troops will be required upon a territory as large as the States of New Hampshire and Maine combined, to keep this vast multitude in subjection and in peace?

Or, how many troops will be required to maintain military stations within 10 or 20 miles of each other over the 42,000 square miles of territory? How much time will be required for that degree of peace when 10 soldiers can march 10 miles in safety in any and every part of Luzon?

How much time will be required to bring into view one native of Luzon who will in truth say: "I vote with the Army that wears the uniform and carries the flag of my country," meaning the flag of the United States?

If the inhabitants of Luzon are incapable, as they are represented to be by the President and his supporters; if they number 4,000,000 or 5,000,000, and are a warlike people, as we know they are, are there any considerations that should lead us to make war for the conquest of such a race? We may overrun the island, but its subjugation to a condition of quiet peace under the law is an impossibility. And this is the entertainment to which we are invited, and upon the theory that the inhabitants of Luzon are an incapable people. The difficulties which are thus indicated will be magnified not less than twofold when we contemplate the subjugation of the entire group.

Turn now to the other aspect of the case. Assume that they are what they are, a capable people, and that they are competent for the work of self-government; that they have received the ideas that are set forth in our Declaration of Independence. Assume, also, that the war which they are now carrying on against us is by them waged, as they think, in defense of the principles of justice, of equality, of the right of self-government, indeed, then, I inquire, how long is this crusade to be prosecuted by us in the hope of conquering a quiet peace?

If they are a people capable of self-government, then, upon the theory of the President, they are in the right and we are in the wrong. If the Filipinos are a capable or an incapable people, who can say that this war is wise and just? By what process of reasoning can it be taken out of the catalogue of national follies and crimes, and who can defend successfully those who are responsible for the inauguration and prosecution of this criminal war?

If the Filipinos are incapable of self-government, if they are living in a semibarbarous state, who rises to say that it is the part of wisdom for us to continue a contest for the subjugation of a people whom we can not accept as political associates?

If they are what the President maintains they are, then there is no avenue through which they can be permitted to become a part of our Government under the existing Constitution.

Our Territorial system is not a training school for the reformation of criminals or for the enlightenment of half-civilized races; but our Territories, when created, are in the quality of the inhabitants equal to the duties of statehood, wanting in numbers only. The Philippine Islands furnish inhabitants adequate for ten States. If we hold them they are with us as States or as vassals. Whoever—and in this word "whoever" I include the President of the United States—whoever accepts them, either as equals or as vassals, is the enemy of the Republic.

The war is carried on upon the theory that the Filipinos are incapable of self-government. Everywhere and always there is the admission implied, if not expressed, that if the Filipinos were capable of self-government it would be a crime in us to arrest or to thwart their enjoyment of the right. But the war itself, however viewed, is only a step toward evil results of greater magnitude if the President's policy should be sanctioned by the country. Those results I am to consider.

This question I put to the defenders of this war: What is the end that you seek? Is it the vassalage of these people? If so, then you are the enemies of the Republic and the betrayers of the principles upon which the Republic thus far has been made to rest.

If you intend to endow them with statehood in the American Union, then, whether they are a capable or an incapable people, you betray the Union to a fatal ending. Does anyone believe that with safety we can receive into this Union the millions of Asia who have no bonds of relationship with us except that they are of the human family?

The President and his adherents say, "We will prosecute this war until these people are subdued, and then we will tell you what we propose to do with them." They have not disclosed their purpose to the American people.

Terror stricken by the foreshowing of the questions that are to arise in case of success in war, the imperialists are about to submit an amendment to the Constitution by which colonial vassalage shall be made constitutional. Thus by a simple process they propose to end the Republic and create an empire. Do you ask for the evidence on which this statement is based? I answer, events are their masters. Questions are arising which can not be met, and therefore they must be avoided. The laborers and producers of this country must be deceived or cajoled or the cause of the President is lost. Whenever it is decided—and the President says that it is already decided—that Puerto Rico and the Philippines are within the jurisdiction of the United States, then the country may be called to accept the provision of the Constitution as operative in the islands, or the imperialists must show how it may be avoided.

"All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

The novel theory is raised that the islands may be treated as American territory for certain purposes and as a foreign territory for other purposes. We are to enter upon an open-market policy in the East. The commerce of Russia, England, China, the states of Continental Europe, and all the rest, from Japan to Australia and New Zealand, is to pass in and out of the ports of Puerto Rico and the Philippines on a free-trade basis, while as to the United States not a cargo of coffee, rice, sugar, hemp, tobacco, or fruits can be brought from the islands into our continental territory except upon the payment of such duties as might be exacted upon the importation of like products from Brazil or the British West Indies. It is apprehended by the Administration, and with sufficient reasons, that the Supreme Court will say:

"The islands, being within the jurisdiction of the United States, the duties, imposts, and excises must be the same as in the country generally." Such a decision is not only required by the Constitution, but there can be no freedom of trade between the islands and the mainland unless the duties, excises, and imposts are the same.

For the purpose of government the District of Columbia is a cipher, yet no one has ever broached the notion that it was possible, under the Constitution, to establish one system of customs and excise duties for the District and another for States.

The Administration must apprehend what everybody else foresees as certain, namely, this: Whenever the Supreme Court shall reach the conclusion that the islands are within the jurisdiction of the United States, the Court will hold also that the duties, imposts, and excises must be the same in the dependencies as in the States and that the freedom of trade between Manila and New York must correspond to the freedom of trade between New York and Boston.

Such a decision means full freedom of trade between the islands and the States, and it means much more. The inhabitants of the islands, from Luzon to Sulu, slave and free, are made citizens of the United States, and no puny legislative scheme, such as has been proposed for Hawaii, can bar them out.

What does citizenship mean? First of all, it means the right, the unrestricted right, of movement, of travel, of residence, the right to labor everywhere, in everything, and in competition with everybody; the right of purchase of every form of property, from a boy's marble to the stateliest mansion in Fifth avenue.

In fine, by one unfortunate treaty, the work of an hour, we have called into existence 10,000,000 American citizens, all of another race, all ignorant of our language, ignorant of our traditions, and yet they are to be endowed with the rights of citizenship, or they are to be held in a condition of vassalage. If the Supreme Court shall prove faithful to the ideas and doctrines on which it has acted through a long century, a condition of vassalage will be impossible. Freedom and an equality of rights for these 10,000,000, and for all their descendants through the centuries of the future, or an amendment to the Constitution by which colonial vassalage shall be authorized as fundamental law of the Republic, is the alternative which the policy of this Administration opens to the country.

The laboring classes should have in mind the certain truth that free trade between the colonies and the States will follow the establishment of a colonial system, and without much delay. Such has been the policy of England.

The question before the country will be this: Shall the laboring and producing classes of America be subjected to a direct and never-ending competition with the underpaid and half-clad laborers of Asia, or shall the Republic of America be transformed into a colonial empire with like consequences to the laboring classes? This, the gravest question ever submitted to men, is the question before the country to-day, but happily a way of escape is before us if the way can be accepted now.

The way of escape must be accepted now. There must be no delay. In the month of November, 1900, the future of the nation will be decided. Republic or empire? That is the question, the only question of any importance before the country.

If any false financial or industrial policies are entered upon by a new Administration, adequate corrections may be applied in four or eight years, but a policy by which Puerto Rico and the Philippines are incorporated in the Union, or attached to it as vassal dependencies, can never be reversed until this Republic is numbered among the states that have fallen through an unjust and criminal greed of empire and power.

To me the contest of 1900 is not doubtful. We are summoning, and summoning successfully, the laboring and producing millions from every field of industry, and while we shall appeal to them upon the higher considerations of justice, of duty, of regard for the rights of others, we shall not hesitate to appeal to the selfish interests of those who are most concerned in preserving for themselves the share of independence and power which the laborers of America have enjoyed.

Some of the supporters of the Administration, particularly some of the newspapers, have scouted the assertion that the annexation of Puerto Rico and of the Philippines can work any competition with the laboring classes of the United States.

I ask: Are we to compel millions to submit to our authority and exact allegiance from them, and then deny to them the right to travel and to labor in the country to which they belong? Are we to extort from them contributions of money in peace, and exact service of them in time of war, and yet deny to them the privilege of visiting the capital of the country that they serve?

These promises of security to the laboring populations are vain. The acquisition of these islands, in whatever form the acquisition may be made, will be followed by freedom to travel, freedom to labor, freedom to pursue every industry, freedom to practice every art, and in the next generation, if not earlier, freedom to take an equal part in the government of the country. At this point I interject an observation: If the President's claim that these islands are now in our jurisdiction is a valid claim, and if judicial decisions are of any value as precedents, the inhabitants of Puerto Rico and the Philippines are citizens of the United States and already entitled to the freedom of which I have spoken.

The attempt to ingraft a colonial policy upon the Republic is beset with difficulties, with perils, in every direction.

We are demanding an open door to all the markets of China and heralding the demand with a menace of war. If we establish our tenancy in the Philippine Islands can we press a demand upon China and close the Philippines to the Chinese?

And if not to China, how about England and the rest of the world? Where is our open-door, free-trade policy to end? And with what results to American labor and American industries? If we establish our tenancy in the Philippine Islands, do not the islands become an open door for the free ingress of the Mongolian race—peoples in no way distinguishable from the present occupants of the islands? If the islands are treated as of the United States, then the United States becomes the receptacle of the Mongolian race. The thousand islands are so near to each other that passage from neighbor to neighbor is a journey of minutes or hours only, and a police of the islands to prevent immigration into them or migration from island to island is an impossibility. Thus does the Administration invite the country to a policy by which these islands are to become an open avenue through which so many, and as many as may choose to pass over, are to have an opportunity to pass over to this continent.

On what ground and for what reasons have we excluded Chinese Mongolians from the States and Territories of the American Union? For this, and this assuredly—that they outnumbered our millions many times over, and that in labor contests our laboring classes would be broken down, impoverished, and ruined. That was our defense, and a sufficient defense for a policy which otherwise was indefensible. But now, by a course of indirection on which the Administration has entered, that bar which was wisely set up is to be broken down.

When this country shall realize the truth that the perils of which I am speaking are not imaginary, but that they are inevitable in some degree of magnitude, and when the Administration shall be forced to admit the existence of these perils, there will then be set before us two ways of escape, and I assume that the resources of statesmanship can not furnish a third.

For a long twelvemonth the anti-imperialists have been the advocates of a way of escape, and to that way they adhere. They claim that the Philippine Islands, either as one state or as several states, may set up and maintain independent governments, guided, if such shall be their wish, by our friendship and protecting hand. For this and for this only, for this is the extent of our demands and the aim and end of all our doings, we have been arraigned as the enemies of the country by General Otis, in Manila, and by the President in America. On the issue so raised the judgment of the country will be rendered in November next.

The country has a right to know the object, the specific object, for which the war is now prosecuted.

The Congress has not spoken. The President conceals his purpose, but from the circumstances it may be inferred, in part at least, with unerring certainty. He intends to prosecute the war until the Filipinos are subdued. This is announced. We demand peace without delay, and without submission on the part of the Filipinos. If the outcome of the war shall be victory and the abject submission of the Filipinos, their exercise of the right of self-government must depend upon our opinion of their ability to govern themselves. Such is the policy and the purpose of the President. It can not be the purpose of the President to admit the Filipinos to the right of self-government, as that admission must bring the war to an end at once, and it would be admission also that the war is unnecessary and unjust. Thus is the proof sufficient that the President intends to hold the Philippines as subjugated possessions.

Our claim is that the Filipinos shall be free, and set up such a government as may be agreeable to them and independently of any dictation by us. This plan so presented to the country, in the presence of the perils that are incident to the acceptance of the Philippines, either as colonial possessions or as prospective States, will compel the Administration imperialists to present a counter scheme.

It is affirmed, with a show of probability, that a scheme has been prepared or contemplated already.

The scheme must be this:

An amendment of the Constitution by which the United States may be authorized to acquire and to hold colonies, and to exercise full and exclusive jurisdiction over them. Thus is the Republic to be transformed into an empire.

Nothing less will meet the exigency in which the Administration will be involved.

Fortunate it is for us that the question of an amendment to the Constitution must be delayed, and that the question arising on our demand takes precedence in time.

Our issue is made up for November next, and on that issue we expect a controlling vote from the laboring and industrial classes, if not indeed a unanimous vote, which is our reasonable demand in the circumstances that exist. We shall be told that the laborers need not fear competition, and that the laborers of America are so intelligent and expert that they may defy competition.

The experience of the country is answer to these delusive promises. The Chinese will pursue employment and attractive wages the world over, and they become imitative workers in every branch of industry. Of this we have knowledge from experience. I now repeat what I said of the Chinese on a former occasion, and as long ago as December 28, 1898. I then said: "They can defy competition, and that peculiarity is the only adequate defense for our hostile legislation. They can manage a bank or run a laundry with a certainty of success that can not be foretold of any other people, whether English or American or Hebrew."

The laborers of this country have now an opportunity, and the only opportunity they can ever have, to put an end to the scheme of establishing a colonial empire, to be followed by the degradation of the laboring population through competition with the laborers of the East. Whatever may be the purpose of the President, his policy contemplates the establishment of a colonial empire and the downfall of the labor class, which now is a necessary and intelligent force in the civilization of America and the progress of the world.

There are those who affect to excuse the President upon the ground that he is in the hands of men abler than himself. At this point I am with the President in not accepting that excuse. It is now many months since I gave the President credit for signal ability in the work of transforming this Republic into an empire. Since that time his conduct and career have strengthened my conviction that he is supreme over all the men who are around him, whether of the Cabinet or of the members of the Republican party in Congress who give him their support.

By the criminal law every man is responsible for the natural consequence of his acts. This rule is applied in affairs of government. Nor can any public officer plead good motives as a defense for bad doings, and in an intelligent magistrate good motives and bad doings can never be associated.

The protocol was dictated by the President; the treaty was extorted from Spain through a commission that was subservient, Democrat as well as Republican, and without a show of resistance; the treaty was ratified by his persistency and the aid of such appliances as he could command; and, finally, his proclamation of power and purpose, of December 21, 1898, became a declaration of war without the authority of Congress, as early as the 5th day of January, 1899, by its publication in the city of Manila.

It is now eleven months since war flagrant was begun, and it is now eleven months since General Otis first, and the President afterwards, refused to listen to terms of peace or to concede an hour's delay in the prosecution of the war.

An account current can not now be written, but trustworthy general statements may be made.

Thousands of young men have fallen in the skirmishes, or died in the morasses, or lingered in the hospitals to a fatal ending, and thus grief inextinguishable has been sent into thousands of otherwise happy homes. Of these, and many unknown, I mention Lawton and Howard and Logan, and others whose names are familiar to the country. What return has as yet been made for these sacrifices? What return is promised by those who defend the war? Some say it means an enlargement of the field for missionary undertakings, as though the propagation of any form of religion can justify war and the sacrifice of human life.

Some say it means more markets and more trade, forgetting that human life is more valuable than merchandise, and that the lives of our young men already sacrificed can not be compensated for by the extension of markets for liquors and cotton cloths. Some believe that new markets can be gained by making enemies of mankind.

Some are animated by a vindictive spirit, and they urge on the war that the Philippines may be punished for refusing to submit to our demands. And some there are who fear that they may be counted as "Little Americans," and they vainly imagine that something of honor may come to them if America shall be recognized as a world power.

And some there are who favor the war because they have outgrown the Declaration of Independence and the preamble of the Constitution, and they are urging the country on to the same conclusion.

If the war should be closed in February, 1900, our expenditures will have then exceeded $200,000,000, and of the deficiency of $51,000,000 now called for a large part will be required for the support of the Army during the current six months.

Thus far what has been accomplished? I ask. Commissioner Worcester boasts that two regiments can march anywhere in Luzon. That is not a condition of peace. It is a condition of war.

We hold a number of posts in Luzon and in other islands. Wherever we are in force, there is peace and there are pretended friends; wherever we are not in force, there are enemies and threatenings of war. The ground that we occupy is under our rule, but all else is foreign territory.

In Luzon we may have one soldier to every square mile. In the other islands we may have one soldier for every 5 and 20 square miles. In Luzon the natives number 95 to the square mile, and in the group they number 75. The President demands military rule for the Philippines. One foreign soldier to rule and 75 natives to obey. And yet the President tells us that liberty, equality, and justice go with the flag!

Ours is a policy of justice, a policy of peace. This policy ends the war in the Philippines; it ends the sacrifice of the youth of America; it puts far away the perils to which the laboring populations are now exposed; it guarantees to us perpetual friendship of new-born republics, and it relieves us from the suspicion that we are to cooperate with England in an attempt to subjugate the weaker states of the world to the domination of the Anglo-Saxon race.

E.

A LIBERTY CATECHISM.

[By Frederick W. Gookin. Slightly revised by Hon. JOHN S. WILLIAMS.]

Our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men in all lands everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seed of despotism at your own doors.—Abraham Lincoln.

I never had a feeling politically that did not spring from the sentiments embodied in the Declaration of Independence. * * * Now, my friends, can this country be saved upon this basis? If it can, I shall consider myself one of the happiest men in the world if I can help to save it. If it can not be saved upon that principle it will be truly awful. But if this country can not be saved without giving up that principle, I was about to say I would rather be assassinated on this spot than surrender it.—Abraham Lincoln. From speech in Independence Hall, 1861.

Q. What is the underlying principle upon which the Government of the United States of America is based?

A. That governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. This is the foundation stone upon which our institutions rest. To deny its applicability to all men in all lands is to repudiate it altogether, to declare self-government merely an expedient and despotism right. There is not one great natural law of human rights for us alone and another law for those whom we may think not entitled to rank with us in the scale of civilization.

Q. Can not the United States have "subjects?"

A. No. Under the Constitution of the United States all the people living within its jurisdiction must be either its citizens or aliens owing it no allegiance.

Q. How about the American Indians?

A. They are aliens under our protectorate or suzerainty, and, except in so far as it has been justified by the necessity for self-defense, our treatment of the Indians has been and is inconsistent with our institutions and the principles upon which they are founded. It is a blot upon our civilization and shows more clearly than any theoretical argument how ill-adapted a republican government is to rule over subject peoples.

Q. Why can not the United States have dependents who are not its citizens?

A. It would be contrary to the Constitution, and would nullify the fundamental idea that all men are born equal and have an inherent right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. In acquiring dependents the country must necessarily be false to its principles and its traditions and thereby proclaim to the world that its citizens no longer hold these principles and traditions to be true.

Q. Why so?

A. Because in assuming the right to take away or to curtail the liberty of other people and to govern them without their consent the first principle of the Declaration of Independence has been violated, and manhood suffrage virtually declared a failure.

Q. But may not this country govern dependent peoples better than they can govern themselves?

A. Possibly, but not probably. Even though we could govern a dependent people better than they could govern themselves, to make the attempt would be a monstrous wrong both to them and to ourselves.

Q. Why would it be a wrong to them?

A. Our Supreme Court, the authorized interpreter of our Constitution, has said: "A power in the General Government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent Territories over which they (the Congress) might legislate without restriction would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form." (Scott vs. Sanford, 19 How., 397.)

In another case that court has said: "The power of Congress over the Territories is limited by the obvious purposes for which it was conferred, and those purposes are satisfied by measures which prepare the people of the Territories to become States in the Union." (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S. Rep., 15.)

In still another case it said: "The Territories acquired by Congress, whether by deed of cession from the original States or by treaty with a foreign country, are held with the object, as soon as their population and condition justify it, of being admitted into the Union as States, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects." (Shively vs. Bowlby, 152 U. S., 1.)

In still another case it said: "The Constitution was made for the benefit of every citizen of the United States and there is no citizen, whatever his condition or wherever he may be within the territory of the United States, who has not a right to its protection." (U. S. vs. Moore, 3 Cranch, 159.)

And in defining the rights of the inhabitants of Territories it said: "The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty, which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national. (Murphy vs. Ramsey, 114 U. S. Rep., 15. See also Mormon Church vs. United States, 136 U. S. Rep., 1.)

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States."

Chief Justice Marshall, for the entire court, defined the term "United States" as follows: "Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania." (Loughborough vs. Blake, 5 Wheaton, 137.)

Judge Cooley, whose commentaries are universally accepted as conclusive interpretations of our constitutional law, summarizes the doctrine as follows: "And when territory is acquired, the right to suffer States to be formed therefrom and to receive them into the Union must follow of course, not only because the Constitution confers the power to admit new States without restriction, but also because it would be inconsistent with institutions founded on the fundamental idea of self-government that the Federal Government should retain territory under its own imperial rule and deny the people the customary local institutions." (Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, 170.)

Because all peoples have an inherent and inalienable right to their liberty—the right to live their own lives in their own way and to govern themselves or to be governed as they choose and by whom they choose. Whether such government be good or bad does not in the slightest degree affect that right. * * *

Q. Why would it be a wrong to ourselves?

A. Because we can not trample on the liberty of others without blunting our ability to distinguish between right and wrong where liberty is concerned. It is incredible folly to think even for a moment that either by virtue of our intelligence or our numbers we are so superior as to be emancipated from the weaknesses of human nature. * * *

Q. Are there other reasons why it would be a wrong to ourselves to attempt the government of an unwilling people even though it be for their good?

A. Yes. The only way in which we can govern a distant dependency is by permitting the Executive to exercise powers which must ever be a menace to the liberty of our citizens. The danger in this may seem remote, but it is a short step from the deprivation of the liberty of some of the people to the curtailment of the liberty of all.

Q. But surely this is taking fright at a bugaboo of the imagination. The danger is not one that the people of such a strong nation as the United States need consider?

A. The danger is not imaginary. Political, that is party, prejudice easily lures people into a sense of security and of acquiescence in a course which, under the guise of beneficence and with the noisy acclaim of patriotism, is nevertheless insidiously stealing away their liberties. How many of the American people realize that President McKinley is now waging a war for which he has not the sanction of Congress? Think of this and what it portends! How many realize that the people are without official information about the causes which led to the outbreak? And yet the Administration asks to be supported blindly in whatever it may do. "On the principles of this argument," to quote the words of Edmund Burke, "the more mischiefs we suffer from any administration, the more our trust in it is to be confirmed. Let them but get us into a war, and then their power is safe, and an act of oblivion passed for all their misconduct."

Q. But is it not the duty of the citizen to uphold the Administration and be loyal to it under all circumstances?

A. The duty of the citizen is to be loyal to his country under all circumstances and to be prepared to give his life for it if need be. But loyalty to an administration is an entirely different thing. The most unpatriotic and most disloyal thing, short of actual treason, of which a citizen can be guilty is to support an administration which is pursuing a policy that he believes to be detrimental to his country's welfare and fundamentally wrong. His duty under such circumstances is to denounce both the measures and the men, and to use all the lawful means at his command to bring about a change for the better. Is the President, who is the servant of the sovereign people, superior to the laws of the land and the limitations imposed by the Constitution? Shall we as citizens permit him to create any new condition whatsoever and sit by in silence, abrogating our right to criticise his acts and to call him to account for them? No—a thousand times no, for that were the end of self-government. "Respect for the office of President may not release the humblest citizen from the duty of bringing its incumbent before the bar of public opinion when he transgresses."

Q. But surely this can not be his duty in time of war?

A. A clear distinction should be made between a war which threatens the integrity of the nation and one like the present, which is a war of "criminal aggression," and which we can stop at any moment we choose.

The moral code for a nation is not different from that for an individual. For the one as for the other to recede from a wrong position is honorable; to persist in maintaining it is dishonorable.

Q. Why do you characterize the war in the Philippine Islands as "criminal aggression"?

A. It is a war the purpose of which is the subjugation of the people of those islands, or, in other words, a war of "forcible annexation," which President McKinley has properly declared to be, by our code of morality, "criminal aggression."

Q. But it is absurd to speak of "forcible annexation" in this connection. Were not the islands already annexed by purchase from Spain before the war with the Filipinos began?

A. The vender of property can convey no better title than he has. Spain sold the United States something she had already lost. At the time the treaty was negotiated the entire country of the Philippines, with the exception of the city of Manila and a few ports occupied by Spanish garrisons, was in possession of the insurgent Filipinos, and these places were closely invested and in imminent danger of falling into their hands also. We acquired no better moral right to the Philippine Islands by the purchase of them from Spain than we would have acquired to Mexico had Spain ceded that country to us also. Our title of sovereignty over the Philippines is precisely identical with the title to rule over this country which France would have acquired, if, while the Revolutionary war was in progress, she had destroyed the British fleet in the harbor of New York, with our aid had captured that city, and, being successful in European waters, had forced England to cede the American colonies to her on payment of $20,000,000. It is inconceivable that the American people can recognize the validity of such a title.

* * * * * * * *

And even if we were to admit, for the sake of argument, that the United States has a valid legal title to the Philippine Islands, that would not in the slightest degree alter the case so far as the right and the wrong of our treatment of their inhabitants is concerned. Moreover, it must be borne constantly in mind that the forcible subjugation of these people, if allowed to proceed unchallenged, will establish a precedent dangerous to our liberty, a precedent likely to lead to other encroachments on liberty, the extent of which can not be predicted. Only by "eternal vigilance" can liberty be preserved. We who inherit it as our political birthright are in danger of not appreciating how easily that birthright may be stolen away.

* * * * * * *

It is the politicians who brand as "traitors" and as "Little Americans" those who have the courage to protest against their wanton acts. And if the United States is to have colonial dependencies, unless they are placed under military rule, it is these same politicians who will govern them either in person or by proxy and doubtless plunder their people. It is they who will have additional and despotic powers.

Q. But politicians are not all corrupt or incompetent. Why should you assume that the President will appoint unfit men to govern the Philippine Islands.

A. We do not say that unfit men would necessarily be selected. We do, however, assert that the teaching of experience as regards other political appointments is such that no thinking man can reasonably expect that the government of the islands will be purer and more free from corruption than are the governments of our great cities here at home. There is every probability that it will be much worse. Our system is one of self-government. The safety of the people against misgovernment lies in their power to "turn the rascals out" on election day.

The people of the Philippine Islands would have no such power. Unless made citizens of the United States, with full rights as such, for them there would be merely "taxation without representation," a thing which our forefathers declared to be intolerable tyranny. Who knows what kind of men future Presidents may appoint, or, indeed, what may be expected of the man who has violated his own and his party's solemn promises, and has debauched the civil service in the interest of his political hangers-on. No reliance can be placed on a President who keeps the people of the United States in ignorance of what caused the outbreak of hostilities, and, so far as he can, of what is going on at the seat of war.

Q. Surely you do not question the wisdom of the censorship established by the commander of the American troops in the Philippines?

A. So far as it relates to the plans of the campaign or any information that might aid our antagonists, it is entirely justifiable as a military measure. So far as anything and everything else is concerned, it is an unwarrantable interference with the constitutional rights of the American people.

Q. To what rights do you refer?

A. The right of freedom of speech and the liberty of the press, which neither Congress nor the Executive may in any way interfere with or abridge. These rights are guaranteed to the people by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The power of voting means that the voter, as a preparation for voting, must have liberty to hear what is said on both sides of every question. In view of this right, the exclusion from the mail for the Philippines of Mr. Edward Atkinson's pamphlets is an absolutely unjustifiable outrage against the citizens of the United States as a whole. Even in time of war American soldiers are American citizens. Every citizen of the Republic has the right to express his opinion upon any subject, at any time, without let or hindrance.

Q. But is it not treasonable in time of war to express opinions in opposition to the policy which the Government is pursuing—opinions which may encourage the enemy or discourage our troops and incidentally result in more casualties in our Army than there might be otherwise?

A. No. The Constitution of the United States defines treason thus: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court."

Chief Justice Story, in his book on the Constitution, says that this definition was made because "free governments, as well as despotic governments, have been ready to convict, upon the most slender proof, some of their most distinguished and virtuous statesmen, as well as persons of inferior character. They have inflamed into the criminality of treason acts of just resistance to tyranny, and tortured a manly freedom of opinion into designs subversive of the Government." As for "sedition," there is and can be no such thing in the United States. The Federalists tried to create that offense and failed in ignominy.

Q. But were not the so-called "copperheads" during the civil war justly regarded as traitors by the people of the North?

A. The copperheads were justly execrated, because the nation was engaged in a struggle for its existence. But even in the heat of that bitter conflict the right to express any opinion, not excepting sympathy with those who were attempting to destroy the Union, was recognized and respected.

Q. And why should not the anti-imperialists be classed with the copperheads and be viewed with the same opprobrium?

A. There is no resemblance whatever between them. The copperheads were disloyal to their country in speech, if not in deed, and were traitors at heart. * * * The anti-imperialists neither sympathize with traitors nor with their country's enemies at home or abroad. They are sincerely sorry that the lives of brave soldiers of the United States should be sacrificed in attempting to deprive a struggling people of their liberty.

They do not, as charged by Senator PLATT, want their country's arms to be defeated, nor rejoice when casualties to our troops are reported. What the anti-imperialists desire is to hold the United States true to the ideals of human equality and freedom; their aim is the preservation of government by the people.

* * * * * * * *

Q. What do the anti-imperialists believe in regard to the Philippines?

A. They believe that the people of the Philippine Islands are and of right ought to be free and independent.

Q. But the Administration's design is purely one of "benevolent assimilation," and contemplates the establishment of a just and humane government under our protection, with a prospect of self-government as soon as they are fit for it. Why should fault be found with such a beneficent programme?

A. 1. The Administration has no lawful power to prescribe any form of government, nor can it in the absence of legislation by Congress say what shall be done.

2. The form of government outlined by the Philippine Commission during the conference with the representatives of the Filipinos in April, 1899, is open to the same objections that were urged against the proposition for autonomy made by Spain to Cuba, which the press and the people of the United States pronounced incompatible with liberty or even reasonable safety from tyrannous aggression.

3. The Filipinos may be unfit for self-government, but the assertion that they are not fit is a gratuitous assumption. It is the plea of the tyrant uttered under the dictates of supposed self-interest. When they have had the opportunity of trying to govern themselves and have failed, then, and not until then, will it be time for us to pronounce them unfit. While opinions in regard to their fitness vary, the views of the most competent observers are uniformly favorable to the Filipinos.

Admiral Dewey is on record as saying that he considers them "far superior in their intelligence and more capable of self-government than the Cubans." These words were used in a telegram to the Secretary of the Navy dated June 23, 1898. Two months later, in a letter dated August 29, he referred the Department back to this expression, and added: "Further intercourse with them has confirmed me in this opinion." The constitution under which they are now working is in itself the strongest kind of testimony to their ability. Mr. John Barrett, late minister from the United States to Siam and an ardent imperialist, says that by the middle of October, 1898, Aguinaldo "had assembled at Malolos a congress of 100 men who would compare in behavior, manner, dress, and education with the average men of the better classes of other Asiatic nations, possibly including the Japanese. These men, whose sessions I repeatedly attended, conducted themselves with great decorum, and showed a knowledge of parliamentary law that would compare not unfavorably with the Japanese Parliament." In the same month two officers of Admiral Dewey's fleet, Paymaster W. H. Wilcox and Cadet R. L. Sargent, made a tour of nearly 600 miles through the interior of Luzon. Their report to the Navy Department, extracts from which were printed in the Evening Bulletin, Philadelphia, February 1, 1899, shows that they found everywhere peace and order under organized civil government.

4. As Americans, who believe in self-government, no form of government in the Philippines should be acceptable to us which does not come from the people themselves. We should simply protect them from foreign interference while they work out their own problem, or fail in so doing, should they prove incapable.

5. Submission to arbitrary rule from without does not fit a people for self-government. Fitness for it has never fallen upon a people like manna from above. It has everywhere been a self-achievement, a growth from within, not a benefaction from without.

Q. What then do the antiimperialists believe should be the policy of the United States in regard to the Philippines?

A. They believe that we should turn the islands over to their inhabitants, help them establish a proper and responsible government on liberal principles, and withdraw as soon as we can with dignity do so, continuing only our protection for a reasonable time against any outside interference with their freedom. This, it may be remarked, is far different from "giving the islands over to anarchy." As stated by President Jordan, of Leland Stanford University:

"It is bad statesmanship to make these alien people our partners; it is a crime to make them our slaves. If we hold their lands there is no middle course.* Only a moral question brings a crisis to a man or nation. In the presence of a crisis only righteousness is right and only justice is safe."

Q. You are proceeding upon the false assumption that Aguinaldo and his followers represent the entire Philippine people instead of a small fraction only of one tribe out of the many which inhabit the islands. Would it not be a crime to deliver the people of the islands into the hands of this unscrupulous man, who, in December, 1897, betrayed them by accepting a bribe of $400,000 from Spain, and whose sole purpose in carrying on the war is "not the liberty of the Filipino peoples, but the continuance of his own arbitrary and despotic power?"

A. If hostilities are suspended it will be easy to provide that the inhabitants of the Philippines shall all have an opportunity of choosing the kind of government they want. Should they prefer to set up two or more independent states instead of one, that is a matter about which we need not concern ourselves.

As to Aguinaldo, it is not likely that the people who are making such stubborn resistance to the Army of the United States in the hope of gaining their freedom will long submit to his rule should it prove oppressive. The charge that he accepted a bribe from Spain has been thoroughly disproved.†

Q. But would you haul down the American flag when once it has been hoisted over a land as a part of our country's possessions?

A. The United States flag has always hitherto been a symbol of liberty. It stands, first of all, for self-government. It is a degradation to the flag when it is raised over a people who are not made free and to whom, therefore, it becomes a symbol of slavery. It is an honor to the flag and to the nation to remove it from any place where it ought not to be; and it ought not to be in any place where it does not signify freedom and self-government for all over whom it waves.

Q. If this sentiment is right, why should not the flag be withdrawn from Cuba and Puerto Rico as well as from the Philippines?

A. It should, unless we are prepared to make these islands a part of the United States—that is, to grant their people all the rights and privileges of citizenship, which they on their part accept, at the same time freely consenting to all the duties and obligations thereby incurred. Notwithstanding Mr. McKinley's declaration that wherever the flag is raised "it stands not for despotism and oppression, but for liberty, opportunity, and humanity," to the people of Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines it signifies both despotism and oppression. It may signify "liberty and opportunity" for Americans in those islands, but not for their natives. It would not be liberty for them to be governed by us. It is not liberty for any people to be governed by another unless they freely consent to be so governed.

Q. How would it benefit the Filipinos if we should grant them independence? As we have no constitutional warrant for establishing a protectorate over them, would it not mean that the islands would be seized by some European power desirous of increasing its domain in the Orient?

A. The probability of such a seizure is pure assumption. It would never take place if, as is most likely, the people of the United States, through their representatives in Congress, can find some lawful way in which to give notice to the rest of the world that no other nation will be allowed to interfere with the independence of any people whom the United States has made free.

This is the only tenure by which the South American Republics have held or do hold their independencies. We have undoubted constitutional right to enter into a treaty with any people whose independence we recognize, and by a provision of that treaty guarantee such people our protection.

But even in the event of such a seizure it is probable that the lot of the Filipinos would be no worse than under our dominion.

Q. Why not? Do American ideals count for nothing?

A. The American ideal is self-government. It is inconceivable that a succession of American "carpet-baggers," each ruling, in all probability not longer than four years, would govern a dependent people more wisely and humanely than the trained officials of such countries as England, France, or Germany. However this may be, we have no more right to govern the Filipinos without their consent, because forsooth some other nation might do so if we should not, than a man has to loot his neighbor's house on the theory that if he does not do it some one else will.

Besides that, leaving the Filipinos, their rights and their interests, out of the question, it is not to our interest. Keeping them hurts us, and will continue to hurt us. If you held a hot brick which was burning you, would you hesitate to drop it for fear some one else would pick it up?

Q. But how can we withdraw from the Philippines without compromising our dignity, if we do so without first chastising Aguinaldo and his followers into submission? Would not our withdrawal be a cowardly confession of impotence?

A. Our physical courage and power are not in question; they are recognized the world over. But what shall be said of our moral courage if we dare not do what is right and just? The question of withdrawal presents difficulties only to those whose reasoning faculties are suspended by what has been called "war drunkenness," whose ideas of "honor" are those of the duelist. It is all the easier because we were the aggressors and caused the conflict needlessly.

Q. What evidence is there that we were the aggressors?

A. The preponderance of testimony appears to show that the material facts in the case are the following: We made the Filipinos our allies. Through Consul-General Pratt at Singapore, Consul-General Wildman at Hongkong, and others, we led them to believe that in return for their cooperation we would assist them in gaining their independence. At the urgent request of Admiral Dewey General Aguinaldo joined him in Hongkong before the fleet sailed for Manila. In his official dispatch to the Secretary of the Navy on June 27, 1898, Admiral Dewey said:

"Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, with 13 of his staff, arrived May 19, by permission, on the Nashan. * * * I have given him to understand that I consider insurgents as friends, being opposed to a common enemy. He has gone to attend a meeting of insurgent leaders for the purpose of forming a civil government."

On July 4, 1898, General Anderson wrote to Aguinaldo formally soliciting his "cooperation" against the Spanish forces. (See Senate Document No. 62, Fifty-fifth Congress, p. 300.) After General Otis assumed command of the United States forces in the Philippines the treatment of the Filipino soldiers generally changed, and if the conflict was not deliberately provoked, the tactics adopted by the American commander in forcing the lines of Aguinaldo's troops were such as could scarcely fail of such a result. Apparently no attempt was made to conciliate the Filipinos.

Instead we refused for months to give them any answer to their questions as to our plans, and both in Paris and in Washington we rejected and insulted their envoys. On December 21st, before the treaty had been ratified either by the United States or by Spain, President McKinley, without authority of law, and usurping power not then vested in him, issued a proclamation directing General Otis to take possession of the islands and establish a military government therein, saying: "The actual occupation and administration of the entire group of the Philippine Islands becomes immediately necessary." At the time these words were uttered we were in possession of Manila and Cavite; all the remainder of the country was held by the Filipinos.

That the Filipinos should oppose the President's order is not strange, for it was so worded as to be tantamount to a declaration of war against them. Nevertheless, the conflict did not begin at once, nor is it known what led up to it. It is known, however, that shortly before it began a regiment of our troops was thrown forward in a V-shaped wedge in such a manner as to separate the Filipino camp into two parts. Communication between the two divisions of the Filipinos was thus interrupted. The fight began, we are told, between a sentry, Private W. W. Grayson, of Company D, First Nebraska Volunteers, and a Filipino soldier who was passing by and declined to halt when challenged.

According to Grayson's story the man replied "halto" in a mocking voice, "and so," says Grayson, "I thought the best thing was to shoot him, and fired." Which side began the conflict is not material. We are told that Aguinaldo promptly disavowed any responsibility for the affair and offered to move his troops to a distance and establish a neutral zone between the armies, thus affording an opportunity for the peaceable adjustment of the difficulty. The reply of General Otis was that the fighting having begun, it must go on to the bitter end, unless, indeed, the Filipinos should surrender unconditionally.

Q. Why does not the Administration respond to the demand of the people of the United States for information about what led to the conflict with the Filipinos and publish "verbatim et literatim" the instructions given to General Otis?

A. We can not tell what reasons the Administration may have for keeping silence in spite of the demand, but the inevitable inference is that the President and his Cabinet are afraid to let the people of the country know the whole truth.

Q. Have the people of the United States a right to know?

A. Yes. The people are sovereign. The President and his advisers are, or should be, their servants, not their masters. The rights of every citizen are equal to the rights of every other citizen. Public policy may justify withholding some information from the whole people for a time, but only when the interests of the people as a whole might suffer from its publication. Fear that knowledge of facts might alienate the support of a majority of the people from the party which happens to be in office is not a valid reason for concealment. As it is impossible to conceive how the interests of the people as a whole can suffer by disclosing what is now asked, the antiimperialists challenge the Administration to proclaim the facts without diminution or enlargement.

Q. If this challenge is not accepted, what then?

A. The people will know that the Administration does not dare to let them know all the facts.

Q. If the facts were made kn own you would find some way to belie them

* The Supreme Court of the United States has said: "Every nation acquiring territory, by treaty or otherwise, must hold it subject to the constitution and laws of its own government." (Pollard vs. Hogan, 3 How., 312.)

And in another case, decided in 1898, defining the rights of a Chinaman born of alien parents, it held that: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." (United States vs. Wong Kim Ark, 169 U. S. Rep., 649, 703.)

Under these decisions and those previously quoted, it is clear that all children born in annexed territory will be citizens of the United States.

† The facts are that the $400,000 paid to Aguinaldo by the Spanish Government was a part of the sum promised at the treaty of Biac na Bato, in December, 1897, as a pledge for certain reforms, in consideration for which the insurgent leaders agreed to leave the country. In the memoranda on the Philippines sent to the peace commission, August 30, 1898, by our General Greene, he refers to "the very honorable position taken by Aguinaldo" in regard to this matter, and says: "Aguinaldo claimed that the money was a trust fund and was to remain on deposit until it was seen whether the Spaniards would carry out their promised reforms, and if they failed to do so it was to be used to defray the expenses of a new insurrection. No steps have been taken to introduce the reforms * * * and Aguinaldo is now using the money to carry on the operations of the present insurrection." For further and more detailed information see Senate Document No. 62, Fifty-fifth Congress.

However, the Filipinos will soon be forced to submit. That will settle the whole question, will it not?

A. No; most assuredly it will not. It will not even settle the question what is to be done with the unfortunate Filipinos in the immediate future; and the greater question of right and wrong will still remain and will be no less a burning question then than it is to-day. The conquest of these people will intensify rather than remove the menace to free government at home which, as has already been pointed out, imperial democracy necessarily involves.

Q. You are wasting your sympathy. Can you deny that the people of the English colonies are much better off than when they governed themselves?

A. We do not deny it, though for the most part they were never self-governing peoples in the democratic sense, and the case of England and her dependencies furnishes no parallel for us. And we do not deny that the Filipinos would most likely be better off under American rule than they were under Spanish dominion. Even great wrongs may be followed by some good results. The serious question for the people of this country to consider is what effect the imperial policy will have upon ourselves if we permit it to be established. The welfare of the Filipinos is but an incident in the proposed departure from fundamental American principles.

Q. The serious question to my mind is whether we shall throw away a golden opportunity. Do not the Philippine Islands promise a rich harvest for the people of the United States which should be realized at all hazards?

A. The greater the probable harvest the greater the crime of wresting the islands from their rightful owners. But there will be no harvest for the people of the United States. A handful of them may amass riches through the grant of valuable concessions; the mass of the people will surely have to contribute through taxation to the maintenance of the troops necessary to reap the harvest for the few.

Q. Well, there is some force in what you say. But surely you must admit that we have a duty to perform and that this duty should determine the destiny of the Filipinos.

A. Yes, we have a duty to perform, a great and sacred duty, a duty to ourselves and to civilization—the duty of living up to our principles if these principles are right. It is not our duty to rob another people of their country nor to murder them for defending their liberty. The moral law is the same for nations as for individuals.

Q. Well, never mind that point. Really, you know we are not so very far apart in our views, except as to what should be done. I disapproved at first of the idea of taking the Philippines, but now that we have taken the islands, how can we let them go? If we do so, will it not stultify us in the eyes of the world, and lead to the downfall of the Republican party?

A. The way to let go of the Philippines has already been pointed out. If for any reason it should prove impracticable, then some other way can be found. There are no difficulties which will not disappear when once we determine to be rid of the useless and dangerous burden which the government of these islands by the United States necessarily involves. Half the mental effort expended in the vain attempt to justify our present policy would solve any troublesome questions which the change to an anti-imperial policy might bring up. In reality, a foolish and wicked pride of consistency is the sole obstacle to a speedy settlement of all difficulties.

So far as our position in the eyes of the world is concerned, we are now stultifying ourselves by pursuing a course diametrically opposed to the principles set forth in our Declaration of Independence. If to be consistent, to be honorable, to be just, to be merciful, to do what is right, is to stultify ourselves, then in heaven's name let us dare do what we ought and let the rest of the world sneer if it wishes.

It is far more likely to sneer if we go on as we are going at present. The scoffers who have predicted that our "experiment" in self-government must, sooner or later, break down are already pointing out that we have entered upon the downward path. As to the probability that withdrawal from the Philippines would cause the Republican party to lose at the polls in 1900, nothing is more likely to bring that about than a continuance of the present policy of the Administration.

Q. Do you expect me to listen to such irrational talk as that? Now that President McKinley has declared the policy of the Administration in regard to the Philippines, ought it not to "clear the political atmosphere" and "raise the discussion of the question to a higher plane?" Are you quite sure you do not misunderstand what that policy is?

A. Mr. McKinley's words, as reported in the newspapers, are: "Peace first; then, with charity for all, establish a government of law and order, protecting life and property and occupation for the well-being of the people who will participate in it under the Stars and Stripes." Translated into plain English this declaration reads as follows: Subjugation first; then, "with charity for all," the establishment of a despotic government of military law and order, and the careful protection of our material interests in the islands. The Filipinos, forsooth, are not to have liberty, but "charity!" Out on such cant! Does Mr. McKinley think to hoodwink the American people with it?

Q. You are not fair to the President, and put a strained construction on his words. Since the speech from which you quote was delivered Mr McKinley has asserted over and over again, as he did in Minneapolis on October 12, that "the future of these new possessions is in the keeping of Congress," and that the Filipinos "will not be governed as vassals or serfs or slaves; they will be given a government of liberty, regulated by law, honestly administered, without oppressing or exacting taxation, without tyrnnay, justice without bribery, education without distinction of social conditions, freedom of religious worship, and protection in life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." What more could any people desire?

A. The President's words sound well until an attempt is made to penetrate their meaning. Read them carefully and it will be perceived that they constitute a promise of liberty with all real liberty left out. Moreover, if the future of these new possessions is in the hands of Congress, by what authority does Mr. McKinley assert what action Congress shall take in regard to them?

With much less temptation to be arbitrary, witness the shameful manner in which the majority in Congress would govern Puerto Rico—exploiting its people outside of the Constitution for selfish interests of persons and trusts having influence.

Be this as it may, the important point to be considered in connection with his profuse declarations that we are fighting the Filipinos in order to give them liberty without independence is that it is absolutely impossible. There are only two ways in which Congress can grant liberty to the Filipinos. One is to recognize their independence; the other is to make them citizens of the United States, with full rights as such, including the right to help govern us.

Q. But the President does not use the word "liberty" in the sense that you do. He means liberty regulated by laws made by us. It is a condition, not a theory, which confronts us, and in meeting it why should we be afraid of making precedents?

A. The people of the United States should view with the gravest alarm any precedent which involves the slightest invasion of the great principle of human liberty. Such a government of dependencies as is proposed by the Administration can not be lawfully undertaken by the people of the United States without first amending the Constitution.* The Constitution as it stands is the supreme law of the land. Neither Congress nor Mr. McKinley can lawfully override its provisions. Should they do so on the plea that they represent the sovereign people, who, by the fact of their sovereignty, are superior to any artificial restrictions of their own creation, it would, if permitted to stand, constitute a precedent appallingly dangerous in its possibilities. If one extra constitutional step can be taken, why not many? What, then, would become of the charter of our liberties? This is a matter of far greater importance to the people of the United States than is the political welfare of the Filipinos.

Q. It is plain that the real animus of your hysterical raving about principles and liberty is nothing more or less than blind and unreasoning prejudice against our noble and self-sacrificing President, and that you are working to undermine his chances for reelection next year. Under the circumstances how can you expect good Republicans to pay any attention to your arguments?

A. In reply to this charge, the anti-imperialists wish to assert most positively that their only desire is to save the United States from the effects of imperialism, and they are quite as willing to work with one party as with the other in order to accomplish that result. It is true that the anti-imperialists do not share your admiration for William McKinley or your confidence in him. It is you and not they who are blinded by prejudice. You judge Mr. McKinley by his words; they judge him by his acts. * * * It has been more than a suspicion for some time that Mr. McKinley is working more for himself and his fellow-politicians than for the good of the country. How else can it be explained that he has so often preached one thing and done the opposite?

* * * * * * *

The events of the last twelve months have brought us face to face with a grave crisis in the affairs of our beloved country. The time has come when we must think and act if we are to preserve and maintain the system of government founded by our forefathers. The question which each one of us must answer is: Shall we continue to stand upon the solid ground of the Declaration of Independence, or by pursuing a course diametrically opposed to its basic principle, place in the hands of a political "machine" power which, while it exists, must always be a menace to our liberty, and in the end is almost certain to destroy it. The decision rests with us. Let us ponder the question carefully, for the longer we pursue a wrong course the more difficult will it be to turn back.

Abraham Lincoln and William McKinley stand for diametrically opposite views of the rights of man. If we uphold McKinley, we must declare that Lincoln was wrong. * * * For the question of self-government or subjection for the Filipinos is the old question of slavery placed before us again in another form. Nothing can be more certain than the fact that the Republican party of to-day is in the hands of men who by their imperialistic policy are undoing much of the great work of the Republican party in the sixties. Surely those of you who are old enough to remember those memorable days, and who gave your strength, your voices, your most earnest efforts, and even, it may be, risked your lives for the cause of liberty and justice, can not have turned away from the high ideals of your youth.

Will you then consent to be partners in the gigantic crime of forcing an heroic and liberty-loving people to abandon their desire for self-government? Will you who helped to free the black man help now to enslave the brown man who is fighting for his independence? Will you help to establish a precedent which practically nullifies the bill of rights contained in the Declaration of Independence? Think of it and of what it may mean for you and for your posterity, if your decision be not for the right. As James Russell Lowell says:

> "Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
> In the strife of truth and falsehood, for the good or evil side."

And let the immortal words of Abraham Lincoln ring in your years:

"What constitutes the bulwark of our own liberty and independence? It is not our frowning battlements, our bristling seacoasts, our Army or our Navy. These are not our reliances against danger. All of these may be turned against us without making us weaker for the struggle. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us. Our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men in all lands, everywhere. Destroy this spirit and you have planted the seed of despotism at your own doors. Familiarize yourself with the chains of bondage and you prepare your own limbs to wear them. Accustomed to trample on the rights of others you have lost the strength of your own independence and become the fit subjects of the first cunning tyrant who rises among you."

And again:

"No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. When the white man governs himself, that is self-government, but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us; our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men, in all lands, everywhere. They who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God can not long retain it."

F.

An arraignment of President McKinley's policy of extending by force the sovereignty of the United States over the Filipinos.—History of events leading up to present situation.

I.

On the 24th day of April, 1898, Secretary Long, of the Navy Department, telegraphed to Dewey as follows:

"DEWEY, Hongkong, China:

"War has commenced between the United States and Spain. Proceed at once to the Philippine Islands. Commence operations at once, particularly against the Spanish fleet. You must capture vessels or destroy them. Use utmost endeavors."

*In the case of Scott vs. Sanford (19 How.) the Supreme Court said: "It (the Government) enters upon territory with its powers over the citizen strictly defined and limited by the Constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a Government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it, and it can not, when it enters a Territory of the United States, put off its character and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the Constitution has denied to it. It can not create for itself a new character separated from the citizens of the United States and the duties it owes them under the provisions of the Constitution. The Territory being part of the United States, the Government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out, and the Federal Government can exercise no power beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved.

* * * * * * *

On that same 24th day of April an interview was had at Singapore between United States Consul-General Pratt and Aguinaldo. Aguinaldo at that time offered to begin a new insurrection in the Philippine Islands and to operate there in conjunction with the United States Navy. Consul-General Pratt thereupon telegraphed to Dewey at Hongkong as follows:

"Aguinaldo, insurgent leader here, will come Hongkong, arrange with commodore for general cooperation insurgents Manila, if desired. Telegraph."

Dewey replied: "Tell Aguinaldo come soon as possible."

In pursuance of this arrangement, Aguinaldo left Singapore for Hongkong April 26, and was taken, with seventeen other revolutionary Filipino chiefs, to Manila on the United States naval vessel McCulloch.

They were landed at Cavite, and were furnished by Dewey with guns, ammunition, and stores to be used by Aguinaldo against the Spanish forces.

On the 8th of June, 1898, Consul-General Pratt, in a speech at Singapore, said:

"I am thankful to have been the means of bringing about the arrangement between General Aguinaldo and Admiral Dewey which has resulted so happily."

On July 4, 1898, General Anderson, then in command of American troops at Manila, addressed a letter to Aguinaldo as commanding the Philippine forces, in which he said, among other things:

"For these reasons, I desire to have the most amicable relations with you, and to have you and your people cooperate with us in military operations against the Spanish forces.

"General Anderson wishes you to inform your people that we are here for their good, and that they must supply us with labor and material at the current market prices."

On July 6, General Anderson, in a letter to Aguinaldo, said:

"It must be apparent to you that we do not intend to remain here inactive, but to move promptly against our common enemy. * * * I am solicitous to avoid any conflict of authority which may result from having two sets of military officers exercising command in the same place."

* * * * * * *

General Merritt, in his official report, says:

"Shortly after the naval battle of Manila Bay the principal leader of the insurgents, Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo, came to Cavite from Hongkong, and with the consent of our naval authorities, began active work in raising troops and pushing the Spaniards in the direction of the city of Manila.

"Having met with some success and the natives flocking to his assistance he proclaimed an independent government of republican form, with himself as president, and at the time of my arrival in the islands the entire edifice of executive and legislative departments and subdivision of territory for administrative purposes had been accomplished, at least on paper, and the Filipinos held military possession of many points in the islands other than those in the city of Manila."

General Whittier, in giving testimony before the Peace Commissioners, in answers to questions as to the number of insurgents got together by Aguinaldo, at Manila, before the surrender, said:

"His forces went around the city, taking the waterworks and the north part of the city, and running up the railroad."

I asked that question of several, and the opinions differed widely—all the way from 8,000 to 30,000 or 40,000 men.

To the question, "Do you think he had as many as 8,000 men before the surrender?" he answered "Yes, sir; the environment of the city took a great many men." He said, "Aguinaldo's headquarters are at Malolos, 23 miles up the railroad. His troops control all the settled parts of the island (Luzon) except Masulo, as well as much of the southern country." He said he meant by the "southern country" those islands below, (i. e., below Luzon).

On and before the 12th day of August, 1898, the city of Manila was in the possession and control of Spain, but it was invested by the United States forces under the command of General Merritt on the water side of the town, and on the land side by the insurgent forces under General Aguinaldo, who had set up and claimed to have established in the island of Luzon a revolutionary and de facto government by proclamation issued on the 23d day of June of that same year.

II.

Such was the situation when the so called peace protocol was signed at Washington on August 12, 1898.

This protocol provided that hostilities between the United States and Spain be suspended, and that "notice to that effect be given as soon as possible, by each Government, to the commanders of its military and naval forces."

The third article of this protocol was in these words:

"The United States will (i. e., may or shall) occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila, pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which shall determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines."

* * * * * * *

The possession of Manila, which General Merritt, in ignorance of the peace protocol, had gained by war, was by that protocol converted into the possession or right of occupation as set forth in the protocol itself, and General Merritt should have taken that view of the situation and acted accordingly. Instead of doing so, he, on the 17th day of August, issued his proclamation for establishing there a government "of military occupation," as if hostilities had continued there, the protocol to the contrary notwithstanding.

III.

When the peace commissioners of the two countries came together in Paris, October 1, 1898, to put the terms of the protocol into the form of a treaty for ratification, it turned out that they were at variance as to the construction of the third article of the protocol.

It was contended on the part of Spain that while under and by virtue of the third article of protocol the United States was to have possession of the city, bay, and harbor of Manila until the treaty of peace should be concluded or put in form for ratification, it was still left to the joint commissioners, and them alone, to determine as to the future permanent control and government of the Philippine Islands, and, consequently, that the Spanish commissioners were entitled to have an equal voice in that determination with the American commissioners; and when the American commissioners came to demand, as they did, the cession of all those islands to the United States, the Spanish commissioners demurred, and insisted that no such cession was contemplated by Spain as embraced within the terms of the protocol, and for that reason they refused to yield to the demand, and proposed that arbitration be resorted to as a means of determining the correct construction of the protocol in that regard.

The American commissioners said in reply that their view was plainly correct, and that of Spain clearly wrong, so that they would not consent to submit the question to third parties, and they called upon the Spanish commissioners to yield their opinion in order that "a peaceful solution may [might] be reached," meaning thereby, as understood by the Spanish commissioners, that unless they did yield to the demand of a cession of the Philippines the United States would resume hostilities and obtain by conquest what they had failed to obtain by diplomacy. The American commissioners, however, added that while unwilling to modify their demand for a cession of the entire Philippine Archipelago, they had been "authorized to offer to Spain, in case the cession should be agreed to, the sum of $20,000,000, to be paid in accordance with the terms to be fixed in the treaty of peace." In answer to this proposition the Spaniards said:

"The Spanish commissioners are now asked to accept the American proposition in its entirety, and without further discussion, or to reject it, in which latter case, as the American commissioners understand, the peace negotiations will end and the protocol of Washington will consequently be broken.

"The Government of Her Majesty, moved by reasons of patriotism and humanity, will not assume the responsibility of again bringing upon Spain all the horrors of war. In order to avoid them it resigns itself to the painful strait of submitting to the law of the victor, however harsh it may be, * * * and she accepts the only terms the United States offers her for the concluding of the treaty of peace."

It was under this pressure that the Spanish commissioners finally yielded to the demand of President McKinley for the cession by Spain of the Philippine Islands, protesting at the time that they did so to avert the horrors of warfare with which Spain was threatened if she refused to comply, in disregard or violation, as they believed, of the spirit and meaning, if not of the words, of the protocol.

IV.

Hostilities with Spain were temporarily suspended by the protocol of August 12, and brought to a final end by the treaty of December 10, 1898, and yet after the expiration of nearly a year we find that President McKinley is now making war against the inhabitants of the island of Luzon for the professed purpose of subjecting them to his rule or that of his military governor, General Otis. The President is waging this war upon his own responsibility and without any authority from Congress. From President McKinley's order to General Otis of December 21, 1898, it would seem that he then supposed himself to be enforcing certain rights gained by the United States in its war with Spain or under and by virtue of the treaty of peace. In that order the President uses language as follows:

"The destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila by the United States naval squadron, * * * followed by the reduction of the city and the surrender of the Spanish forces, practically effected the conquest of the Philippine Islands and the suspension of Spanish sovereignty therein."

"With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain * * * on the 14th instant, and as the result of the victories of American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States.

"In fulfillment of the rights of sovereignty thus acquired * * * the actual occupation and administration of the entire group of the Philippine Islands became immediately necessary, and the military government heretofore maintained by the United States in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila is to be extended with all possible dispatch to the whole of the ceded territory."

WHAT WAS THIS, IF NOT A DECLARATION OF WAR?

In his message to Congress of December 5, 1898, the President said:

"The last scene of the war was enacted at Manila, its starting place. On August 13, after a brief assault upon the works by the land forces * * * the capital surrendered unconditionally. * * *

"By this, the conquest of the Philippine Islands, virtually accomplished when the Spanish capacity for resistance was destroyed by Admiral Dewey's victory of the 1st of May, was formally sealed. * * *

"I do not discuss at this time the government or the future of the new possessions which will come to us as the result of the war with Spain."

In a speech at Savannah, December 17, 1898, the President said:

"If, following the clear precepts of duty, territory falls to us, and the welfare of an alien people requires our guidance and protection, who will shrink from the responsibility, grave though it be? * * *

"It is not a question of keeping the islands of the East, but of leaving them.

"Dewey and Merritt took them and the country instantly and universally applauded."

When the President said this, he well knew that at the date of this protocol no territory in the Philippine Islands had fallen to or been acquired by us from Spain, and that by the protocol we had no right to hold permanently the city, bay, and harbor of Manila, and that the only right given us by the third article of the protocol was the right of occupying those places temporarily, or until the treaty of peace should be put in form by the joint commission and signed.

The President, therefore, was wrong, either knowingly or unknowingly, in making the statements above quoted, to the effect that the United States had acquired the Philippine Islands by conquest in the war with Spain. We are supported in this respect by Judge Day, the chairman of the American Peace Commission, who, in a letter recently published, referring to the doings of the Peace Commission at Paris, said:

"It was not claimed that the United States had a right to the Philippine Islands as a matter of conquest. * * * The capture, after the signing of the protocol, by General Merritt and his forces, whatever its legal effect may have been, included no more territory than we were entitled to hold under the protocol."

In his more recent utterances the President has put his claim to the Philippines also upon the ground of cession. In a speech made by him in September last at Pittsburg he said:

"Peace brought us the Philippines by treaty cession from Spain."

In addressing the Home Market Club at Boston the President said:

"The Philippines, like Cuba and Puerto Rico, were intrusted to our hands by the providence of God."

He had probably forgotten his instructions to the peace commissioners on their leaving Washington for Paris, to "take Luzon," as we are told by Senator and Commissioner Frye that he did.

V.

Let us now inquire whether or not the President is correct in stating that the United States has come into the possession and legislative control of the Philippine Islands, either by the hand of God, by treaty, or in any other way. This treaty of cession could carry with it and give to the United States only such property, land, or territorial rights in the Philippines as belonged at the time to Spain.

It did not include any lands or property then belonging to the inhabitants in their individual capacity, or to corporate bodies or institutions, ecclesiastical or lay. The treaty itself does not purport to have any such operation, and could not so operate even if it did so purport, and it does not appear that Spain then owned or possessed public lands of any considerable value or extent.

Coming then to the question whether the treaty with Spain has operated to convey to the United States the right to regulate the political rights of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, it is provided by the ninth article of the treaty that "the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by Congress."

For the purposes of this discussion we will limit our inquiry to the effect of this treaty upon the political and civil rights and condition of the inhabitants of the island of Luzon alone, not including the city of Manila and vicinity or the occupants of lands now in the possession or control of General Otis as military governor. The question really is, whether or not, by this treaty, the native inhabitants of this island of Luzon have at the present time been subjected in any way to the legislative powers of the Congress of the United States. This rule is styled sovereignty in monarchical countries. This term does not seem appropriate in the United States, where the people themselves are the sovereigns and law-makers, and where it is not now possible for the Federal Government to hold or govern colonies, no such possessions being contemplated or provided for by the framers of the Constitution of the United States.

Filipinos not "rebels"—owed us no allegiance.

VI.

After this so-called rebellion shall have been suppressed by him without putting to death the entire population, how does the President propose to govern the island of Luzon or its surviving inhabitants?

If the ninth article of the treaty did not place them in the power or government of the United States Congress, as claimed by President McKinley, then he is guilty not only of "criminal aggression," but of wholesale slaughter also, in ordering General Otis to enforce that order by force of arms.

If the Filipinos were not by the treaty with Spain subjected to the dominion and control of the United States, we do not see how they can be held or ruled over as colonists of the United States.

It is quite true that they had been colonists of Spain, and that Spain's right over them as colonists was recognized by William McKinley and bid for and purchased by him from Spain. But even if they had been a marketable commodity at any time, they had ceased to be so after the power of Spain over them had been successfully resisted and overcome before the treaty of peace was made.

Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, Volume I, page 178, referring to territories added or acquired, said:

"Full sovereignty can not be held to have passed by the mere words of the treaty without actual delivery. To complete the right of property, the right to the thing and the possession of the thing must be united. This is a necessary principle in the law of property in all systems of jurisprudence. * * *

"This general law of property applies to the right of territory no less than to other rights. The practice of nations has been conformable to this principle, and the conventional law of nations is full of instances of this kind."

In a treatise on international law, by Sir Shurston Baker, just published at Boston, by Little, Brown & Co., at page 61, that author says:

"In modern times sales and transfers of national territory to another power can only be made by treaty or some solemn act of the sovereign authority of the State. And such transfers of territory do not include the allegiance of its inhabitants without their consent, express or implied."

At page 355, the same author says:

"The rule of public law with respect to the allegiance of the inhabitants of a conquered territory is, therefore, no longer to be interpreted as meaning that it is absolutely and unconditionally acquired by conquest, or transferred and handed over by treaty as a thing assignable by contract and without the assent of the subject."

"On the contrary, the express or implied assent of the subject is now regarded as essential to a complete new allegiance."

VII.

Let us see what was the situation in the island of Luzon, which had previously been the seat of the war between the United States and Spain, on the 10th day of December, 1898, when the treaty was signed. The Spanish army, consisting of 12,000 men, before then besieged in the city of Manila by the American forces on the water side and the insurgent Filipinos on the land side, had surrendered to General Merritt on the 14th day of August, 1898, and possession was then taken of the captured city and its suburbs by General Merritt.

The insurgent forces had assisted in that siege and capture and expected and claimed the privilege of entering the captured city with the American troops, but were denied that privilege, so that the city and its suburbs were placed by the Spanish surrender in possession of the United States troops, and continued to be held by them at the time of the treaty of peace, and is still so held.

The country outside of Manila and its suburbs remained as before in the possession and military control of the native inhabitants, organized as a revolutionary government in opposition to Spanish rule under the lead of Aguinaldo as head of the army and president.

This government was established and existed de facto in the island of Luzon for some time previously to the conclusion of the treaty of peace.

Such was the exact state of things in the island of Luzon from and after the surrender of the city of Manila, the rest of the island being in the occupation of the Filipino troops and held by them both by force of arms and under the authority of the de facto civil government established by Aguinaldo, as above stated, when William McKinley, as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, on the 21st day of December, 1898, issued his military orders to General Otis, directing him to extend the military government previously maintained by him in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila, not only over the whole island of Luzon, but over the entire group of Philippine Islands.

By that order the Filipinos were told that the United States had succeeded to the sovereignty of Spain over them, and that they were to be brought under the beneficent rule of the United States; that those who submitted to this rule would receive the reward of its support and protection, and that those who did not submit to that rule would be "brought within it with firmness, if need be," meaning thereby the persuasion of gunpowder.

In vain did the Filipinos remonstrate and try to get access to General Otis for purposes of negotiation and conciliation. He assigned various reasons for not listening to them, among others that under instructions received by him from the President the only terms of peace he could entertain was that of their unconditional surrender.

Repeated attempts of this kind were made by them, always with the same result.

Aguinaldo had before then been recognized by Commodore Dewey and Generals Anderson and Merritt as an associate or ally in carrying on the war against Spain, and heartily welcomed by them in that relation, but when they had succeeded in defeating Spain, and had no further need of Aguinaldo's assistance, he objected to President McKinley's assuming to exercise the same sovereignty over him formerly wielded by Spain, and by so doing did not become a rebel against the authority of the United States.

VIII.

If President McKinley really desired to secure peace with Aguinaldo why did he refuse to adopt the usual and only practicable method of making peace after disputes have been submitted to the arbitrament of war?

He said substantially to Aguinaldo,—"You must submit yourself and your people to my authority and dictation, or take the consequences. These troops of mine are here to compel you to obey, and you can not successfully resist them. The honor and defense of the American flag which I have set up in the island of Luzon require this, and you must either surrender and submit, or be killed."

There stood these armed men in battle array on both sides; on one side the trained soldiers of the United States, placed there to enforce obedience to President McKinley's tyrannical order, and on the other the half-clad, raw, and undisciplined troops of Aguinaldo with weapons furnished them by Commodore Dewey to throw off the yoke of their former master, Spain, determined to resist with their lives President McKinley's assertion of sovereignty over them by assignment from Spain.

The President and his supporters would have the people of this country believe that the Filipinos are now and for some months have been in rebellion against the authority or sovereignty of the United States, and that he as President might, lawfully and in his civil capacity, employ the American Army in suppressing such rebellion.

If the rules of international law, as above quoted by us, are correct, it can not be true that the Filipinos are now or ever have been in rebellion against the sovereignty of the United States, as is pretended and claimed by the Administration now in power.

In a speech recently made to the people of Illinois by Attorney-General Griggs, of the Cabinet, that gentleman said:

"That to-day the United States of America possesses by solemn treaty the only lawful sovereignty over these (Philippine) islands; * * * that in one of these islands one of these numerous tribes has raised an army of insurrection against the American flag and has attempted * * * to drive the lawful authority of the United States from the island of Luzon."

If that gentleman were to consult the dictionary he would find that rebels are defined as "those who oppose lawful authority by violence," and that he should not call the Filipinos by that name unless he is prepared to show that they owe allegiance to the United States Government.

Did that bring on the conflict?

IX.

We think the President seeks also to justify his course in using the American Army to put down these Filipinos upon the plea that they brought on the conflict by making the first attack. In his speech at Pittsburg, Pa., he said:

"The first blow was struck by the insurgents."

In a speech made by him as late as October 13, at Fargo, N. Dak., he said:

"We never dreamed that the little body of insurgents whom we had just emancipated from Spain * * * would turn upon the flag that had delivered them from Spain.

"Then it was that the insurgent leader made an attack upon our men and then our boys let loose."

We can not believe the President was correct in that statement except that part of it which shows that the insurgents had been previously emancipated and delivered from the power of Spain by the United States.

The truth of this matter, as understood by us, really is that on the night of February 4, 1899, a single Filipino, probably armed, but without hostile intent, was fired upon by an American sentry at his post and killed, and that thereupon the Filipino soldiers were so enraged that they at once made an attack upon the Americans, probably without any orders or authority from headquarters.

General Otis himself, referring to this incident, said:

"It is not believed that the chief insurgent leaders wished to open hostilities at this time, as they were not completely prepared to assume the initiative."

Strictly speaking, therefore, the first blood shed was that of a Filipino, recklessly fired upon and killed by the American sentry under the circumstances above stated.

X.

The President's claim of sovereignty over both the Philippine Islands and their inhabitants is now rested upon the treaty of peace and that alone.

By the third article of that treaty Spain cedes to the United States the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands—that is, she transfers to the United States her territorial sovereignty in those islands, whatever it then was.

The ninth article relates to "the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of those islands," and by this article Spain undertakes to confer upon Congress the power of determining the future civil rights and political status of the Filipinos.

By the President's military order of December 21, 1898, General Otis was directed to inform the inhabitants of the islands that the United States had succeeded to the sovereignty formerly exercised by Spain over them, and that this claim of sovereignty was to be enforced by the Army of the United States placed there under the command of General Otis, as military governor of all the Philippine Islands.

If this was not the initiation of a hostile movement against the inhabitants of Luzon then enrolled under the banner of Aguinaldo as the head of a de facto government there established by him, and the commander of a small army raised by him for its defense, what was it? These forces did not come into actual collision until the night of February 4, 1899, as hereinabove stated, and Aguinaldo on the next day sent an officer under a flag of truce to General Otis, stating that the fighting of the night before had not been authorized by him; that he wished that hostilities should be stopped, and proposing the establishment of a neutral zone between the two armies for that purpose.

The reply of General Otis was that the fighting once begun must go on.

XI.

It was not until October 31, 1898, when the peace commissioners had been in joint session at Paris a month, that President McKinley demanded of Spain cession of the Philippine Islands to the United States with a threat of renewing hostilities if that demand was not acceded to. That demand was acceded to very reluctantly on the 28th day of November, 1898, and a treaty of peace framed accordingly was made and signed December 10, 1898.

The ninth article of that treaty purports to confer upon Congress the power of determining the "civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories * * * ceded to the United States."

It thus appears that Spain not only relinquished its sovereignty in the Philippine Islands, but undertook to transfer to the Congress of the United States the power of exercising sovereignty over the native inhabitants of those islands.

The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress expressly the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

It is generally understood that this clause was intended to refer to territory then belonging to the United States, considered as property, and not to refer at all to the future civil rights or political status of the very few persons then residing in such territory.

President McKinley seems to have adopted a very different construction of the meaning of this third section of Article IV of the Constitution, when he undertook by proclamation issued through his subordinate, General Otis, early in January, 1899, to subject the native inhabitants of the Philippine Islands to his absolute and despotic military rule.

XII.

Résumé.

This action was taken by the President while Congress was in session and before the ratification of the treaty, and therefore before it had any existence in a legal sense.

It is not to be supposed that the President after the conclusion of a treaty of peace could continue to exercise powers only authorized by a state of war, and if the quotations from writers upon international law above made by us are reliable and authoritative, it would seem that by that treaty Spain could not convey to the United States any dominion or power of legislation over the civil rights or future political condition of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

It would therefore seem as if the President, in issuing the proclamation above mentioned, not only exceeded the powers belonging to his high office, but took a course calculated to provoke the armed resistance which very soon followed.

The President could not have expected that a people who had taken up arms to gain their independence from Spain were willing to be put under the despotic military rule of any other foreign power, however profuse it might be in its professions of friendship and benevolent purposes.

If sovereignty were a commercial commodity, and capable of transfer by one nation or government to another for a pecuniary consideration, we can not think that the people of the United States desire to take advantage of the bargain of the President with Spain, which purports to give Congress the same dominion over the Filipinos which had been formerly exercised by Spain, and from which the President of the United States claimed to have delivered them.

Can the United States consistently with its own sense of honor consent to deal thus treacherously and cruelly with these poor and deluded people after having recognized them as allies in carrying on the war against Spain?

This question is, as we suppose, soon to be submitted to and passed upon by Congress.

Army Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. STEPHEN M. SPARKMAN,

OF FLORIDA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, March 27, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8862) making appropriation for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—

Mr. SPARKMAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I rise not so much for the purpose of antagonizing this bill as for the purpose of submitting some remarks on the policy which has produced the necessity for the large appropriation which this bill carries. I have had neither time nor the opportunity for studying the measure in detail, but I dare say the appropriations to be made by it are not materially greater than the necessities of the large army for which we are to provide may require. It is of the conditions which have created this large military establishment which I complain, and of which I propose to speak.

There should, Mr. Chairman, have been no necessity for this great increase in our Army. For more than a century, except during the civil and other wars in which the United States has been engaged, we got along without any such large army as that we are providing for to-day. Why is it needed now? Because, sir, we are trying to do something we ought not to do; because we have abandoned our old-time policy and are trampling under foot the principles which have made us great and strong.

Our Government was framed with a due regard to the inalienable rights of man, and was based upon the consent of the governed, and for a hundred years these principles obtained in the administration of the affairs of this Government. At least that was true when the Democratic party controlled the destinies of the country. Now a change has come upon us, and a large army is the order of the day. Republican simplicity is receding, and a new order of things is taking its place.

Once it was our pride that the customs and conditions which prevailed in European countries were not our customs and conditions; that having a government based upon the consent of the governed, whose foundations were laid deep in the affections of the people, a large standing army would not be necessary, and that a national militia could be relied upon to fight our battles on land and to protect our territory and home from invasion by foreign foes. Nor was this difficult of accomplishment; our territory was, with one exception, compact and contiguous, so that in case of war with any first-class nation, save possibly one, that of Great Britain, we could have acted wholly upon the defensive in so far as the military arm of the Government would have been called upon to strike.

But now how different! Our territory is no longer confined to the North American continent, but is found westerly near to the very doors of China, and in the southeast among the West Indies, where we become neighbors of the most powerful and rapacious nations on the earth. Instead of the compact territory which afforded us this immunity from attack by foreign powers, thousands of miles of water now intervene between our western possession and our eastern islands, while a line from one to the other would extend halfway around the globe.

This acquisition of territory occurred almost in a day; no great effort was put forth to accomplish the result. An insignificant war with Spain, beginning and ending almost as soon as begun, was the pretext and the occasion for the abandonment of our old-time policy. But insignificant as was the occasion, and rapid as were the processes through which we moved to the acquisition of this territory, the changes have been great and the results startling.

For three decades the expenses of keeping up our Army had been comparatively small. Indeed, not since the civil war and the two or three years following it have the expenses necessary to keep up the Army been so great by nearly a third as these expenses will be during the next two years. Throughout that long period of time and up to the breaking out of the Spanish war the average cost of the Army of 25,000 men had not been greater than $45,000,000 per annum; while this bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, calls for an expenditure of $111,000,000 for an Army in the neighborhood of 100,000 men. But this is not all, for the amount appropriated by the bill is several millions of dollars less than the estimates of the War Department for the same period of time, which calls for nearly $128,000,000—more accurately, $127,712,133.55. So that while the bill appears to make a saving over the estimates of $16,672,779, it is not a saving in fact, for no doubt the next session of this Congress will be called upon to make good this difference, with several more millions added, because the War Department holds out no hope that the Army will be reduced or that the expenditures for its support will be less.

Now, this is a startling showing. From an average expenditure of about $45,000,000 during the twenty-seven years prior to 1898 the cost of the Army has suddenly, and within two years, climbed up to nearly $128,000,000 per annum.

I know it will be said that this large increase in the cost of our military establishment and in the Army itself is due largely to the war in the Philippines and the necessities growing out of the possession of these and other islands recently acquired by us. But, sir, while that is no doubt the reason, it furnishes no sufficient excuse for the burdens that are thus entailed upon the American people. For there was no necessity for this war in the Philippines, as it could have been avoided by a proper course of action; neither was it necessary to burden ourselves with this insular territory, for we need not have taken these islands.

We went to war with an avowed purpose of freeing the Cubans, and, incidentally, avenging the loss of the Maine, but disclaimed at the time any intention of territorial aggrandizement. If we had adhered to this laudable purpose, if, when we had ascended with the evil one up into the high mountain of temptation, we had put the tempter behind us as he pointed out to us the glories of empire and demanded our homage, we would not to-day be engaged in war with the Philippines; we would not be appropriating millions to feed the starving Porto Ricans, nor in equipping our military establishment; neither would we be confronted with the great problems, both foreign and domestic, which now meet us no matter in what direction we turn our faces. We would not be troubling ourselves with the question as to how far the Constitution extends beyond the limits of the States. "Duty and destiny" would not be disturbing the dreams of the President and those whose political fortunes are linked with his, nor would he be oscillating between the two extremes of protection at home and free trade with the people he has forced upon us; neither would the specter of imperialism be disturbing patriots throughout the land.

Mr. Chairman, let us for a moment consider the immediate future of the Army and the burdens which its increase will cast upon us if we are to pursue this policy of colonization and imperialism. I say the immediate future, because no one can tell what the more distant future may have in store for us if we pursue longer the path of empire in which a foolish policy has placed our feet. Already we can see our Army increased to 100,000 men at a cost of more than $125,000,000 per annum. But, sir, in this I do not refer to the cost of the war with Spain, amounting to $200,000,000; nor to our efforts to subdue the Philippines, covering a period of a little more than a year and aggregating an expenditure of $164,000,000.

I only at present refer to what is likely to be the continued annual expenditures of our military establishment if we are to hold all of our insular possessions. Does anyone think our standing Army, with the present conditions confronting us, will be much if any below 100,000 men? If so, he deceives himself. The Filipinos will never be willing subjects, nor can we count on the everlasting love and friendship of the Porto Ricans, to say nothing of the fact that our actions toward the Cubans in taking and holding forcible possession of their island, ignoring their appeals for freedom, and governing them with the sword, is not likely to create feelings of amity and love among them for us, nor to make them friendly neighbors.

So that to defend these distant possessions from foes without and within, from the powerful neighbors near whose doors they lie, and the unwilling subjects we have made of the inhabitants, a large army will ever be necessary if we hold them.

It is, therefore, safe to say that our military establishment will never again be smaller than the Regular and Volunteer Army is to-day, and $125,000,000 is a small estimate for its cost, to say nothing of the increased expenditures of the Navy and of the pension list, an expense which war always makes necessary. The increased cost of the Army alone will be in the neighborhood of $80,000,000 per annum over and above the average cost of the Army for the years between 1870 and 1898.

Somewhere I have seen an estimate, which I regarded as an extravagant one, of the business which we are likely to do with the Philippines and Porto Rico, and with China and Cuba by reason of our ownership of the Philippines and Porto Rico and the control we propose to exercise over Cuba. This estimate, made no doubt by some enthusiastic imperialist, placed our trade with the Philippines at $120,000,000, and that with Porto Rico and Cuba at $150,000,000, or $270,000,000 in all. Now, mark you, this is based upon the assumption that we will get all this business, and if realized would only be the gross business done as a consequence of our ownership of these islands, not the profits we are to make.

Then, again, it is not our entire population who would share in these profits, for very few of them would be able to engage in the business which we would do with the people of the Philippines, China, and Porto Rico. A large majority of them would neither share the business or the profits which this enthusiast puts at 15 per cent, aggregating only about $40,000,000 per annum, and which is the sum total of all the commerce and business we would get for this vast expenditure of money and for the precious lives sacrificed in our efforts to fasten our power upon an unwilling people.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the increased cost of the Army alone is $80,000,000, or $40,000,000 more than can be gotten out of the transaction, even according to the most extravagant estimate made by the most imaginative advocate of "benevolent assimilation." Then from the standpoint of commercialism or business this policy of imperialism is actually a failure, and so it will prove. There is no money in it, as has been fondly hoped and asserted by those who take a roseate view of expansion. We are to pay annually these vast millions for the poor boon of following in the footsteps, even at an humble distance, of England and other imperialistic establishments just across the sea, whose policies and institutions we have heretofore despised.

But, sir, there is another view of this matter which will not commend itself to a large number of our people; something that was not considered in the beginning by those who gave direction to the movement. Of all the parties that have ever existed in this country, the Republican has been the strongest protectionist party, and of the members of that party the present incumbent of the White House has stood out as the most prominent protectionist of them all. He enjoyed not many years ago the distinction of having the most pronounced tariff bill ever passed by Congress named for him, and to-day when we wish to emphasize the doctrine of protection we call it McKinleyism. There had been protectionists, it is true, before, and there have been protectionists since, but McKinley has towered far above them all.

Other tariff laws, affording protection to a greater or less extent, have been passed by both Democratic and Republican Congresses, but none was ever so distinctly protective as was the McKinley law of the Fifty-first Congress; yet it remained for him, as President of the United States, to advocate and adopt a policy which, if carried out, will cripple if not overturn his protective policy as well as all the industries which this policy has builded up; and, as is usually the case, this change falls more heavily on the producing classes than it does upon any other. The sugar, tobacco, and citrus fruit producers will be the first to suffer by the admission of the Philippines, together with Hawaii, Porto Rico, and Cuba, if it should eventually be annexed, as is no doubt intended by those who shape the policies of the Administration. The sugar industry would be absolutely wiped out of existence, while the citrus fruits and tobacco industries would be injured beyond measure.

I say this because no matter how much those who favor the doctrine of protection in its entirety may wish to place and keep a tariff on the importations from these islands into this country, they will not be able long to do so. It will make no difference whether the Constitution permits or prohibits such duties. They will be of short duration. The same forces which demand the free importation of Porto Rican productions to-day will demand the free introduction of those from the Philippines and of all other territories we now own or which we may own in the future. When these influences come, no matter from what source they spring, whether from that sentiment which would extend our institutions in their purity and force to all our people and over every foot of our territory, whether from a belief that our Constitution prohibits discrimination against any land or people over which our flag shall wave, or whether from business or commercial interests, or from all combined, they will be too strong to resist.

I say nothing as to the constitutionality of laws which would undertake to discriminate against these new possessions and in favor of our home institutions, for the courts will soon be called upon to decide this question, and we must all bow to their conclusion. But no matter what that decision may be, there will in a few years at most be absolute free trade between the States and the most distant territory we may purchase or conquer. True, our people will not go to these islands in any great numbers, for America, with its salubrious clime, its productive soil, and its varied resources offers a more attractive home for the American and European than do the storm-swept and sun-scorched isles of the Pacific or the West Indies. But these fertile islands will soon pass into the hands of wealthy Americans, who will multiply every production possibly a hundredfold, for which American markets must be found. Then the subtle but powerful influences which money can exert will open wide the door of American markets to those productions, even if the patriotic sentiment of the American people now in favor of the application of the open-door policy should fail to accomplish that result. Then what will become of our much-vaunted protective policy? What will become of the industries which that policy may have fostered and builded up?

But, sir, it will not be the manufacturers that will suffer most. No; the farming and agricultural classes, as I have before stated, will have to bear the burden and competition which these productions of tropical countries will bring about.

No wonder the tobacco-growing and sugar-producing sections are alarmed; for if a check is not put to the expansion policy of the President these industries will be injured in all of the States where they are carried on, and in many will be wiped out of existence, while the orange growers in Florida and California will receive a heavy blow.

Mr. Chairman, why, in our solicitude for the black races of the Pacific and of the inhabitants of other countries, do we forget our own people, their welfare and happiness? Abating not a jot or tittle of charitable impulse, I think we should first look out for our own homes and people. Then, perchance, we would be better able to do a little missionary work abroad.

But, sir, these are not all nor the greatest evils which will flow from this policy. The greatest danger is to our institutions. All others can be corrected, all other wrongs righted; but the liberties of a people, once overthrown by their own consent, can not be revived again. If the Army is enlarged beyond a proper limit, it can be reduced by the hand which created it. If tariff laws are unwise or their schedules are too high or too low, a corrective may be applied by the legislative branch of the Government; but when liberty's sun has once set upon a nation it has never in all the centuries that have come and gone been known to rise and shine again upon that land or its people; and so it will be with us if we pursue the path of imperialism on which we have ventured.

A republic such as ours can not own and control colonies and long remain a republic. We can not maintain our free institutions and govern a people who have no voice in the administration of our governmental affairs. Colonization sooner or later leads to imperialism, and there can be no empire in a republic. The forces which uphold the one and control the other are antagonistic and the two can not be joined together under the same government and live. It must be all republic or all empire. This has been the lesson taught by the past, and if we try the experiment the wreck of one more—the greatest of all republics—will be added to those strewn along the pathway of nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a remedy for all this; there is yet a way out of the difficulties in which an unwise policy has entangled us; there is yet time for us to undo what we have done; yet time to retrace our steps and set our feet in the path marked out by the fathers, when our Republic was started on that career of progress which has been the marvel of the ages, and the admiration of liberty's votaries everywhere. Let us in the end give freedom to the Philippines; and hold out the bow of hope and promise to the people of all other islands over which our flag may float; let us carry out our promise made to the Cubans and to the world in their behalf, and leave them to govern themselves in their own way. All this can be done without loss of prestige on our part, and in such a way as to make of them friends and allies in peace and in war, in trade, in commerce, in progress and development. Let us hasten to do this, and the perplexing questions of domestic and foreign affairs will disappear, and the clouds and mists now gathering about our republican institutions will fade away in the brighter light of the new century into which we are now carrying the progress and development made in that we are leaving behind. [Applause.]

Army Appropriation Bill.

OF

HON. EDWIN R. RIDGELY,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, March 28, 1900.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8582) making appropriation for the support of the Regular and Volunteer Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901—

Mr. RIDGELY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I think I shall have to oppose the motion to strike out; and in doing so I wish at this particular point to call the attention of the House to the fact that, as we have progressed with this bill, passing item after item, we are but emphasizing the fact of the constantly growing burden and expense upon the people by reason of the growth of our standing Army and its present misdirected use.

While on the floor I will ask the chairman of the committee for information upon a matter which we shall reach a little further on in the bill. I understand this bill to provide an appropriation for the extra pay of officers when they serve in a higher rank than that for which they are commissioned. I will ask the gentleman whether there is any requirement as to the length of time that officers must so serve before extra pay shall begin?

Mr. HULL. We shall have an amendment to offer when that part of the bill is reached. I prefer not to answer questions affecting a part of the bill which we have not reached.

Mr. RIDGELY. I shall probably not want to take up time just then, and I merely wish to remark that we find officers taking every advantage of this provision to draw extra pay. For instance, when the colonel of a regiment gets leave of absence, if but for a few days, there is for the time being promotion all along the line, and officers temporarily fill positions higher than their real rank—often for a very short time—draw, as I am informed, extra pay, while the colonel also draws his full pay. In this way a great many thousands and even hundreds of thousands of dollars are taken from the taxpayers of the country. I will also, in behalf of the taxpayers, call the attention of the House to the fact that in this Congress we have enacted a gold-standard law that will inevitably result in increasing the cost of every dollar that the people have to raise to sustain this Army.

Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee longer, but shall avail myself of the privilege of including in my remarks a letter by Mr. SULZER, a member of this House from New York, published in the Albany Sunday Press of the 25th instant, bearing upon this feature of the burdens which this Congress is heaping upon the people. The Sunday Press is said to have the largest circulation of any weekly paper in the State of New York; in publishing the letter the editor gave it this significant heading and editorial notice:

THE CURRENCY QUESTION AND NATIONAL CAMPAIGN—OPINIONS OF PROMINENT MEN ON WHAT WILL BE THE LEADING POLITICAL ISSUE NEXT FALL—STATEMENT BY HON. WILLIAM SULZER.

While other issues will be prominent factors in determining the result of the coming national political campaign, it is generally conceded that the currency question will, as in 1896, play the leading part. The Sunday Press presents below the opinions of three prominent men on the subject. Congressman WILLIAM SULZER pays his respects to the gold standard bank currency and bond law in the following signed statement, prepared exclusively for this paper:

Editor Albany Sunday Press:

"By the signature of the President the iniquitous Republican gold standard bank currency and bond bill is now a law, and the people will ere long have an opportunity of feeling and observing its disastrous and oppressive operation.

"The Republican party has made this law a party question, and it can not be eliminated from discussion as a leading issue in the coming campaign.

"The law was passed not because it was a proper measure, but because the money power to-day behind the Republican party demanded the enactment of this legislation. It is the final consummation of the contract made in the campaign of 1896 between MARK HANNA, representing the Republican party, and the national banks. It is the carrying into effect of the last and most villainous act in the great political drama of the last national campaign. By this act the Republican party surrenders unconditionally to the sordid greed of the money power.

ONE OF THE MOST VICIOUS MEASURES.

"It is one of the most vicious political measures ever passed through Congress. It commits the Government unalterably by law to the single gold standard and makes all obligations, public and private, payable in gold. It strikes out the word "coin," which means gold or silver, in all Government bonds, inserts in its place the word "gold," and in addition thereto it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds without end whenever he pleases, and makes the bonds payable in gold. It refunds the national debt and turns the finances of a mighty people over to the money lenders. It violates the obligations of the contract between the Government and the bondholder and provides that the currency of the people shall be issued by the national banks and gives them the right at will to expand or contract the currency.

A DARING DEPARTURE.

"It is the most startling and the most daring departure from the time-honored and well-fixed financial principles ever made in our history, and the result will be as disastrous as it is far-reaching. It reverses our financial system, repudiates the platforms of both parties, and revolutionizes the monetary methods of a century.

"The money power, the bondholders and their agents, the trusts, the syndicates, and the plutocrats secured the passage of this law. They are in favor of changing the terms of the contract so that they shall hold the option instead of the Government. They would commit treason against the Government in order to gain a monetary advantage.

AGENT OF THE MONEY TRUST.

"The Republican party to-day is the mere agent of the money trust and in every department of the Government carries out its wishes and registers and records its decrees.

"The people will soon realize how they have been duped and betrayed by the unscrupulous bond dealers and the scheming bankers.

"The history of all the past teaches in unmistakable terms that gold and silver at a fixed ratio is the basis for the currency of the world. I am neither a gold monometallist nor a silver monometallist. I am a bimetallist. I believe in both gold and silver, and I would not destroy or demonetize either. Both precious metals should be admitted to the mints of the country and freely coined, not for the Government, but for and on account of the depositor. Herein is the distinction and the substance of the whole matter. This act destroys silver as a part of the money of the world, and should be an additional incentive to every true friend of humanity to work harder and more earnestly for the free and unlimited coinage of both precious metals. There will be no sure, no lasting, and no permanent prosperity until it is done. Temporary expansion will only be temporary prosperity. That is all.

WILL NOT SETTLE THE CONTROVERSY.

"Make no mistake. The enactment of this law will not settle the controversy, but will only define more certainly the issue, make it more clear, and bring about more quickly its ultimate triumph. No great question is ever settled until it is settled right. Bimetallism is a living issue, and will be of paramount importance to mankind as long as civilization uses money for trade and commerce. Gold never was the friend of liberty. It never fought a battle for humanity. No people in a great crisis ever found it a faithful ally. It has been the agent of panic, the minister of despair, the advocate of calamity, and the high priest of cruelty. I am against the gold standard. In time it will have to go. This law simplifies the fight.

MUST NOT BE DISCOURAGED.

"The friends of humanity and bimetallism must not be discouraged by this temporary triumph of Republican treachery. The Democratic party will be true to its principles, true to the Constitution, and true to bimetallism. In its next national convention it will take no step backward on the money question. It will reaffirm its declaration of 1896 for the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver at the present legal ratio without waiting for the consent of England, and denounce in unmeasured terms this last, most infamous, and most abject surrender of the Republican party to the sordid greed of the money trust.

BONDS ADVANCING IN PRICE.

"Already we witness the first evils of this culminating atrocity of class legislation. United States bonds are advancing in price as a matter of course. When the refunding begins under the Republican financial scheme, the premium paid by the Government for the old bonds will amount to so enormous a sum that, added to the extension of time, the national debt will be increased by several hundred millions, all of which goes into the pockets of the bankers and money lenders and comes out of the pockets of the people. This mortgage on posterity is easily figured. The interest-bearing debt amounts to $850,000,000 and has nine years to run at 4 per cent; increased to thirty years, to run at 2 per cent, with premium on old bonds now quoted at 134 and advancing. Let any elementary arithmetician make the calculation.

THE PRODUCERS PAY.

"Who gets this profit, and who pays for it? The bondholders, foreign and domestic, get the profit, and the producers of our country pay it.

"In my opinion one of the worst features of this act is that part of it which consummates the bargain made by MARK HANNA with the national bankers of Wall street during the campaign of 1896. They aided the Republicans then, and now they receive their share of the spoils. For three years the Republicans have waited and hesitated to pass this abomination, fearing the wrath of an outraged and indignant people. But another national campaign is near at hand. They need help again and, in order to get it, have unconditionally surrendered to the money power and turned the finances of a great Government over to the national banks. It is awful to contemplate, and the result can not be overestimated.

DANGEROUS POWERS.

"The powers this act gives the national banks are far-reaching and most dangerous. It turns over to them the finances of the people—the lifeblood of trade and commerce—and gives them the right to contract or expand the currency at will. This right should never be surrendered by the Government. I say, and time will demonstrate it, that if you give the control of the money supply to the national banks, they will soon absorb the wealth of the people and own the Government.

"It is an enormous power; a power that can cause panic or prosperity, happiness or misery, to thousands and millions of people. I say it is a power too great to be given to any corporation and, if once given and set in motion for selfish ends and for sordid purposes, will be a fruitful source of woe and misery to hundreds and to thousands of our fellow-citizens.

CREATES THE GREATEST TRUST.

"Talk against trusts! This act creates the greatest trust the world has ever seen—a national-bank trust, controlling the finances of a mighty people. This act makes the banks supreme. They will act in accord for a common purpose and be one great, gigantic trust, octopus-like, with tentacles reaching all over and to every part of the land, holding, squeezing, and controlling every other trust, every other industry, and all the people.

It marks the final consummation of the money power to enslave the industrial masses of our land, assassinate labor, strangle opportunity, paralyze trade, stagnate commerce, and pauperize toiling humanity.

A REPUBLICAN LAW.

"This is a Republican law, and the Republican party stand sponsor for it. It gives the monopoly of issuing money to the national banks, and hence the right to expand or contract the currency of the people whenever it suits their convenience. No corporation shouldhave this power to make or destroy. It deprives the Government of one of its greatest attributes of sovereignty and gives to the national banks the right to paralyze at their will every industry in the country. It is the most daring attempt the banks have ever made by law to seize one of the greatest weapons for good or evil known to civilized man. For the Government to surrender this prerogative and delegate away this power is a crime against every citizen in this land and will work woe and misery to millions yet unborn.

TOO MUCH POWER.

"I am opposed to the Government delegating away its powers to the national banks. The Democratic party should vigorously oppose conferring additional powers on or granting any greater privileges to the national banks. In my judgment they already possess entirely too much power. They are doing to-day, only to a greater extent, what the United States Bank did in the days of Andrew Jackson. The right to coin and issue money is one of the greatest prerogatives of the Republic and one of the highest attributes of its sovereignty. It should not be delegated, transferred, assigned, or set over to any national bank, to any trust, or to any monopoly.

"As Democrats, we should resist the encroachments of national banks on the liberties of the people with the same zeal and the same courage that Andrew Jackson in his day resisted the audacious claim of the United States Bank. And when the national banks impudently declare that the Government should go out of the banking business, we answer that the banks must go out of the governing business.

"In Jackson's day there was only one Nick Biddle. To-day, by virtue of this law, there is a Nick Biddle in every national bank in the land.

"The Democratic party demands its repeal, and on this issue, if there were none other, in the coming campaign we will sweep the country and restore the government of the people to the people.

"WM. SULZER."

This letter is significant, Mr. Chairman, in many respects, not alone for the clear and truthful exposé of the iniquity of the banker's monopoly law, but it is significant because its author is a member from the city of New York, serving his third erm in this House, having been reelected in 1896, and again in 1898, while boldly defending the "Chicago platform" and Government issue of money as against national-bank notes. It is significant that it is published at this time in the most widely circulated paper in the great State of New York, with editorial indorsement. These facts clearly proclaim that the desire for exclusive Government money, together with the Chicago platform, is steadily gaining strength in New York and the East.

Porto Rico.

OF

HON. EBENEZER J. HILL,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, April 11, 1900.

The House having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8245) entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes," and the Senate amendments thereto—

Mr. HILL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Availing myself of the general leave to print concerning an act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, etc., I propose to put into the RECORD a portion of a letter to a constituent, together with extracts from the official report of H. K. Carroll, special commissioner from the United States to Porto Rico, and also from the report of Gen. George W. Davis, military governor of the island, together with some deductions of my own, made after a somewhat careful study of these reports.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 7, 1900.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter received. I send herewith (and request your careful reading) the speech of Senator CHARLES W. FAIRBANKS, of Indiana. I will also send, as soon as I can get it, the speech of Senator SPOONER upon this same subject.

In the fall of 1898 I visited Porto Rico with the express purpose of studying the conditions there, so that I might vote intelligently upon the question when it arose. If I am wrong in my vote, every Republican Senator with the exception of five or six and every Republican Representative with the exception of five are equally wrong. If I am wrong, every Army officer now stationed in Porto Rico, including the commanding general of the island, is equally wrong. If I am wrong, the President of the United States, who was obliged to revise his opinion after the testimony before the House and Senate committees, is equally wrong.

The trouble about this whole question is that the generous, hearty sympathy of the American people fixed and defined the course which was to be pursued before the case was in court and the evidence submitted; and even the President of the United States, in the face of his own message, labored earnestly and faithfully with the members of Congress and Senators to vote for the pending bill. It is to his everlasting credit and honor that he did allow his judgment upon the presentation of the facts to control his warm-hearted sympathy for this little island. The trouble, my friend, in regard to this whole question is that we all, in making up our opinion concerning the people of Porto Rico, looked upon them as we would upon the same number of Anglo-Saxon people under like conditions, whereas they are like us in nothing. Never since Adam was driven out of Eden has any people been treated with the generosity which has been manifested by the United States toward Porto Rico.

When the American occupation came the little island was subject to a system of taxation which, for municipal and insular budgets, robbed them of 12,000,000 pesos annually, or substantially $12,000,000. A peso is exchangeable now by Executive order at 60 cents on a dollar. The agricultural interests of the island were practically bankrupt; the land mortgaged for almost its full value, with an interest charge ranging from 6 to 24 per cent and averaging between 12 and 18 per cent. The sugar industry was practically destroyed. There was but one thing to do, and that was to reduce taxes. The taxes on land were 12½ per cent on the whole income from it, and other taxes in like proportion. The tariff tax on a barrel of flour, together with the consumption tax in the island, was $6.24. Even a common laborer was taxed on a basis of one-sixth of his daily wages, and against that a tax of 12½ per cent was laid.

The first thing that the Americans did was to abate this robbery perpetrated under the plea of taxation; and after a careful study of the whole question I have not the slightest doubt whatever that in the twenty months since we went there fully one-half, or 10,000,000 of pesos, has been abated. The insular budget alone has been reduced from five and one half millions of pesos to less than $2,000,000 for the present year. Five hundred thousand dollars sent annually to Madrid for civil and military pensions has been stopped; $200,000 paid annually for the salaries of the clergy in the island has been stopped; $1,250,000 paid for war expenses has been stopped, and the entire military expenses of the island have, since the occupation, been paid out of the United States Treasury; $225,000 naval contribution to Spain has been stopped, and no charge to the island made by the United States for its naval expenses.

In addition to this, $750,000 has been generously given by the United States for the hurricane sufferers, and now $2,000,000 of tariff taxes have been refunded, and all duties, whether collected in the island or in the United States from goods going either way, will be paid into the Porto Rican treasury. The generosity of this treatment is perfectly unparalleled in the history of the world! The expenses of the island must be paid somewhere and somehow. It is impossible under existing conditions to properly adjust the internal-revenue taxation there and collect sufficient to meet the necessities of the case, and there are only two ways in which relief can come:

First. By tariff duties, every dollar of which will be refunded to the Porto Rican government, or by a straight appropriation from the United States Treasury, the effect of which would unquestionably be to benefit a few speculators and pauperize the rest of the island. The bill on which I shall vote during the coming week provides for an abatement of the existing tariff to the extent of 85 per cent of the present duties; for the collection of the remaining 15 per cent and the payment of every dollar of it back to help meet the expenses of the island; for the organization of a civil government, which is authorized to provide its own system of taxation, and, when the President of the United States is satisfied that such a system has been provided, for the immediate cessation of all duties between the island and the United States.

In my judgment, this bill for a civil government, which will be passed in response to the demand of the American people, is a very serious mistake and one which will bring us quick and lasting trouble, for I have not the slightest hesitation whatever in saying that the island of Porto Rico, which has been subjected for four hundred years to Spanish tyranny, and which, out of a million population, contains but 28,000 adult males 21 years of age who can read and write, is no more fit for self-government than the Indians in the Northwest are to-day; but if they do develop a capacity within six days or six weeks or at any time in the future, and can provide a system of taxation to meet the exigencies of the case, all customs duties automatically cease.

The subject is a great one, and there are vast issues involved, compared with which the question of a tariff in Porto Rico is a trivial incident, but neither my time nor your patience will permit me to go into them. Kindly read the two speeches which I will send you, and I shall be pleased to answer any further questions which you may see fit to ask, after you have done this.

With kind regards, I am, very truly, yours,

E. J. HILL.

3. Interior	786,184.52	96,820.00
Total for both budgets	4,754,042.19	4,781,920.20

The year 1897-98 was wholly under Spanish control. The budget for 1898 and 1899 was made up by the insular authorities under the system of autonomy granted by Spain at that time.

These taxes were derived as follows, and I now quote from the report of H. K. Carroll, special commissioner of the United States:

Customs duties were levied both on imports and exports. There was a special tax on the loading and unloading of freight, the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, and transitory dues of 10 per cent on duties on imports. There was a system of direct taxation resting on the basis of income and not on valuation.

The territorial tax affected urban and suburban property; the industrial and commercial included all kinds of manufactures and industries, all branches of the mercantile and banking business, and all occupations. The industrial and commercial tax was divided according to the population of cities and towns, classified according to character of business, and graded according to amount of business. There were six divisions on the basis of population. Then there were five classes of tariff. The first, with eight grades, included merchants, wholesale and retail; the second, importers and exporters, money lenders, transportation, salaries of officials of banks, railroads, and other companies; the third, the manufacture of sugar, rum, machinery, chemicals, chocolate, ice, etc.; the fourth, the professions and occupations, and the fifth, patents or new shops, factories, etc., which had to pay a special installation tax.

Merchants, wholesale or retail dealers in various lines of wares, on commission or on their own account, paid according to the first grade; retail shops, hotels, and restaurants, according to the second; pharmacies, shoe, provision, and other retail stores were in the third; stationery shops, in the fourth; wholesale and retail tobacco shops, in the fifth; cafés for sale of soda water, etc., in the sixth; boarding houses, in the seventh, and shops for the sale of native flowers and plants, in the eighth.

The second tariff embraced salaries, wages, commissions, and the like.

Governors or directors of banks, railroad companies, etc., paid 5 per cent of their wages and salaries; contractors, 6 per cent of the amount of their contracts; banks, 10 per cent of their profits; importers and exporters, receiving and remitting, buying and selling, shipping, and conducting banking operations, paid $700 in cities of the first division.

No kind of business seems to have escaped the sharp eye of the State experts. Public baths, balls, and concerts; periodicals, including daily papers; laundries, funeral agencies, gymnasiums, livery stables, all kinds of industries, even the manufacture of artificial feet, were taxed.

Blacksmiths paid, according to the town in which their business was conducted, from 12 to 3 pesos, architects from 36 to 6, dentists and pharmacists the same, physicians and surgeons 48 to 12, nurses and midwives 18 to 5, veterinarians 15 to 5, barbers 8 to 2, lawyers, registers of property, and notaries 48 to 16, while carpenters, cabinetmakers, bookbinders, florists, tailors, milliners or dressmakers, professors of music and languages, painters, etc., paid according to their class and grade.

Among the exceptions may be noted washerwomen, barbers without shops, clerks in commercial houses, and similar classes.

Day laborers were assessed on the basis of one-third of the value of a half year's wages.

The territorial tax was levied on the income of real estate, both rural and urban. In valuing the income of a farm, the commissioners would fix a certain price for the respective products. All taxes were payable quarterly. The amount assessed for the benefit of the State was 5 per cent both on urban and suburban property.

The rate for the municipality varied according to its needs, but was generally 7 or 7½ per cent.

The income of municipalities was derived from the consumo tax on articles (food, drink, and fuel), from the tax on territorial, industrial, and commercial (being 9½ per cent of the valuation by the State), and from fines, leases, licenses, rents, etc. The income from licenses was for construction of buildings, scaffolds, sidewalks for street vending, for billiard tables, cockfighting, prostitutions, and even street begging.

From this brief review of the systems of taxation it will be seen that if the laws had been faithfully administered no person and no article or form of property could have escaped his or its share of the public burden. The direct taxes seem to have been extremely onerous.

The earnings of merchants, manufacturers, and other producers were subject to a tax of 12½ per cent or more, according to the financial exigencies of the treasuries, provincial and municipal.

If a merchant's income were valued at $10,000 a year, he would pay in direct taxes $1,230. He would also pay for his cedula or personal passport, the amount of which was graduated, according to personal means, from 12 cents up to $25 or more. He would pay a direct tax on his residence and furniture, and on his horses and other live stock, if not used for labor. If he were just starting in business, he would pay a patente or tax for the privilege. And yet the general testimony was to the effect that taxation was not really oppressive, or would not have been if it had been impartially assessed and collected. But the fact that it was so heavy doubtless had an influence in inducing people to conceal their property as much as possible and undervalue their annual income.

Articles of common use, such as rice, flour, corn, charcoal, wines, etc., not only paid heavy import duties, but were subject, with fresh beef, milk, and sugar produced in the island, to a consumo tax at the gates of the municipalities.

Flour, which had paid a duty of $4 at the custom-house per hundred kilos, paid at the city gates $2.50 consumo tax, or a total of $6.50, which was at the rate of about $3 per hundredweight. Rice, the common article of diet, paid $2.70 import duty and $1 consumo tax. Fresh beef paid a consumo tax of $5 a hundred kilos or 220 pounds. This was in addition to the head tax paid the city by the slaughterer.

This was the condition of taxation upon the date of American occupation. What changes have been made? From the budget of 1898–99 were stricken general liabilities, $498,501.60, all of which went to Madrid for expenses of the colonial ministry, etc., for payments to returned soldiers and marines and for pensions, civil and military pensions amounting to $362,700; for the clergy, $197,945; for the army, $1,252,378; for the navy, $222,668; leaving a total of $2,610,428 for that fiscal year, or a reduction in taxation which would have been levied upon Porto Rico, but for American occupation, of $2,171,493.

The budget for the year 1899–1900 makes still further reductions. It is as follows:

Imposts	$332,200.00
Miscellaneous	139,349.14
Customs	1,357,841.00
Postal	81,000.00
Total	1,910,390.14
Expenditures (estimated)	1,943,678.71

With this carried into effect, the reduction of taxation for this current year over the Spanish estimate for last year will be $2,838,241.49. In addition to this, large reductions have been made in the municipal taxes. The tax on agricultural land has been reduced one-half. The uses of stamped paper and all stamp taxes have been abolished. Fisheries have been made free. Church appropriations have ceased. Lotteries have been abolished. The principal consumo taxes on food, fuel, and drink have been abolished.

Notarial fees have been reduced from $1.88 to $1, from $4.50 to $1, from $11 to $1, from $1 to 50 cents, according to class of documents, and other fees have been canceled. The cost of the insular police has been reduced about $200,000.

Notwithstanding the large reduction of taxation this year, $119,709.30 will be expended in excess of last year for educational purposes.

All export duties have been discontinued. The customs tariff has been largely reduced, the estimated receipts under the military tariff of 1900 being $1,357,841 as against 3,377,900 pesos in the 1898–99 budget, which, as I have stated, was made up by the insular government after autonomy was promulgated.

Now, by vote of Congress the entire amount of all customs duties collected on Porto Rican products brought to the United States since American occupation and to be collected hereafter under the Dingley law have been refunded to the treasury of Porto Rico. This amount to January 1, 1900, was over $2,000,000. Surely Congress has at least dealt generously with Porto Rico. Besides these changes many others have been made, all in the interest of the taxpayer and in the line of removal of special burdens upon commerce. I call special attention to the preliminary report of H. K. Carroll, made in 1898, in December, upon the tariff. He says:

The Spanish tariff, like all other Spanish methods of raising money, was designed to secure the revenue needed with the least possible disadvantage to Spain. It was, of course, natural and proper that Spanish imports should be favored and that the productions of other nations should bear the chief burden. Consequently the rate paid on goods from the Peninsula averaged about 10 per cent, while the charges on those from other countries were high, in some instances so high as to be practically prohibitive.

When prohibitive duties are levied, it is usually for the purpose of excluding undesirable goods or of protecting home products. Prohibitive duties do not, of course, yield revenue; and if revenue is sacrificed, it must be in order that some other object deemed more important may be gained. But the Porto Rican tariff was so levied as to suppress, or at least repress, Porto Rican industries, and in some instances without benefiting those of the mother country. There seems to have been an utter disregard of insular interests. If Spanish producers were not affected, the framers of the tariff showed little concern as to how high or low the rates were put.

As between Spanish and Porto Rican producers and manufacturers the latter had no chance. Nor were the needs of Porto Rican consumers, however urgent they might appear from the insular point of view, treated as worthy of serious attention. Indispensable articles of food not produced in the island had to come in a roundabout way through the hands of the merchants in Spain or pay enormous duties if imported direct from other countries.

The Porto Ricans thought that some of the many streams of the island might well furnish power to mills to grind wheat from the United States or Canada into flour; but the government at Madrid punished these aspirations by making the duty on wheat almost as high as that on flour. Flour paid $4 per sack of 92 kilos (about 200 pounds), and wheat $3.15, and flour paid also, for municipal purposes, a consumption tax of $2.90. There were mills in Spain, and by importing wheat for them from the United States they could be kept going. The millers of Spain profited; the people of Porto Rico suffered.

The entire subject of tariff reform is treated exhaustively in this report, specific recommendations for the revision of each schedule being made by a committee of Ponce merchants. I cite from that relating to food stuffs. First, they recommend a gradual abolition of export duties on island products, extending over a ten-year period. These are wholly removed now. They advise a reduction of duties on wheat flour, unhulled rice, jerked beef, pork and lard, olive oil and olives, cheese, and butter. Codfish and salt fish may continue to pay the same duties. Wheat and unhulled rice should pay half the duty assessed against flour and hulled rice.

At that time the following Spanish duties were in force:

	Per 100 kilograms.
Wheat flour	$4.10
Wheat	3.25
Corn	3.25
Corn meal	4.10
Pork and lard	4.60
Hulled rice	2.88
Jerked beef	2.45
Codfish and salt fish	1.00
Cheese	15.10

Now, the duties on these same articles under the American military tariff are:

		Present duty.	Under proposed bill.
Wheat flour	per 100 kilograms	Free.	Free.
Wheat	do	$0.60	$0.09
Corn	do	.18	.027
Corn meal	do	Free.	Free.
Pork	do	Free.	Free.
Lard	do	1.70	.255
Hulled rice	do	.60	.09
Jerked beef	do	2.50	.375
Codfish	do	Free.	Free.
Salt fish	do	.50	.075
Cheese	do	3.00	.45

But it is said that in view of the high Spanish tariff against other countries food supplies came from Spain without duty except the war tax. This is not true.

During the year 1896 86,369 kilograms of codfish were imported from Spain exempt from import duty, against 12,703,176 kilograms from other countries subject to duty.

Of cheese, 16,008 kilograms came from Spain exempt, against 311,872 kilograms subject to duty from other countries.

Who doubts that in all of these food products Spain received the full price paid for these things from other countries, with the duty added?

At that time they also recommended a reciprocity provision of 20 per cent reduction on the respective tariffs of the United States and Porto Rico, with a revision of rates every five years.

In view of all these facts, how remarkable is the suggestion that Congress is not dealing generously with Porto Rico when even the 15 per cent of existing rates is to be wholly paid into the insular treasury.

On February 17, 1899, Mr. Carroll reported upon the tariff to the Secretary of the Treasury on the large reductions made under the military tariff and quoted from a commercial bulletin as follows:

The new tariff reduction, considering the duties on articles of prime necessity, betters the conditions of the poorer classes, who form the majority of our population, and the cheapening augments the consumption, thus increasing the volume of business. The suppression of export duties is another of the improvements of the new tariff whose benefit requires no demonstration and will relieve somewhat the losses suffered by the low price of coffee and the want of markets for our tobacco.

Through the press of the country and in the progress of this debate, it has been repeatedly said that the military governor advocated immediate free trade, but, on page 54, General Davis says:

The island must, it is supposed, ultimately derive its principal revenue from internal taxation, but this can not be until a new scheme of taxation for the whole island can be worked out. This work requires very careful consideration and can not be properly done until the general policy to be pursued with respect to the future status of Porto Rico is known.

Regarding general legislation by Congress, it is recommended that the trade between the United States and the island be left as free as possible and that the customs revenues collected here be left to the island temporarily as an income for local expenditure. As soon as a new local internal-revenue tax law can be framed and put into operation the custom-house collections will inure to the General Treasury, but for a few years it will be very difficult to balance the budget without this aid.

The foregoing is from his official report. On March 31 he says as follows:

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO.

In an interview to-day Governor-General Davis said:

"I have not felt it proper for me to discuss Congressional matters, filling, as I do, an executive position. I have expressed my views fully, however, on Porto Rico's needs; and I might say if Congress should adopt free trade, the receipts of the custom-houses would naturally cease. One million five hundred thousand dollars has been collected during the fiscal year, and with free trade this will fall off. What will then run the island?

"Although I have received no official advices regarding an appropriation, I understand through the newspapers that an appropriation was decided upon, and I infer that this appropriation will be spent on insular government expenses.

"If free trade is adopted I can not see how the necessary funds for the conduction of the affairs of the island are to be raised by myself or those who succeed me. Two million dollars are the present expenses, and this amount will be needed annually. There is only a small revenue incoming from stamps, liquors, tobacco, and mercantile licenses, and it is impossible to collect taxes because of the conditions."

So much for taxation. Concerning self-government and the capacity of the people to exercise this great privilege, I wish also to quote from this statesmanlike report:

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

I have found it to be necessary, as I believed, in the discussion of civil affairs, past and present, to advert in strong terms to the general unfitness of the great mass of the people for self-government, and, unfortunately, the number of the intelligent, learned, and responsible natives bears a very small ratio to the illiterate and irresponsible. If the percentage of those who are not able to read and write was as small as that of those who can, I would have the greatest pleasure in recommending the immediate endowment of the island with full autonomy.

The census of 1897 showed a population of 899,394, of which 75,824 were pure-blood negroes and 242,000 mulattoes, or of colored 317,824. Of the whole population he says on page 17:

A calculation was made by a local authority to show the number of electors on the supposition that the franchise should be exercised only by male natives over 21 years of age who could read and write or were taxpayers of record. The number of these two classes are given as—

Those who could read and write	28,073
Those who were taxpayers	26,285
Total	54,358

On the 25th day of July, 1899, an election was held in Adjuntas for municipal officers, and the registration was made in conformity to General Orders, No. 112:

The order imposed the following qualifications for electors: Men over 21 years old, able to read and write, or who were taxpayers of record, who had been actual residents of the island for at least two years and of the municipality for six months preceding the date of the election. The number who proved these qualifications before the board of registration was 906, out of a population, according to the census of 1897, of 18,505; that is, less than 5 per cent could vote under the conditions stated.

There was much public interest in this election, and it is believed that about all who were eligible were registered. This incident indicated that in the whole island there may be approximately 45,000 who could vote under the conditions of the order above referred to.

The class who can not fulfill these conditions, say 75 per cent of the males over 21 years of age, are usually in a state of abject poverty and ignorance, and are assumed to include one-fifth of the inhabitants.

They are of the class usually called peons. This word in Spanish America, under old laws, defined a person who owed service to his creditor until the debt was paid. While those laws are obsolete, the condition of these poor people remains much as before. So great is their poverty that they are always in debt to the proprietors or merchants. They live in huts made of sticks and poles covered with thatches of palm leaves. A family of a dozen may be huddled together in one room, often with only a dirt floor. They have little food worthy of the name and only the most scanty clothing, while children of less than 7 or 8 years of age are often entirely naked. A few may own a machete or a hoe, but more have no worldly possessions whatever. Their food is fruit, and if they are wage-earners, a little rice and codfish in addition.

They are without ambition and see no incentive to labor beyond the least that will provide the barest sustenance.

All over the island they can be seen to-day sitting beside their ruined huts, thinking naught of to-morrow, making no effort to repair and restore their cabins nor to replant for future food.

The remarks of Mr. James Anthony Froude, in his work on the English in the West Indies, apply with full force to these people:

"Morals in the technical sense they have none, but they can not be said to sin because they have no knowledge of law, and therefore they can commit no breach of the law. They are naked and not ashamed. They are married but not parsoned.

"The women prefer the looser tie, that they may be able to lose the man if he treats her unkindly, yet they are not licentious. * * * The system is strange, but it answers. * * * There is evil, but there is not the demoralizing effect of evil. They sin, but they sin only as animals, without shame, because there is no sense of doing wrong. They eat the forbidden fruit, but it brings with it no knowledge of the difference between good and evil. * * * They are innocently happy in the unconsciousness of the obligations of morality. They eat, drink, sleep, and smoke, and do the least in the way of work they can. They have no ideas of duty, and therefore are not made uneasy by neglecting it."

Between the negro and the peon there is no visible difference. It is hard to believe that the pale, sallow, and often emaciated beings are the descendants of the conquistadores who carried the flag of Spain to nearly all of South America and to one-third of North America.

One family of industrious people, such as are found all over the United States, contributes more to the general prosperity and wealth of the country than ten families of these peons.

Spain maintained in Porto Rico before the war a force of upward of 4,000 regular troops, about 1,600 more than the number now in the island, while the Spanish guardia civil had double the strength of the present insular police.

The former government, it is said, was administered with great rigor and the civil guards were the agents for apprehending violaters of the laws and of royal decrees and orders. The accounts given of the barbarities practiced by these men tell of a condition that is scarcely conceivable. The island was peaceful, but it must have been such a peace as exists only where the inhabitants are subjected to a reign of terror.

With the departure of the Spanish forces came a swing of the pendulum to the opposite side. The pressure was released. The people, good and bad, had yet to learn and see that there could be no rule of order or well-being without subjection to the ordinary requirements of organized society.

It was difficult for them to conceive of a reign of law without display or constant exercise of force. Obedience to law for the common benefit of all seemed to them incomprehensible, and the inculcation of this doctrine has been far from easy. But notwithstanding the unfavorable conditions much progress has been made, though the advance from day to day and from month to month has been scarcely perceptible. But comparing the past with the present it is not difficult to recognize the general advance and progress toward a greatly improved system of administration, a system that will insure peace and tranquillity and that will furnish a fair opportunity for the island to prove its capacity and to take its place as one of the well-governed communities of the world.

The steps by which this result has been attained are stated in the circular of August 15 herewith, and it is unnecessary to enumerate them a second time.

In any country where more than one-half of the population is continually on the verge of starvation or are pinched by hunger; where labor, when employed at all, is remunerated only to the extent of from 20 to 35 cents per day; where thousands upon thousands are unable to secure work at any rate; where only 10 or 15 per cent of the inhabitants can read and write; where the ordinary standards of public morality are largely ignored; where half the children are illegitimate; and, finally, where the functions of the government have been used to discourage, repress, or prevent initiative, and the people have no knowledge of any duty or obligation but to obey the orders of the governing classes—it would be strange if, under such conditions, murder was unknown, and pilfering, stealing, and plundering were uncommon.

Let it be supposed that under conditions such as are recited a government of repression should be suddenly relaxed and for it another substituted, which these ignorant people have heard of as one under which freedom is the predominating characteristic; it would be still less strange if, when released from restraint, the tendency to lawlessness should greatly increase and a reign of terror should take the place of a reign of oppression.

The people of this island have been long and thoroughly taught an unfortunate object lesson. They have seen the island governed and exploited by a class in the interest and for the benefit of a few.

The Spanish governing element has disappeared, but their example remains. There is no lack of natives of learning and ability ready to take the place of their former masters, step into their vacant shoes, and take up the government laid down. And, having power, would they not use it as their predecessors did? So long have the people been accustomed to this kind of control and absolute subordination that the most of them would accept it as a matter of course.

There is no lack on the part of these people of pretension to all the virtues, and as beautiful theories of government as were ever propounded by the wisest statesman are put forth continuously. The cause of the brotherhood and the rights of man has as ardent expounders in Porto Rico as could have been found in France in 1793 or in Philadelphia in 1776. There are here a few really public-spirited men who appear to have ideas of government other than self-seeking, but the number is very small. Were the mass of the inhabitants educated and possessed of some conception of the duties of citizenship and experience in civil government, their immediate endowment with rights and privileges equal to those enjoyed by our own citizens would be gladly recommended.

But in view of the profound illiteracy of 85 per cent of the people, of their total unfitness to exercise the elective franchise, of the corruption and maladministration that now characterize the affairs of many municipalities, and of the misuse that would almost certainly be made of political power by those who would inevitably secure it, I can not find warrant or justification for a recommendation to now vest Porto Rico with the faculties and power of self-government—an investiture that I think should be withheld until there shall have been a plain demonstration of their competence to exercise it. When they govern municipalities well, they may have larger duties devolved upon them.

There are very learned and able men in both parties, and their profession of principles and political platforms would receive warm commendation by the most ardent patriot. But I have no knowledge of any country where Latin Americans, released from arbitrary control, have established well-ordered representative institutions within a generation succeeding their liberation, and there are to day many unfortunate illustrations of their incapacity to do so in countries which have been independent for sixty or seventy years. History tells us that usually in Spanish-American republics there is a revolution or civil war at intervals of a few years, except when despotic use of power has prevented it. In vain have I diligently sought for a reason justifying a confidence that Porto Rico would be able to make a better record.

I also quote concerning conditions prior to American occupation, pages 7 and 8:

THE FORMER RÉGIME.

The régime prevailing in Porto Rico previous to the adoption of the autonomic system was a constant source of discontent to the natives of the country and a permanent cause of social and economic unrest. All the governmental and administrative machinery being placed in the hands of one man, the cooperation of valuable and responsible native elements was systematically rejected, individual initiative of every sort was rendered ineffectual, empiricism was transformed into a system of government, and routine formed the basis of public administration. The natural consequence of such a régime was the stagnation of the country, and this was the actual result.

There were other respects wherein the system was extremely prejudicial to public interests. It fostered the creation of a political party composed of Spanish residents of the islands, into whose hands was completely surrendered the interior administration in return for the service of helping at all times to elect for representatives of Porto Rico in the Spanish Cortes deputies and senators identified with the politics of the home cabinet. This policy of do ut des converted the island into a fief of a group of foreigners and their native allies; and, as was to be expected, the most absolute administrative corruption resulted therefrom, especially in the matter of tax assessments, the natural sequel being standing grievances and continual uneasiness.

As the result of long-continued complaints and as an outgrowth of the Cuban war, an autonomous government was granted and elections were held for the national and insular parliaments; but the few autonomists elected (see page 9) "as a protest against the scandalous elections which were asserted to have been conducted by the secretary of government in combination with the alcaldes, resigned their places in the government and decided not to attend the insular parliament."

Commenting upon political conditions, General Davis says, on page 10:

In order to permit American customs and policy to take root in this island and to prepare it for transformation into an organized Territory, it is desirable to set aside personal politics, which is one of the inherited vices here. The public mind must also be disabused of the idea, still dominant, that the whole art of politics consists in securing power in order to give offices to one's friends. It has been too much the rule here for officeholders to neglect public interests and to blindly obey those who, having put them in office, can also remove them. Their endeavors are directed chiefly to obtaining high salaries, and they give little return therefor. Besides, it is necessary to instill vigor into municipal life by granting full local autonomy. This will accustom the people to act for themselves and not look to the Government for everything, as has been the case until now.

It is especially necessary to wipe out all those inherited vices and to prepare the country for a real democratic régime, to suppress all abuses, and to install new methods of administration and government, so as to allow the people to take part in the control of their local affairs without the predominant influence of persons having only political ambitions to serve.

This, it seems to me, must be done under superior supervision; for to hastily abandon the island to local control unrestrained by superior power would, or might, result in the greatest disaster.

TRADE STATISTICS.

For 1895, 1896, and 1897 Porto Rico exported—

	Pesos.
Coffee	35,579,151
Tobacco	2,315,455
Sugar and molasses	13,264,162
Total	51,158,768
Average	17,052,922

Of this Spain took—

Coffee	9,735,772
Tobacco	640,825
Sugar and molasses	2,986,326
Total	13,362,923

Cuba took—

Coffee	9,105,570
Tobacco	1,530,856
Total	10,636,426

In coffee our market is and has been free, and the markets of England, Germany, France, and Italy, which absorbed one-half of the whole product, are unchanged.

Cuba took one-quarter of the coffee and five-eighths of the tobacco. The duties there are in response to Cuban demand and, under Cuban independence, will undoubtedly be retained or only given up in exchange for a free market for Cuba in the United States.

Spain took only about one-quarter of each of these products. The United States took three-quarters of the sugar and molasses, and practically nothing else, and this came to us under full tariff rates, 85 per cent of which are now proposed to be withdrawn, and all of the remainder will be paid back to the insular government. Surely this is not ungenerous treatment. Concerning the sugar industry the report says:

At the present time there is but one new sugar mill being erected, and those who are investing their capital in this enterprise—Americans—are doing so because they believe that sugar will soon be admitted free into the United States. But for this belief the enterprise would not have been undertaken. I am not in possession of data giving the number of existing cane mills—I presume the number would reach 300—but the ruins of many such structures can be seen here and there, abandoned because the owner could not afford to improve his machinery—in other words, abandoned or idle—because the business does not pay.

The sugar export of the island has fallen from a total of 170,000 tons in 1879 to 57,000 tons in 1897. On the basis of the ruling price of sugar that prevailed here during the years 1895-1899, inclusive, about 2 cents per pound, no new mill will be erected; and as the old ones get beyond economical repair they will be abandoned and the cane lands pertaining thereto will be used only to pasture cattle.

AGRICULTURE.

The entire industrial future of the island depends on agriculture; it has, and can have, no other reliance, and this fact must never be overlooked in considering any measures with a view to the development of its wealth.

There is a superabundance of labor here; no other West India island except Barbados is so densely populated. But labor is increasing much more rapidly than the capacity of the island to employ it, and the natural consequence is low wages.

In any country where labor is rewarded by compensation of but about 20 or 30 cents per day, the prospect of speedily reaching a high state of civilization and industry must not be expected. The wage rate throughout nearly all Spanish-speaking American territory is not above the figures given. In the British, French, Dutch, and Danish West Indies the laborer receives only from 16 to 25 cents per day for his services. In Brazil, whence comes over 70 per cent of the world's coffee supply, the cost of labor is but about 10 to 15 cents per day. If higher rates than now are ever paid here, it will only be when better prices are obtained for home productions.

So great is the bounty of nature here that the inhabitants can live—that is, exist—without any remuneration. Work not being a necessity, therefore, the present incentive to labor is so small that it seems to matter little to the average peon whether or not he is employed at all. On the other hand, if wages were to be largely increased, there would come hordes of immigrants from neighboring islands to share the benefit unless this was prevented by the adoption of restrictive measures.

Better rates of labor than now prevail can not be expected until there is an advance in the price of the principal products. Were the sugar planter now confronted with the necessity of paying 50 cents in gold per day for field and mill hands—a result which is looked for to follow free trade with the United States—nearly all sugar estates would have to be abandoned. Last year sugar polarizing 96° netted the producer just about 2¼ cents per pound, American money. This year the net returns are slightly better, but the duty paid on sugar imported into the United States is burdened with a tax of 1.685 cents the pound on polariscope test of 96°. Could this tax be abated the producer would receive this year nearly 4¼ cents per pound and wages of 50 cents or more could be paid.

But would such wages be paid? The inference is wholly to the contrary, for the report proceeds to show that—

The small proprietors are disappearing, for the capitalist so arranges his business in Porto Rico and nearly everywhere else as to force the small proprietors to sell their holdings. The tendency in the sugar business, as in all other requiring large aggregations of capital, is to combine or consolidate. While the population is steadily increasing, the number of small proprietors is steadily decreasing, as shown by statistics.

In producing coffee and tobacco the necessities or advantages of combination are not so urgent; but since sugar can not be produced at a profit without large concentrated investments, it is only through combines and trusts that the best commercial success will be attained. Should the development of the cane industry in Porto Rico approximate that achieved in Mauritius, Barbados, and Hawaii, the cane lands will be ultimately owned or practically controlled by these huge "central" proprietors. There will be a few thousand owners, managers, overseers, clerks, etc., and many hundreds of thousands of peon laborers, whose social and, if we may judge by numerous examples in other countries, industrial conditions will be the same as now, and without hope of improvement.

Nowhere in the world, save in the United States and Hawaii, is sugar now extensively produced on a basis of a wage rate for field and mill hands exceeding, say, 30 cents per diem, and in many tropical countries the rate is not above 20 cents.

Considering the world's enormous acreage suitable to cane cultivation and the teeming population available, it is probable, indeed almost certain, that, whatever be the price at which sugar may be sold, the peon will still remain in a state of serfdom, and generation after generation, living in fief to a merchant monopoly, will be able to earn only the wherewithal to indulge in drink, debauchery, and vice. Some of the most instructively warning pages in West Indian history deal with these diverse interests of the population.

This is a gloomy picture, but, turn it how we will, no brighter side appears for the swarming hordes of human beings who now exist here and who will increase and multiply indefinitely.

Yet the country will increase in wealth, trade will flourish, roads will be made, public buildings will rise, harbors will be enlarged, vessels in increasing numbers will be freighted with riches, and the wealth of nations will go on augmenting. Such appear to be everywhere the inevitable tendencies of modern industrial and commercial development.

Notwithstanding these gloomy reflections, it is hoped that the inhabitants of this beautiful and rich tropical island may have a better lot in store. If the legislation for Porto Rico is wise and if an extension of commercial privileges to the sugar grower is conditioned upon an obligation on the part of the proprietors to ameliorate the condition of their employees, to provide near-by schools for children, hospitals for the sick, and asylums for the old and infirm, an example may be given that will be unique in the history of government of tropical lands.

It will not escape your observation that the value of the coffee crop exported is two and two-thirds times as great as that of the sugar, and was nearly seven-tenths of the value of all the exports of the island during the three years, 1895-1897. It will be noticed that more than half of all the coffee sent out of the island went to Cuba and Spain, markets that are now practically lost to this island. Had former prices been maintained, this loss of more than half of the markets would have been of no moment, but with the closing of the doors to this staple came the very great fall in price, due probably in a large degree to the phenomenally heavy export from Brazil and other coffee-producing countries.

Nevertheless, had the same trade relations existed between this island and Cuba that formerly existed, Porto Rico would certainly have enjoyed some advantage from her favorable and convenient situation for supplying the needs of her near neighbor. And this deprivation has seemed the harder to Porto Rico because both islands were under the American flag. As a result, Cuban needs have been met by importations from Brazil by way of the United States, involving a voyage of more than 4,000 miles and two rehandlings, whereas this island would have sent its coffee direct to Cuba, a voyage of but one-fourth or one-fifth as long, and without rehandling, but it was and is shut out from its old established market with an import tax of 5.5 cents (gold) per pound, or over 9 centavos to the pound.

Although the Porto Rican berry is much more highly esteemed by many coffee users than the product of Brazil, it is unknown in the United States, and can not now be sold there at a price which would net the producer more than 4 or 5 cents per pound. In 1897 the exportations of coffee hence to the United States did not reach 110,000 pounds of the total export of 23,505,000 pounds. Of this last amount Spain consumed nearly 17,000,000 pounds, a fact that points clearly to the great desirability of establishing such trade relations with Spain as might permit freer commercial intercourse than now. But in any event it is not believed that the output of coffee will be largely increased. It does not seem probable that the high prices of 1896-97 can be maintained.

New York, Hamburg, and Havre fix the prices, and since Brazil, Central and South America, Mexico, and the islands of the Pacific can produce coffee in vast quantities and market the same at 5 cents per pound, this island must expect to adjust its prices accordingly. Ten centavos per pound is about all the producer can expect to receive for this product, unless Porto Rican coffee should become well known in the United States and so much preferred to other grades as to put it on a level with Mocha and so-called Java. If the export keeps to the average since 1892, bringing annually to Porto Rico from 10,000,000 to 14,000,000 pesos, the island will be fortunate.

TOBACCO.

The great bulk of the tobacco export has been sold in Cuba, from which it is now shut out; but under the proposed bill it will have an advantage in the markets of the United States of 85 per cent less duties than the Cuban product, and consequently 85 per cent better standing than when it came into the United States through Cuban ports.

The Late Richard Parks Bland.
